50,791. She does only her ordinary work?—Quite so.

50,792. But you say she does sit there and solicitors come in with proofs and, as might happen in a newspaper office, she checks with them the proofs. Would you say, therefore, from actual experience, that it is not impossible that a lady member of the staff should work in the same room and on the same piece of work as a male member of the outside public. We have been told a priori by witnesses that it is unthinkable that any work which involves co-operation in any sense with the male outside public can be done by a woman. You have the valuable experience of seeing it done, and you would agree that it could be done and without evil effects?—I think so, certainly.

50,793. Again, if it is said by anybody who is speaking purely a priori, that all women's work must necessarily be done in segregation, you would say yours is a small office, and that in that office it is not done in segregation?—Miss Lewis has a room to herself, but I do not think she is segregated. My chief clerk suggests that probably the point is that the solicitors attend before her. Is that what you mean?

50,794. Not only does she work very freely with other members of the office, but she does in fact work in a certain amount of direct association with members of the public?—That is so.

50,795. And the effects are wholly desirable?—Quite satisfactory.

50,796. (Mr. Philip Snowden.) You told us that you were appointed at the age of 52 to your present post?—Yes.

50,797. And you were private secretary to Lord Loreburn before your appointment?—Yes, before my appointment.

50,798. Then you were appointed direct from that position of private secretary to your present post?—I was.

50,799. Has it never been the case that a chief clerk in the office has been appointed to the post that you hold?—I do not think so. I have no recollection of it.

50,800. But I understood you to say that there was no legal disability attaching to it?—None whatever, because the Act is perfectly plain. It says, "any person" may be appointed.

50,801. Do you hold the certificate of the Civil Service Commissioners?—No.

50,802. Your office is a pensionable one, I suppose?—I imagine it must be, but I really have not inquired.

50,803. Then you do not know if any years were added to your length of service for pension purposes?—No, I could not say.

50,804. You spoke of a proof reader that you formerly had in the office?—Yes.

50,805. When he was there, did he devote all his time to reading proofs?—Yes.

50,806. Would there be sufficient work to employ him fully to do that?—I suppose he did some other work as well. He used to type the records in addition to doing the proofs. The records that come over in manuscript are sent over in the originals. We never allow the original to go out of the office, and a typewritten copy is made of that for the printer. In addition to his proof reading he used to make these type-written copies.

50,807. In regard to appointments to the clerkships, is there anything like an examination of the candidates before their appointment?—No.

50,808. No examination at all?—No.

50,809. It is purely a nomination appointment?—It is purely a nomination appointment. Mr. Wallace reminds me that the third clerk had got a Civil Service certificate, and he was transferred from the Charity Commission.

50,810. Is there anything like an understanding as to the qualifications that should be possessed by the men who are appointed to these clerkships?—The qualification that I would suggest would be that the first and second clerks should be solicitors.

50,811. Are the appointments made direct to the second clerkship and the first clerkship?—Yes.

50,812. It is not the practice to appoint to the third clerkship and then promote them to the second and the first as vacancies arise?—No, if the third clerk were a solicitor there could be no objection to promoting him to the second clerkship, and then, of course, he might work his way up to the first; but certainly I have a very strong opinion myself that the first and second clerks ought to be solicitors. Whether there should be a limited competition for these posts is, of course, a matter for the Commission.

Mr. BUTLER ASPINALL, K.C., called and examined.

50,813. (Chairman.) You are a King's Counsel practising in the Admiralty Division?—Yes.

50,814. You have practised there for a considerable number of years?—Yes, a great number of years.

50,815. You have had experience there both as a junior and as a leader?—Yes.

50,816. Generally, what is your opinion as to the way in which the work of the registry is performed?—I think it is done admirably.

50,817. In your practice there, I suppose you come in contact principally with the registrar himself?—Yes, there are two—the registrar and the assistant registrar. One comes in contact with both of them.

50,818. What is the nature of the cases that they dispose of, or deal with?—They have three classes of work: First of all, they deal with a great many interlocutory matters, namely, matters which have to be disposed of before the case comes to trial before the judge—applications as to whether interrogatories should be allowed, applications as to whether a ship which has been arrested should be released, applications with regard to the form of pleadings, applications with regard to the examination of witnesses, applications with regard to the time and the date of the trial, and matters of that sort. The second class of matter they have to deal with—and this is a very important branch of their jurisdiction—is, that after the case has come into court, and the question of liability has been determined by the judge, namely, whether the plaintiff or the defendant wins the action, the question of the assessment of damages instead of being dealt with by the judge in court, as, I believe, obtains in many other branches of the High Court of Justice, is referred to a tribunal which is composed of either the registrar or the assistant registrar, who has the assistance of two merchants, gentlemen chosen from the City of London who are conversant with business matters, and especially with maritime business matters, and that tribunal then considers whether the claim put forward by the successful litigant is well founded or not, criticises it, rejects it, or cuts it down, as the case may be. That class of work is being performed by them, I think, almost daily, because a great number of cases which are launched in the Admiralty Division do not come to trial; after the parties have seen what the case of the other is, one may give in and say: "I submit to judgment, but I wish now to have my damages assessed." The result of that is that that case, which has never been adjudicated upon by the Court, also comes before this tribunal, and I should think that the turnover of money dealt with by the registrar and the merchants runs into several hundreds of thousands of pounds in the course of a year. As you can well understand, with two ships coming into collision, sometimes there is a total loss, and ships are costly things, and their cargoes are often even more costly, and sums of money running from hundreds of pounds up to even a quarter of a million, sometimes, have to be disposed of by this tribunal.

50,819. Is that tribunal found to be a satisfactory one to deal with the question of damages?—I think it is. In order to complete my evidence with regard to that matter, in addition to collision work—I have been rather confining my remarks to the Admiralty branch of jurisdiction, namely, collisions—they also are now dealing with prize work, and there is a great deal of assessment of figures in connection with prize work. After the President has determined the rights of the Crown, or of the claimant in a prize cause, the registrar very often then has to consider the question of what is the right freight that the cargo should pay to the ship for the carriage of the cargo to its port of unloading, and also to consider questions with regard to what should be paid to dock owners and shipwrights and other persons who possibly have done work to the prize which is condemned by the Court. I think that, in substance, is the class of work that they do.

Mr. BUTLER ASPINALL, K.C.

50,820. All those questions are dealt with by the registrar with the merchants?—Yes. The interlocutory matters which I have spoken of at the outset of my evidence which are mere questions of practice, are dealt with by the registrar alone. Where the registrar is dealing with figures then he has the assistance of those two business men.

50,821. There are two of them?—Two. In the small cases, I believe, sometimes the parties, for the purpose of saving expense, come to an agreement that there shall be only one; but in nearly all there are two.

50,822. How are the merchants appointed or selected?—I am not certain that I possess accurate information with regard to that matter, but in substance I think it comes to this, the registrar makes it his business to ascertain who are competent, and then, I think—but with regard to this I am not sure—it rests with the President of the Division to appoint them.

50,823. Can you tell us how they are remunerated? No, but I can tell you that it is something small.

50,824. Is there a large panel of merchants who are available?—I do not know whether I am justified in saying a large panel. I think—and again I am not quite certain that I know with certainty—it is a panel in the neighbourhood of six, or thereabouts.

50,825. And that tribunal is found to be a satisfactory and businesslike tribunal for dealing with these questions?—I have heard no complaint of it either from the barrister, the solicitor or the business man, or, perhaps, even more important still, the underwriters, because after all it is they, who, in the end, have to pay the bill in respect of any maritime loss or casualty.

50,826. Does this same tribunal also assess the amounts to be paid for salvage?—No, it does not. It does sometimes indirectly, in this way: Assuming two ships A and B come into collision, and after the collision has happened one of them receives a salvage service and then a claim is made against her by the salvor, sometimes she sees fit without going to Court to settle with the salvor, and then the collision action as between A and B comes before the Court, and the vessel that has received salvage service wins the day. Then she goes before the registrar for the assessment of her damages, and amongst other items of claim she brings in the sum of money which she has paid to the salvor, and under those circumstances it is open to the party who has lost the day, and who has been found to blame, to say that the sum of money which the successful litigant has paid to the salvor is excessive and unreasonable. Under those circumstances the registrar then has to consider whether it was a reasonable sum that the successful litigant has paid. If he finds that it was, then he makes the unsuccessful litigant pay the successful litigant the sum of money he has paid to the salvor. If he finds that it was unreasonable and extravagant, then he fixes another sum. So it is only in that indirect way that he has to deal with salvage, and that does not often occur.

50,827. In ordinary salvage cases the amount is assessed by the Court?—By the Court.

50,828. In those cases that come before the registrar, are witnesses often heard?—Yes, witnesses are often heard. A good deal of the evidence is given on affidavit, but there is a great deal of oral testimony, especially of a technical character—surveyors are frequently called, and ships valuers. Take the case, which not infrequently happens, of a ship being totally lost in a collision. The successful litigant then asks the registrar and merchants to pay him what he says is the value of the ship, and in support of his case he either produces an affidavit from a ship valuer, or calls a ship valuer to speak in person as to what he thinks to be the value. Then probably the defendant, the unsuccessful litigant, also puts his surveyor into the box who gives another figure, and the registrar and merchants have to weigh the scales between the two figures. I may add that in considering the propriety of a shipwright's repair bill, which is a matter the registrar often has to deal with—for instance, if the ship is damaged and not lost, and undergoes very heavy repairs, sometimes amounting to several thousands of pounds—that is investigated by the registrar and merchants, and the person who is putting forward the bill brings his surveyor to support it; the enemy, as a rule, brings his surveyor to criticise it.

50,829. (Mr. Coward.) And would say that such and such damage did not result from this collision?—Yes.

50,830. Raising most serious questions?—Undoubtedly; and in addition saying, not infrequently, that the amounts charged are excessive and unreasonable. Perhaps what you recall to my memory is really the more important of the two, because it wipes out the whole of the figure claimed, and the other only goes to reduction.

50,831. (Chairman.) Then all the processes connected with Admiralty causes—the drawing up of orders, the taxation of costs, and all the operations subsequent to the hearing of the case—are dealt with in the registrar's office?—That is so.

50,832. Is all that work conducted satisfactorily?—From my experience undoubtedly so. I think it is only right that I should say this in order to make my evidence, so far as I can, exhaustive. I have now had either the pleasure or the misfortune to have been a silk for the last 15 or 16 years, and therefore I am not so intimately in touch with that class of work as I was during the period of time I was a junior; but still, in view of the fact that I have been closely connected with the Admiralty Court for some 29 years, I am in a position, I think, to speak with some authority as to the way that sort of work is done. I am very confident, also, that if it was not well done, apart from my personal experience at the moment, I should hear complaints either from the juniors who practise in the Court or the solicitors.

50,833. And, as a matter of fact, you have not heard complaints?—No, I have not.

50,834. Taking first the registrar and the assistant registrar, they are appointed by the President of the division?—Yes.

50,835. Is there any statutory qualification?—I think not, but I am not sure.

50,836. In fact they have been barristers?—In my time that has been so; Mr. Bathurst was the first I personally knew of.

50,837. (Mr. Coward.) Mr. Rothery was a solicitor?—I was not there in his days, but I think he was a solicitor.

50,838. Was not he one of the ablest men who sat in that chair?—I certainly can say this of him, that although I had not the pleasure of knowing him as Registrar of the Admiralty Division, afterwards I often had the pleasure of appearing before him when he was the Wreck Commissioner, and I was undoubtedly struck by his remarkable ability in dealing with that class of work, and also I know ex relatione from others the remarkable ability that he showed during the time he held the office of registrar.

50,839. He was the author of the "Parana" judgment?—Yes, and there are many of his reports which carry great weight at the present day. They are often cited in the various courts as, "This is the Report of 'Mr. Rothery on' such and such a subject, which weighs with all the tribunals even up to the House of Lords. I think, since that time, all the holders of the office have been members of the Bar.

50,840. (Chairman.) Is there not a statutory qualification of 10 years' standing as barrister or solicitor?—Yes.

50,841. Do you consider that the duties of the registrar are such that a barrister ought, as a rule, to be appointed?—My answer to that is, yes. I can quite appreciate that there may be solicitors who would be quite as capable of performing the duties as a barrister; but I think that a barrister who practises in that court has exceptional claims to the office. I use the word "claims," not from the point of view of the barrister, but from the point of view of the public. My idea is that the class of man who should be made either the registrar or the assistant registrar is a man who has had a fair, or, perhaps, a substantial amount of work as a practitioner in the Court. It appears to me that he, under those circumstances, is in immediate touch with the work of the Court; he knows what point of view the judges have with regard to those matters, and he is in direct touch with the work generally. Speaking for myself, I should say that the barrister was the better qualified of the two branches of the profession to do the work. I have known many able solicitors who, I have no doubt, would have all the necessary ability; but I do not think they have quite the same opportunities of acquiring the special knowledge which is required to discharge the duties of this office, as apply in the case of the barrister practising in the Court.

Mr. BUTLER ASPINALL, K.C.

50,842. The clerks in the office are also appointed by the President?—Yes.

50,843. Are you prepared to express an opinion as to the qualifications necessary for appointment to these posts, or as to the method of appointment?—No; it is a matter I know nothing of.

50,844. What are the vacation arrangements in the registrar's office?—That, again, I am afraid is a matter I know nothing of. It is a matter that the registrar would be able to tell you about.

50,845. I am putting the question from the point of view of whether the arrangements for vacations are suitable for the transaction of any business that may be required?—With regard to that I am in a position to say this, and, I think, no more, that, as far as I know, I have heard no complaints that the vacations taken by the registrar or his assistant are unduly long.

50,846. (Mr. Coward.) You are never there in vacation?—No, I am not there. I only put that from what I have been told, or, rather, from what I have not been told, viz., I have heard no complaint.

50,847. (Chairman.) If there was any urgent business requiring to be attended to in vacation, would that be a matter that the solicitor would deal with?—That would be a matter that the solicitor would deal with. On the other hand, the solicitor might see fit to instruct counsel to attend to it, and I assume—again I do not know—that there would be facilities given, in cases of urgency, for getting the registrar or the assistant registrar to attend to the matter; but I do not think my evidence with regard to it is of much value; it is really assumption.

50,848. It has not come to your notice that there is any deficiency in that respect?—No.

50,849. And probably you are away on vacation yourself?—Yes; I do not think it is a matter I could assist you upon.

50,850. Are you prepared to express any opinion as to whether an age limit for retirement should be fixed, either for the registrars or for their staff?—I think, undoubtedly, it would be well that there should be an age limit.

50,851. What limit would you suggest in the case of the registrars?—That is a matter I have never considered, and I really do not know that any view of mine would be of much assistance. While I can well understand that there are numbers of men of 70 years of age and upwards who would be quite qualified to go on with the work, on the other hand, my view rather is that a large percentage of men are not at their best after that age to do the sort of work that is required of the registrar, which is rather rough and tumble work. Personally, I think it would be better if there was an age limit, but what the age should be really I am not in a position to say.

50,852. Are there any other points on which you have criticisms or suggestions to make and which you wish to lay before the Commission?—No.

50,853. There is one point on which suggestions have been made, and that is, that the taxing work, which at present is done in the Admiralty Registry, should be transferred to the Central Taxing Office. Do you consider that there would be any advantage in that, or would you prefer to leave it where it is?—I should have thought that there would be no advantage, and that it would be much better for it to remain where it is. The taxing work that is discharged by the Admiralty Registry is of a highly technical character.

50,854. And the taxing is of a different nature from the taxing in ordinary proceedings in other divisions of the Court?—Yes, there are many things done in the Admiralty Registry which are unheard of in the ordinary courts of law—questions connected with proceedings in rem, and many questions which involve questions of taxation, about which, I should say, the taxing master in the ordinary courts would know nothing.

50,855. (Mr. Coward.) He certainly would know nothing unless he had acquired the knowledge since?—No, he would not.

50,856. It is very technical?—Highly technical.

50,857. It is very different from that which is done in any ordinary common law action?—Yes.

50,858. It is perhaps not quite germane, but I should like to ask you whether, in your experience, you have ever been before a tribunal which is a better one than that afforded by a registrar and merchants, provided the registrar be up to his work and the merchants able men. I am rather looking at it from the point of view of distinguishing it from a jury?—My answer to that is, no; I cannot imagine a better tribunal.

50,859. You have no hesitation in saying that?—No hesitation at all. I think they do their work with admirable efficiency, and do great justice between the parties.

50,860. Yes; and with great knowledge of the subjects that they approach?—Great. It is remarkable, I think, the way they get through a bill running into many thousands of pounds, and perhaps comprising some 30 or 40 items which, if left to a jury or another tribunal, would take very much longer.

50,861. It may be necessary to dry-dock a ship after a collision, and it costs some hundreds of pounds to dry-dock her, and the question may be whether that was really necessary consequent upon the collision. Is that the kind of thing?—Yes, quite.

50,862. And there is the point I suggested to you before, of determining whether a particular damage to a ship was attributable to the collision or was not?—Quite so.

50,863. Your view is that the registrar and deputy registrar should be barristers and not solicitors?—Yes.

50,864. I am not sure that I should not agree with you, if I may humbly say so, for this reason: The number of practitioners in the Admiralty Court is, comparatively, very limited?—Yes.

50,865. And it is technical knowledge in the position of a registrar that is required, and, consequently, if you were going to select a registrar from the solicitors who practise you would have a very small area from which to select?—That is so.

50,866. Whereas there are a great many men who practise at the Bar, a great many more than there are solicitors?—Yes, undoubtedly.

50,867. And the area of selection would be very much greater?—Yes, I think it would.

50,868. You are yourself very much engaged at the present time, and have been for years past, in acting as a judge?—As an arbitrator, and in that sense as a judge.

50,869. That is, as a judge determining many of these cases, especially salvage cases?—That is so.

50,870. I do not know whether you would like to tell me, but if you have no objection I should like to know how it is that people prefer to go to an arbitrator rather than to the Court in cases of this kind. Does not it strike you as peculiar? There is something that wants explanation?—Now I am travelling away entirely from the functions of the registrar, and am on much more delicate ground, because it is rather a comparison between whether the shipowner would sooner have his salvage case adjudicated upon by a member of the Bar, who has to act as arbitrator, or by the judges of the Division—that is what it comes to.

Mr. BUTLER ASPINALL, K.C.

50,871. That is right?—Whether they prefer the arbitrator to the judges or not I am not sure; but I can say this: that a good many of them like an arbitrator because the proceedings before him are not fettered by technical rules of evidence. The agreement of reference, as a rule, when a salvage case is referred to an arbitrator, is drawn up in such terms that the arbitrator is entitled to take any form of evidence, and to admit any class of evidence. Then, in addition to that, not being fettered by the general work of the court, he can fix upon a date which will suit the convenience of the parties. Moreover, a great many facts which are put before an arbitrator, who as a barrister practising in the court has had very great experience in the work, are statements merely made upon paper without a witness being called at all; for instance, the plaintiff states his case upon a bit of paper and the defendant states his case upon a bit of paper, and each party trusts to the knowledge of the arbitrator to do justice between the two without having witnesses called, and examined and cross-examined. The result of that is that a very great deal of expense is saved to the parties. Then, if a case goes into the Admiralty Court, in addition to the calling of witnesses there are all the expenses incidental to the pleadings and the interlocutory and preliminary matters, and it is always considered essential that you should have a leader and a junior to conduct the case, and counsel expect to be paid. If you go before an arbitrator these preliminary matters are entirely done away with; there are no pleadings, and, as a rule, no witnesses; and very often the solicitor does the work himself and does not employ counsel; and the solicitor who does it is a man who has great experience of the work, and he does it just as well as the Bar would. Those are the reasons which undoubtedly weigh with people in the shipowning world in saying they prefer to have the matter determined by arbitration rather than go into court.

50,872. May I venture to add one suggestion? Is not the fact that they get more uniformity of decision another great factor?—I was going on to say this: One does not like to criticise anybody, be they judges or anybody else, and I am not going to do so, but undoubtedly the personal equation does come in, and a shipowner will say, "Mr. Justice So-and-so on the last occasion gave me a rather poor award. I am a salvor and I will not go before him." Another will say, "I do not care about Mr. Justice B; on the last occasion I thought he was extravagant." Therefore they go before an arbitrator whom they both agree in choosing, so that they are not at the risk of having either A or B; they choose their own man, and they say, "We think, on the whole, in our view, he does substantial justice, and we will have him."

Mr. EDWARD WILLIAM HANSELL, called and examined.

50,881. (Chairman.) You are a barrister of the junior Bar?—Yes.

50,882. Your practice mainly lies in the Bankruptcy Court?—Very largely.

50,883. The Commission has already had evidence as to the number of registrars and the constitution of their offices, and we need not trouble you, therefore, to repeat the facts on that point. We would rather ask you questions on matters of opinion. The present system of appointment of the registrars is, that they are appointed by the Lord Chancellor?—Yes.

50,884. There is no statutory qualification for the office, but as a matter of practice they have been, up to the present, barristers?—I believe that is right. I have not been able to find any statutory qualification.

50,885. Do you find the results of the present system of appointment satisfactory?—Quite, as far as the registrars are concerned.

50,886. You find that the work of the registrars is done in a thoroughly satisfactory manner?—Efficiently and well, I think.

50,887. Are you speaking of the Companies (Winding-up) branch as well as Bankruptcy?—I had not that in mind at the moment, but purely the Bankruptcy part.

50,873. And, "We shall get a fair decision both ways"?—That is so. I do not for a moment want it to be thought that I am criticising the work of the judges who do the work in the Division; but I put it entirely on this ground, that certain shipowners and certain underwriters say, "We would sooner have an arbitrator" for reasons which commend themselves to them, and they select their own judge.

50,874. A fair man?—Yes.

50,875. (Sir John Kempe.) I suppose the arbitrator's decision is registered, or something of that kind?—Yes; and if need be it can be made a Rule of Court, as it is called, and enforced. It is just as binding in its effect as a judgment of the Court.

50,876. Are the Slave Trade bounties settled in the Admiralty Court. Mr. Rothery used to do the Slave Trade bounties?—Not to my knowledge. In my experience that topic has never come up.

50,877. It may be Treasury work?—That may be.

50,878. (Mr. Shipley.) As far as you understand, the first and second class clerks in the Admiralty Registry cannot become assistant registrars or registrars because they are forbidden to become barristers by the Inns of Court, who will not allow them to enter. Is that true?—I do not know. The latter part of your question is: "Is it true that they are not eligible to be called to the Bar"?—

50,879. Yes?—I think it is highly probable that is one of the rules of the Inns of Court.

50,880. What sort of reason would they give? It seems rather harsh to stop these fellows advancing. Some of them are very able men who have taken high honours at the universities?—There are certain rules of the Inns of Court which perhaps are not always founded on the best of reasons, and which are very much in the nature of trade union rules passed for the protection of a certain class of people. I am not certain that it is a rule, but I think it is highly probable that it is; and it may be that for some reasons which have commended themselves to that class of body they have thought that perhaps it is undesirable that these clerks, who are constantly in the habit of being with the solicitors' clerks in the conduct of these cases, should suddenly be promoted to these very important judicial offices. That may be a reason for disqualifying them from becoming registrar or assistant registrar. Then the reason for saying, "No, you shall not become a barrister," is that it is sometimes thought men of that class being thrown so closely amongst solicitors' clerks might have an undue preference, so to speak, and get an undue hold over the solicitors' clerks, and so obtain barrister's business in a way which is not considered desirable. But that is mere supposition on my part, and it is really a matter on which I cannot speak with any authority.

50,888. Have you practised in the Companies (Winding-up)?—Sometimes, but not very extensively. I think from such experience as I have had in the Winding-up Department the bulk of the work goes before the judge, that is to say, I think the registrars in Winding-up, at any rate as a rule, determine nothing like the number of questions, or such important questions, as they determine in Bankruptcy.

50,889. In the Bankruptcy Department the registrars deal with a very large number of cases without their going to the court at all?—Yes, in London.

50,890. You consider the present system of appointment, and the present practice as regards qualification, is satisfactory?—Speaking from about 30 years' knowledge of the court, I should say, certainly it has been very satisfactory, taking it as a whole.

50,891. You do not suggest any variation of it?—I think not. I cannot think of anything that would improve the efficiency of the London Court.

50,892. With regard to a good many of the higher legal offices, such as masterships and registrarships, the question has been raised whether barristers or solicitors are more suitable persons to appoint. In the present case what is your opinion?—My opinion is, that it is a post that should be filled by a barrister, because in a very large number of cases the registrars have to decide upon evidence and upon the admissibility of evidence, things which barristers as advocates have to learn perhaps more than solicitors. In other words, it is a really judicial office, that of registrar, to a large extent. Take, for instance, a petition to make a man a bankrupt; he may have to decide upon complicated evidence, either oral or written, in the manner that a judge would decide.

MR. EDWARD WILLIAM HANSELL.

50,893. Your suggestion is that the barrister's work is the better training and preparation for work of that kind than the work of a solicitor?—That is my submission.

50,894. As regards the staff of the offices, they are also appointed by the Lord Chancellor?—Yes.

50,895. Have you much contact with the office staff?—I have a good deal of contact with part of the office staff; that is to say, a certain amount with the clerk to the senior registrar, who is a first class clerk—the only one they have got—Mr. Bradford. I have a great deal of contact—daily contact, I may say—with the registrars' clerks, of whom there are four in Bankruptcy, and also with the clerk in attendance on the judge and in the Court of Appeal. Mr. Roper is the present holder of that office.

50,896. On what sort of matters do you come into contact with those clerks?—The chamber work in London is done in a room, and there is an outer room where people assemble, and where solicitors' clerks and other people come to the registrars' clerks with their petitions or bankruptcy notices, or whatever they may be, and they have to see that they are in order, and that they are in accordance with the recent decisions, and fill up the forms, and while one is waiting there one sees a great deal of the way in which the registrars' clerks deal with the different people who go to them.

50,897. Then it is not that you yourself have any business that brings you into touch with the clerks, but rather that happening to be there for your own business you see what is being done by the clerks?—I think that is true, but I often have an opportunity of talking with them, and if I was waiting they might ask me about a recent decision, or things of that sort. I may say that I know all four of them very well.

50,898. Do you consider that the present system of appointment gives satisfactory results?—Certainly. In my experience these clerks are extremely courteous and helpful to the members of the profession who want assistance, and as far as I have had an opportunity of testing them they are efficient in their knowledge. They keep up their knowledge of the law as it progresses and alters with the new Acts and decisions. I have often had opportunities of talking with them on different points, and I have found them always very up-to-date, if I may use the expression, in their legal knowledge in their department.

50,899. (Mr. Coward.) Knowledge of the Bankruptcy Act and the rules that would be?—Yes, I am confining myself to that.

50,900. Not law generally?—I did mean a little more than the Bankruptcy Act and rules, because very often, as you know, there are an enormous number of points that arise under the guise of bankruptcy proceedings, both of law and equity, and I find they very often ask me questions outside what I might call the clerical part of it.

50,901. Stoppage in transitu, and that kind of thing?—I am not sure I remember that particular point, but more likely about trust-property and things of that sort. I want to say with regard to them that my experience is that they do not confine their energies to the purely mechanical part of their duties. As a matter of fact, two of them are members of the Bar, have passed the examination and have been called by the Middle Temple. Two of the present four registrars' clerks are members of the Bar, and the clerk to the judge is also a member of the Bar.

50,902. (Chairman.) Do you consider that in any case persons who have worked their way up as clerks in the office should be eligible for appointment as registrar?—No, I think not.

50,903. You think it is better to take the registrars from among barristers in practice outside?—I think so.

50,904. You think that the experience and work of a clerk would not fit him for the work of a registrar?—I think not. I think I am right in saying that the three clerks who are now members of the Bar—I know it is so in the case of one—have become so since they were clerks, in comparatively recent times; they were not barristers appointed clerks, but were clerks first and then took the examinations.

50,905. We have been told that the Inns of Court do not permit clerks in legal departments to be called to the Bar. Can you say how that stands? It appears that in the bankruptcy offices there are some gentlemen who have been called to the Bar while they were clerks in the office?—I cannot at the moment give you the names of any particular offices in which the benchers have refused to call persons who held such an office, but I know as a bencher of my own Inn that such questions do arise. I am not at all sure that there is quite a uniform practice among the four Inns of Court about that. All I do know is, that the three cases which I have in mind, which I have already mentioned, were all called, I think I am right in saying, by the Middle Temple. That is not my Inn and I cannot say what their practice is.

50,906. At your own Inn is there any general rule against the calling of members of the clerical staff of a legal office?—I think each case is decided according to its own circumstances, but I think I am right in saying that the general trend of opinion is, not to call to the Bar persons who are holding offices somewhat similar to the ones I am speaking of.

50,907. Can you tell us what is the reason of that rule, or rather of that practice, since you say it is not a definite rule?—I think there is no definite rule. So far as my short experience as a bencher is concerned each case is decided on its own facts and circumstances. I think the general test is to apply the rule in the Consolidated Rules of the Inns of Courts, which exclude a very large number of professions as being incompatible with the work of a practising barrister, and I think it depends really upon the construction of that rule.

50,908. (Mr. Coward.) And businesses, too?—Certainly.

50,909. (Chairman.) Is it part of the duty of the registrars to sit in court under the judge?—Yes. There is a registrar in attendance when the judge sits, and a registrar in attendance when the Court of Appeal sits in Bankruptcy.

50,910. Is that attendance of the registrar in court necessary?—You must have some responsible person to record the order of the judge. For instance, you may have a motion before the Bankruptcy judge with very considerable detail arising in drawing up the Order-Injunctions and what not. I think you must have some responsible person to record that, and to see that the order is drawn up in accordance with the judgment.

50,911. (Mr. Coward.) Somebody to take a shorthand note?—Then the registrar would have to decide upon the shorthand note what the form of the order ought to be in case of dispute. I should have thought it was better—I am afraid I have not considered this point—that he should hear what the judge said and take his own note of the judgment and the order, as he has ultimately to decide upon the form of it.

50,912. (Chairman.) But complicated orders are in the minority?—In Bankruptcy, I think so.

50,913. The question is this: Is it necessary to have an officer of the calibre of a registrar to sit in court through the whole of the cases that are tried, because occasionally there may be a complicated order in which there may be some advantage in his having been present at the trial of the case?—I almost doubt whether it is necessary to have an officer of the calibre of a registrar, but you must have a thoroughly responsible person there. The only alternative, I suppose, would be to make the clerk to the judge responsible for taking the note of what the judge decides in the course of the case.

50,914. In some cases the registrar and the clerk are both present in court?—Nearly always. The clerk is always in attendance unless the Court of Appeal happens to be sitting at the same time as the Bankruptcy judge, which is avoided as much as possible. The normal thing is to have a registrar in attendance, and also the clerk to the judge in attendance. Perhaps I might add that I have found in my experience very frequently both the judges of the Court of Appeal and the Bankruptcy judge consult the registrar on matters of practice about which they would want advice.

50,915. Does that often occur?—Yes, I have often seen it. Naturally, I do not know what passes between the judge and the registrars, but I have often seen the judge and the judges in the Court of Appeal ask the registrar when there has been some little dispute as to what the practice is, because there is a certain amount of practice which is unwritten in Bankruptcy.

50,916. It would be quite possible in a case when a question of that kind arose to send for the registrar?—Quite so.

50,917. Would inconvenience arise in sending for the registrar when such a case occurred?—It would take him off what he was doing in the Bankruptcy Court pro tem.

50,918. Otherwise, if he sits in court, it takes him off that work for the whole of his time?—But they arrange accordingly. There is the court-day for the registrar and the time when he is sitting with the judge.

50,919. Is it the practice in that court, when the order is a complicated one, for the judge to direct counsel to settle the minutes?—No.

50,920. Is that never done?—It is never done in that form. What is done is, that the person who has the carriage of the order, or the clerk in attendance on the judge—sometimes one and sometimes the other—draws a draft and submits it to the other side. I have been consulted upon those drafts in conference when there has been a dispute. In case of dispute, in practice an appointment is given before the registrar to settle the order, and the parties attend on either side and say what they have to say. We do not have minutes as they do in Chancery.

50,921. That would seem to meet the case of complicated orders, even though the registrar were not present in court?—Yes, I think it would.

50,922. (Mr. Coward.) But the orders have hardly ever any complication about them, have they?—I should not quite agree to that, I think. Perhaps the most difficult orders that require very great care in drawing are orders which do not come before the Bankruptcy judge, but are things decided by the registrar—I mean vesting orders. They want very careful drawing, because so often the title to property may depend to a large extent upon the order made on disclaimer.

50,923. Those are matters dealt with before the registrar?—The registrar does vesting orders in the High Court.

50,924. So that has no direct bearing on the question of the attendance of the registrar in court?—No, it does not bear on that at all, but only on the point of the complication of the orders.

50,925. (Chairman.) Do you find that the work of the registrars and their officers is organised and carried through in a satisfactory manner?—So far as I have experience of it, it is quite satisfactory; that is to say, I find that the lists are properly prepared, and, as far as possible, the time of everybody is saved. The only practical thing I have ever found any difficulty about is getting transcripts of the shorthand notes, and in that there is sometimes delay. I cannot tell you the reason of it.

50,926. Those notes are prepared by the official shorthand writer, who is not a member of the office, but is employed for that purpose?—I think I am right in saying that there are three shorthand writers, one of whom is appointed in each case where a shorthand note is taken. In all public examinations, for instance, a shorthand note is taken, as of course. There is a form of appointment by the registrar, but it is one of the three who are attached to the Bankruptcy Court. They are called official shorthand writers.

50,927. They are paid by the piece, I suppose?—I think so. They are paid a fee for each case, and by the piece for the transcripts.

50,928. They are not part of the regular official staff of the Registrars Office?—I should imagine not. I took some pains to find out from Mr. Bradford points of detail like that, and he certainly did not mention the shorthand writers as being in any way part of the official staff.

50,929. So if there is delay in obtaining the transcripts, it would appear, prima facie, that it might be met by having a larger number of persons so employed?—I think so. I think it is probably due to being short-handed.

50,930. At present there is no age limit for retirement, either in the case of the registrars or their clerks. Do you consider it would be advisable to apply a limit?—In the face of the present constitution of the department, I must answer "No" to that, because the senior registrar, who was appointed in 1848, is as keen and capable as anybody could possibly be in trying the cases. I hesitate to say anything about an age limit with that example before me.

50,931. The Commission have had Mr. Registrar Brougham before them as a witness and are able to judge themselves of his remarkable vigour?—I hope I have not said anything improper, but having had a good deal of experience of him, I know his wonderful capacity and ability, and his faculties are so absolutely unimpaired in every respect.

50,932. But apart from that exceptional case, and speaking generally, do you think it advisable that there should be a fixed age for retirement?—I have had no reason to think so. I have seen a great many registrars of different ages, and I have never thought that there was any case in which an age limit for retirement would have been desirable. That is all I can say about it.

50,933. (Sir John Kempe.) In the précis of your evidence, I see you say about the clerks that from both the personal and professional point of view a very high standard has been reached. I suppose that high standard has been reached very much by training in the office?—I am not quite sure, if you mean the Bankruptcy Office. One of the registrars' clerks came, I believe, from the Chancery Division. They come from other departments I know sometimes.

50,934. Do you mean they have all been qualified before appointment? Have all the clerks been appointed for professional qualifications, and are there no exceptions in the first and second class?—I am not quite sure that I have the knowledge necessary to answer that question. I should have said that they have all been appointed either from the Bankruptcy Department itself or from other departments of the High Court. One of the present clerks I know was a barrister's clerk for many years before he went into the Bankruptcy Court.

50,935. When you say it is not necessary that they should be qualified as barristers, you merely mean what you say—that they ought to have professional qualifications but need not be a barrister?—Quite so.

50,936. Then you say, there is no reason why third class clerks should not be capable of promotion to the higher grades—that is the first and second class?—Yes.

50,937. Do you mean by that, that you merely would not exclude them from promotion if good enough?—I mean a little more than that. I have no personal contact, to my knowledge, with the third class clerks. My work would not come directly up against them. But from what I could learn from Mr. Bradford their training is such, and they keep themselves, as far as they can, so efficient in the knowledge and practice of bankruptcy that it would fit them to go on to the higher grades. That is what I meant to express.

50,938. Do you think that the bankruptcy work is more technical than some of the other work?—Yes, it is.

50,939. Therefore you would be rather inclined to keep the professional qualification up for the Bankruptcy Department even if you did not for other departments. You think the Bankruptcy Department requires rather special qualifications?—I think you want rather special training. It has an Act and rules of practice of its own, and a certain amount of un-written practice.

Mr. EDWARD WILLIAM HANSELL.

50,940. I see you say you object to open competition?—Yes, but I think you want a certain amount of professional qualification. Speaking rather of the higher grades, I think the system of nomination gives an opportunity of selecting a man who is fit in other ways as well as by professional qualifications—I mean in points of temper and management of men, and so on.

50,941. By “professional qualifications” would you include passing an examination in legal subjects. Would not that be sufficient. Supposing in the competitive examination you included legal subjects, would that be sufficient qualification if you get the best men passing in that?—Yes, I think so; if I follow your question. Now they have the Civil Service examination.

50,942. They are nominated?—Yes, but I think they have to pass a certain examination.

50,943. Yes, a very simple examination?—What I wanted to submit to the Commission was that it ought to be a combination of a fairly simple examination plus the power of nomination to select the fittest man in character, and management of men, and so on.

50,944. So you would still exclude open competition even with legal subjects?—I think so.

50,945. (Miss Haldane.) You would have an age limit for the clerical class, I suppose?—I am not quite sure that I can say yes to that. Looking back, I have known one or two cases where the clerks have seemed to go on too long—I am bound to admit that, but I do not think I am really competent to express an opinion.

50,946. It would assist promotion very much if there was an age limit?—Yes, I follow that.

50,947. You approve of promoting right up. The promotion would be extremely slow if there was no age limit?—I should not like to express any opinion adverse to the system of an age limit. What that age limit should be is quite another matter.

50,948. (Sir Donald MacAlister.) I observe you say in your précis on behalf of the Bar Council that “the present system of nomination to the post of registrar is satisfactory, both as regards personal qualifications and professional experience”—I suppose you mean in regard to the actual results?—That is what I did mean.

50,949. The present system is that of nomination by the Lord Chancellor?—Yes.

50,950. Nomination, pure and simple?—Nomination, pure and simple.

50,951. You did not mean to express the opinion upon behalf of the Bar Council that personal nomination was satisfactory in the abstract?—I thought the question I was asked was, whether the system which was in force at present, which is nomination by the Lord Chancellor, has worked satisfactorily.

50,952. Your statement in the précis was a little absolute, and I understand from you that you meant to say that the present system is satisfactory, because it produces satisfactory results?—I take that amendment.

50,953. With regard to promotion, the present system again appears to be satisfactory, because you say, “Merit and suitability for the post being duly considered, and it is understood mere seniority giving no right to promotion”?—Yes.

50,954. Can you tell us the grounds for that understanding?—I am afraid I cannot give you names, but on making inquiries I understood that there were people who had been promoted, say, to second class clerks, or first class clerks, who were not the absolutely senior men upon the list either of that or other departments; in other words, that there had been a process of selection used which was not prevented by any hard and fast rule that the senior man must necessarily go up.

50,955. Your statement is “seniority giving no right to promotion.” Is not that a little absolute—I mean, you have no positive knowledge on which you can lay that down?—I have no knowledge of it, because only the Lord Chancellor and Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie would have real knowledge of that. All I can say is that I made inquiries, principally of the principal clerk in the Bankruptcy Court, and that is what I understood to be the case.

50,956. You would agree with me in thinking that in the matter of promotion merit and suitability for the post ought to be considered as final?—Most certainly.

50,957. And that seniority should not be regarded as conveying the right to promotion?—Yes.

50,958. But you are not perhaps aware that that is exactly the state of affairs in the department at present?—All I can say is that I asked the question before I wrote that document, and I was told that was so; but I cannot, of course, say of my own knowledge. I am not in the official secrets.

50,959. I merely ask these questions because you put this forward on behalf of the Bar Council?—I hope I have answered the questions you put to me.

50,960. In both cases you made enquiries, and that is what you were told?—Yes, that is the result.

50,961. (Mr. Coward.) I suppose you have not had experience of the organisation of offices?—No.

50,962. You would not, perhaps, desire to give opinions upon that subject?—No. I think I say at the end of my précis that I am not in a position to do so.

50,963. Therefore I can hardly ask you whether you think the organisation of this particular office is a wise or unwise one. Whether, for instance, there are too many or too few men, or that kind of thing, you can hardly express an opinion upon?—Only about the upper regions of it; that is to say, the registrars’ clerks. The people that I have practical experience of come in number to about six or seven.

50,964. Altogether, including the registrars, there are 18 in this particular department?—I think so. I notice that there is only one first class clerk, whereas in the Companies (Winding-up), where, at all events at present the work is not more arduous, if it is not less arduous, they have two.

50,965. It must be much less arduous?—Yes, much less; and I should like, if I am not doing anything improper, to say that I do think the Bankruptcy Department deserves at least one other first class clerk.

50,966. Or perhaps the Companies (Winding-up) should have one less?—I have not considered that. I have nothing to do with the Companies (Winding-up). All I can hope to assist the Commission upon is as to the people carrying on the Bankruptcy work; and I do think, with the class of work they have to do, it would not be an exaggerated state of affairs if there were at least two first class clerkships to which they might look forward to rising.

50,967. Do you know what hours of attendance they keep there? Surely the number required would depend upon the work they have to do?—Yes.

50,968. Therefore it is very pertinent to ask what hours they have to work?—I do not think I have ever asked any one, except the clerk in attendance on the judge in the Court of Appeal, and I know that he has very often to work till quite late at night getting orders out. I know of that instance.

50,969. What would you call quite late at night?—I mean 6, or 7, or 8.

50,970. The registrars do not work till that time?—I do not know whether they work; they do not sit in court, nor do the judges.

50,971. Nor do their clerks?—They do not sit in court.

50,972. And you would not find them at their offices?

(Lord Mersey.) It depends upon the judge. I have known a judge to sit until 7 o’clock?—Yes; I thought Mr. Coward meant in the ordinary way; but many times they have to, and do, sit late.

50,973. (Mr. Coward.) I meant in ordinary times?—The present Bankruptcy judge has been sitting late the last two days.

50,974. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) A question on the point of the admissibility of officials in the legal departments to the Bar. You realise that that is a matter of importance to this Commission, because part of the reference to us is the qualifications to be required of people for certain posts, and if the qualifications for certain posts cannot be obtained by any Government official, however learned and capable he may be, that becomes an important fact. I understand you to say that the Consolidated Rules of the Inns of Court exclude the admission of certain professions and businesses to the Bar, and that one of those professions and businesses is that of a Government official?—I did not say that. I said I could not remember, without the rule before me, exactly what the list did include.

Mr. EDWARD WILLIAM HANSELL.

50,975. Are those Consolidated Rules accessible to the public?—I think so.

50,976. Whether there is actually a rule or only a practice, in what way would you yourself defend that practice from the point of view of the public interest?—Because I do not think a man can efficiently practise at the Bar and be at the same time engaged in the active pursuit of a trade or business, or give his proper attention as, say, a clerk to a local authority, or something of that sort. It seems to me that the two things are incompatible.

50,977. That, although he may, in fact, be concerned with judicial business, there never can come a point in which the local authority, having employed him as a clerk or official, may proceed to employ him later on as a barrister, if he is admitted?—I am not sure I follow the question.

50,978. There are certain officials who are barristers; they are appointed from outside. I am thinking of a case where an official, who is already in the Service, employed, not as a barrister, proposes to be created a barrister, and then to be employed as a barrister. In that case, after being made a barrister, he would be employed as a barrister, so he would not then be engaged in an occupation which is inconsistent with his practising at the Bar?—I think it would be most undesirable that an official of a public body should be employed as a barrister in any case in which that public body was concerned.

50,979. There are barristers in the various legal divisions of public departments who give legal advice, and so on, without practising in the courts?—Certainly, in Government offices.

50,980. Ex hypothesi they are not engaged in a professional position which is inconsistent with their practising at the Bar?—No.

50,981. Then why should not a man be promoted to such a post, and at the same time be admitted to the Bar?—I do not think I have said that there is any reason why a man who had got a post of that sort should not be admitted to the Bar. On the contrary, I was given to understand that there were three cases in this particular court where, after they had become officials, the three men have been called to the Bar by one of the Inns of Court.

50,982. I thought you told us all those three cases represented the decisions of the Benchers of the Middle Temple, which were inconsistent with the practice of the other Inns of Court?—No, I did not say anything about it being inconsistent. What I said, or intended to say, and what I hope I did say, was, that it so happened that the three cases I was speaking of were cases of persons who had been called by the Benchers of the Middle Temple, and that since I have been Bencher of another Inn I have had no similar cases brought to my knowledge.

50,983. (Lord Mersey.) Are you thinking of one case—Mr. Roper?—Yes.

50,984. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) Then you would say that it is not the case that there is a widely-spread practice amongst the Benchers to refuse admission to the Bar to a person who, at the time of his seeking admission, is a Government official or a municipal official?—No. I said, speaking for my own Bench, for which alone I can pretend to speak, we consider each case upon its own circumstances.

50,985. Are you guided by no principles?—I think we are.

50,986. All cases decided upon their own circumstances are decided upon those circumstances in relation to some principles. What I am trying to get at is, the principles which govern your decision with regard to the circumstances of each case?—There are certain tests laid down in the Consolidated Rules. If those circumstances were not complicated, I apprehend, speaking only as to my own opinion, that the principle is: Is the particular office which the applicant for call to the Bar holds incompatible with his practise of his profession as a member of the Bar.

50,987. What I want to deal with is the question what happens where the office that he may at the moment hold is so incompatible, but the office to which it is proposed to promote him, if he is called to the Bar, is not incompatible. Obviously the rule you have just laid down would not apply to that?—If he has already been called to the Bar, he must consider whether the office which he proposes to accept is one which he can accept, having regard to the obligations which he entered into when he became a member of the Bar and was called.

50,988. If the man says: "I am now in the employment of a certain kind of Government office, and I propose, if called, to enter upon another kind of Government office, which, in practice, is held by barristers," there would then, in your judgment, be no objection to his being called?—(Lord Mersey.) You must ask your Treasurer. (Witness.) I think that is the best answer I can give.

50,989. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) As a member of the public you have not any opinion as to whether these rules are good or bad?—I think they are all good.

50,990. What are they?—I have not got them with me, and they are very long, but I have never seen one I have had any occasion to quarrel with.

50,991. (Chairman.) The taxation of Bankruptcy proceedings is at present done in the offices of the Bankruptcy Court?—Yes, there is a separate taxing master who does nothing else.

50,992. A question has been raised as to whether that is the right system, or whether the taxation of the Bankruptcy proceedings should be transferred to the Central Taxing Office?—I think not, for this reason: The ordinary taxing rules—for instance, I have one in mind, that if a bill has one sixth taxed off, a certain result follows—do not apply to Bankruptcy taxations, which are governed by their own code and their own scale, which is quite different from the ordinary scale in other branches of the High Court.

50,993. You think it, therefore, more convenient that the Bankruptcy taxation should remain where it is?—I think so.

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FOURTH DAY.

Thursday, 25th March 1915.

PRESENT:

SIR HENRY BABINGTON SMITH, K.C.B., C.S.I. (Chairman).

The Right Hon. LORD MERSEY.
Sir JOHN PRESCOTT HEWETT, G.C.S.I., C.I.E.
Sir DONALD MACALISTER, K.C.B.
Sir JOHN ARROW KEMPE, K.C.B.
Mr. ARTHUR BOUTWOOD.
Mr. JOHN ROBERT CLYNES, M.P.

Mr. CECIL COWARD.
Mr. PERCY EWING MATHESON.
Mr. ARTHUR EVERETT SHIPLEY, F.R.S.
Mr. GRAHAM WALLAS.
Miss HALDANE.

Mr. E. W. H. MILLAR (Secretary).

Sir CHARLES FORTESCUE BRICKDALE (Registrar of the Land Registry), called and examined.
Mr. C. T. MUSGRAVE (Assistant Registrar) and Mr. PERCY LEE (Assistant Secretary to the Registry) were in attendance.

50,994. (Chairman.) (To Sir Charles Brickdale.) You are the Registrar of the Land Registry?—Yes.

50,995. And Mr. Musgrave is assistant registrar?—Yes. I should explain that there are three assistant registrars. The first assistant registrar is ill, and cannot be here. Mr. Musgrave is the second one.

50,996. You have been good enough to give us, in the précis of your evidence, a brief history of the office. The most convenient plan, I think, will be to put that upon the notes?—Yes.

HISTORY OF THE OFFICE.

The Land Registry was founded in 1863, under the Land Registry Act, passed by Lord Westbury in 1862, for the purpose of rendering dealings with land simple, cheap, and expeditious, by substituting a public register of ownership of land and incumbrances, similar to the registers of shares and stocks, for the cumbersome, dilatory, and expensive system of private conveyancing. This Act was of an experimental character, it being left to the voluntary initiative of the individual landowner to adopt the Act or not as he pleased. Not very much work was done under this Act, and in 1875 the system was somewhat altered and the office reconstituted under the Land Transfer Act of that year, passed by Lord Cairns; but the initiative was still left to the individual landowner, and the result, as regards work done, remained much the same as before. In 1897 Lord Halsbury succeeded in passing an Amending Act, which introduced a mild form of compulsion, giving the several counties power to accept or to invoke compulsory registration in their own areas. London accepted the Act in 1899, and thereupon a great enlargement of the department took place, the staff growing in a few years from about 20 to about 250.

Meanwhile, in 1888 and in 1891, two additional departments had been added to the registry. The first of these was a small department for registration of certain charges on land, such as executions, pending actions, and annuities. The second was the addition of an existing institution called the Middlesex Registry of Deeds, which had theretofore been conducted as a separate office under an Act of 1708, for entering particulars of all deeds affecting land in that county. Similar registries exist in the three Ridings of Yorkshire, but are managed by the several county councils.

THE CONSTITUTION OF THE OFFICE.

The constitution of the Land Registry Department is regulated by Part V. of the Land Transfer Act of 1875. It is there enacted that the business of the office is to be conducted by the registrar, who is to be appointed by the Lord Chancellor, with such assistant registrars, clerks, messengers, and servants as the Lord Chancellor, with the concurrence of the Treasury as to number, shall appoint. The registrar must be a barrister of 10 years' standing; assistant registrars must be barristers or solicitors of five years' standing. Salaries are to be as directed by the Treasury, and are to be paid out of money provided by Parliament. The Lord Chancellor makes rules as to practice, with the advice and assistance, originally, of the registrar only; but, since 1897, a judge, a barrister, a solicitor, and a representative of the Board of Agriculture have been added. The rules have statutory force, and must be laid before Parliament. Besides his statutory relationship, the Lord Chancellor has always acted as the administrative and Parliamentary head of the department. The registrar reports to him from time to time as to the department's affairs, and has the privilege of applying to him for directions, advice, and assistance in regard to any matter which is of sufficient importance to justify it.

THE WORK OF THE OFFICE.

As appears from what I have already said, the work of the office is in three divisions:—(1) Registration of Title to Land under the Acts of 1862, 1875, and 1897; (2) The Middlesex Registry of Deeds under Acts of 1708 and 1890; and (3) The Land Charges Registry under Acts of 1888 and 1900. I will describe them in their order.

1. Registration of Title falls into three main divisions:—

- (i) First registration with absolute title.
- (ii) First registration with possessory title.
- (iii) Dealings with land after first registration.

In these cases the applicant's title is investigated by us just as if we were purchasers on a sale. Documents perused, requisitions made, answers considered, and so on. In addition to that we make a plan of the land on the largest scale ordnance map. If and when we are satisfied, the title is accepted, notice is given in the Gazette for a month, and if no objection is made the applicant is entered as proprietor on the register, and the title is thenceforth guaranteed by the Government. Future purchasers and mortgagees can rely upon it without the trouble, expense, and delay of investigating it themselves. A land certificate, being a copy of the register and of the plan, is issued to the proprietor, and becomes his evidence of title. It can also be deposited as security for a loan.

I need not dwell on the responsible nature of this part of the work. It obviously requires professional knowledge and care of the first quality to prevent liability to the Government, but it requires moderation also to prevent unnecessary expense and trouble to the applicant. On the due balance of these two elements the success of this part of the work depends. Formerly it was entirely done by conveyancing counsel of the highest standing outside the office, whose fees (in addition to the registration fee) the applicant had to pay. Now it is almost entirely done inside the office, the cost being included in the registration fee. Since this change this part of the work has very much increased and is still increasing—2,700 absolute titles were examined and approved in 1914, notwithstanding the war.

This is like first registration with absolute title, except that our investigations cease when a prima facie title is established. It does not convey an immediate Government guarantee. But all future dealings have to take place on the register, and are guaranteed, and so in process of time the absence of the original guarantee becomes immaterial. In London this form of registration is compulsory on sale, and we have between 6,000 and 7,000 such registrations every year.

When a possessory title has been registered a few years, we are usually able to make it absolute on very little additional evidence. This work, though less responsible than the guaranteeing of absolute title, requires a good general knowledge of real property law in order to make the register complete and useful and to avoid mistakes.

(iii) Registration of Dealings after First Registration.

Having constructed the register of title, it has to be kept continually up to date, by alterations corresponding with the sales, mortgages, leases, settlements, deaths, bankruptcies, and so on, that take place from time to time. About 22,000 such transactions take place annually. Of these a certain number present difficulty, and need skilful treatment, though the majority are simple, and only require care and a moderate amount of legal knowledge to deal with them adequately. But unfortunately real property law is a rather devious subject, and an apparently simple document will sometimes give rise to troublesome questions, especially when you have to define its effect in relation to what has gone before and what may follow after. Moreover the Government is pecuniarily responsible for the correctness of the interpretations put upon deeds by the registry.

Thus a certain amount of skilled supervision is also necessary even where simple transactions are being treated.

The Mapping Branch.

Along with the purely legal side of the work there is a large and important branch of the registry in which a special study is made of those portions of deeds which relate to the description of the land dealt with. A precise and accurate description, by plan, of every registered estate is one of the special and most popular features of the registry system. But it involves a great deal of work in the department. This arises from two causes. One, the generally defective and often inaccurate descriptions of land given in ordinary deeds; the other, the usually backward state of revision of our otherwise admirable ordnance survey maps.

Old deeds (except leases) very seldom have plans on them. Where plans are used they often leave serious ambiguities when applied to the facts on the ground or to the corresponding portions of the ordnance map. Where a deed contains a verbal description as well as a plan, it is no uncommon thing to find them disagreeing with one another or with the land or with the ordnance map. All these discrepancies have to be cleared up before registration can proceed. Further, as alterations are constantly taking place, and the ordnance maps are only revised at long intervals—10 or 15 years at the smallest—it is necessary for us to have a staff of surveyors always at work keeping those maps up to date. Plans are required often within a few days of the alterations taking place, so our surveyors have to work rapidly and for the most part without supervision on the ground.

2. Middlesex Registry.

Registration of a deed is effected by leaving it at the registry with a "Memorial," which may be either a copy or a note of certain particulars, of which the chief are the date, the parties, and the land dealt with. The memorial is officially checked with the deed; the name of the grantor is entered in the name index, the land affected is entered on the map index. This takes about three days, after which the memorial is filed and the deed is returned to the applicant. The function of the registry is merely to prevent fraud by the suppression of deeds. It is not concerned with the effect or contents of deeds. Consequently the work is, on the whole, of a simpler and less technical character than registration of title, and comparatively few questions arise in its administration. About 25,000 registrations are made annually and about 13,000 searches.

3. Land Charges Registry.

This is a registry of notes or notices of various matters, such as pending actions, executions, annuities, improvement charges, and so on, which are burdens on land. Registration is effected by merely leaving at the office a note of the particulars of the charge, which note is filed and indexed against the name of the person whose land is to be charged. It is not verified or checked in any way with the original documents creating the charge.

1,300 registrations, 6,000 official searches, 32,000 unofficial searches annually.

50,997. It appears from this that the work of the office covers three distinct branches?—Yes.

50,998. In the first place the office registers the title to land under the Acts of 1862, 1875, and 1897; in the second place it is the Middlesex Registry of Deeds; and in the third place the Land Charges Registry?—Yes.

50,999. Should I be right in saying that the first of those three divisions is the most important and gives the largest amount of work?—Yes, by far.

51,000. That branch of the work includes registration of several kinds—registration of absolute title, registration with possessory title, and also further dealings with the land after registration?—Yes.

51,001. With regard to the branches of the work under that head, should I be right in saying that the first registration with absolute title is the most important and the most difficult?—Certainly.

51,002. In that branch of the work it is necessary to scrutinise the whole of the title to land as a conveyancer would scrutinise it?—Exactly.

51,003. And to determine whether the title is sufficiently good to be registered as an absolute title with a Government guarantee?—Yes.

51,004. That part of the work requires a skilled and accurate knowledge of conveyancing?—Yes.

51,005. And of the whole subject of land tenure?—Yes.

51,006. In connection with that branch of the work there is also a large amount of mapping to be done?—There is. The principal description of all registered property is by map founded on the largest scale ordnance survey map brought up to date by the Land Registry surveyors.

51,007. Your topographical basis is the ordnance survey, but any changes arising from time to time and the indications of the exact boundaries of a particular property are done by your mapping staff?—That is so.

51,008. Have the mapping staff also work in connection with the other two branches of the office—the Middlesex Registry and the Land Charges Registry?—In connection with the Middlesex Registry certain members of the staff have been detached to form a department, during the last two or three years, of the Middlesex Registry to identify all the lands that are dealt with in the Middlesex deeds on a prepared map of the county; but the Land Charges Department does not employ any mapping staff.

51,009. Does that department register charges on property which has already been registered in the registry?—There is no connection between the Land Charges Registry and the Registration of Title. They are under separate Acts altogether.

51,010. Then a charge may be registered on any land whatever the method by which it is held?—Yes.

51,011. In the case of the registration of a charge on land, how is the land identified?—Merely by verbal description.

51,012. No map is necessarily recorded in that case?—No.

51,013. The Commission have before them the statement which we have placed upon the notes, and, therefore, at the present stage I do not think we need go further in detail into the nature of the work. No doubt further questions will arise upon that subject as we go on. Will you tell us next what the staff of your office consists of, and how it is distributed between the different branches of the work. At the head of the office there is yourself as registrar?—Yes.

51,014. You have two assistant registrars and one acting assistant registrar?—That is so.

51,017. Can you say why an acting assistant registrar and not an additional assistant registrar is appointed. Is the work of the acting assistant registrar the same as that of the other assistant registrars?—It is, as a matter of fact, exactly the same, and his position and authority in the office is exactly the same as the other two, but the formation of the office has been rather a gradual matter. We have had to apply from time to time for the establishment of the different offices, and when I applied for this particular assistant registrarship the Treasury thought it would be sufficient if he was called acting assistant registrar, and placed on a different level as regards salary.

51,018. Was that because there was some doubt as to whether the work would continue so great in volume, and therefore entail a permanent appointment?—It is possible that that was the reason.

51,019. You have, I think, nine first class clerks?—Yes.

51,020. Some on a scale of 500*l.* a year, rising by 25*l.* a year to 600*l.*, and others on a scale of 450*l.*, rising by 20*l.* to 600*l.*?—Yes.

51,021. How did those two different scales arise?—The original first class was the same as in the Law Courts, 500*l.* to 600*l.*, but a few years ago I asked for an expansion of the first class, and a slight difference in the commencing salary was arranged by the wish of the Treasury.

51,022. As things are at present, future appointments to the first class will be on the revised scale, beginning at 450*l.*?—I think probably so.

51,023. Then you have 12 second class clerks on the usual scale in the legal offices, 250*l.* a year, rising by 15*l.* a year to 400*l.*?—Yes.

51,024. And you have 14 third class clerks who are on the same scale as the scale in the other legal offices?—Yes.

51,025. You also employ a considerable number of assistant clerks?—38.

51,026. Have you some temporary clerks?—We have eight temporary clerks at various rates of pay, not exceeding 2*l.* 10*s.* a week.

51,027. What is the reason for the employment of the temporary clerks?—They were introduced about 1909–10 originally to help us with the large amount of quasi professional work that was required in the examination of absolute titles, which were about that time beginning on a larger scale than before, and we found them useful, and they have been added to from time to time.

51,028. Was the view taken that there might be a volume of work which was not permanent?—Yes. It was rather experimental when it began, and I am hoping that soon its permanence will be recognised, and that these gentlemen will be given permanent posts.

51,029. If the work proves to be permanent, you will be in favour of providing for it by a permanent staff and not by temporary employment?—Certainly.

51,030. Those are the principal classes of the staff apart from the Map Department?—Yes, they are.

51,031. What is the division of this staff between the different branches of your work? You have one branch dealing with the first registration of absolute title?—Yes.

51,032. What is the staff allotted to that branch?—There are two assistant registrars and one acting assistant registrar; two first class clerks who, I may say, are taken in rotation, as I like to have all the first class clerks taking this work in turn, because it is useful that they should get experience in it; and three temporary clerks of the class I was just speaking of. That staff of eight persons is what is normally employed on the registration of absolute title; but, as the bulk of the work fluctuates, sometimes it may be one or two less and sometimes even one or two more.

51,033. Would that variation be in the number of first class clerks employed?—Yes, the number of first class clerks, or a temporary clerk or two sometimes.

51,034. Are the assistant registrars and the acting assistant registrar employed exclusively on this branch of the work?—It is the main part of the work that they are now employed upon. Matters do get referred to them with regard to all parts of the work of the office, but their staple occupation is the examination of absolute title.

51,035. And none of the staff below the first class is attached to that branch?—Not to any great extent. I take the opportunity sometimes of exercising the second class clerks in examining titles by way of helping the others and educating themselves, but I think you may take it that in a general way those officers I have named in that division are the only ones whose time is principally occupied on absolute titles.

51,036. What staff is employed in dealing with the first registration of possessory title and the registration of dealings with land?—There we have four of the first class clerks, who are also moved in rotation, sometimes to the absolute title work; 10 second class clerks, three third class clerks, three temporary clerks, nine assistant clerks, and four attendants.

51,037. The work in that branch is, I suppose, much less difficult and important than the work in the first branch which you spoke of—the registration of absolute title?—It is of much less difficulty and importance, although points arise from time to time requiring considerable knowledge of real property law to deal with it safely and correctly; but the general average of the work is of a simpler character.

51,038. In registering the possessory title the validity of the title is not examined?—It is only examined to a certain extent. We have to see that the applicant has, at any rate, a prima facie title; that is to say, he produces a conveyance to himself which has to be regular within its own four corners, and he produces his other documents of title, and these are glanced at just to see that they appear to be the sort of documents that such a person ought to have, and that incumbrances have not been concealed; but their contents are not rigidly examined.

51,039. You look to see whether there is a prima facie case to show that he is actually in possession of the land in a normal manner. Does that describe the process?—That is it; but it is not rigidly tested.

51,040. Apart from that prima facie scrutiny, the work consists in the acceptance and recording of documents, and the verification of the proper description of boundaries, and so forth, I suppose?—That is on first registration, but the registration of dealings, which also forms a very large part of the work of this part of the staff, consists of perusing and registering the effect of the various transfers and mortgages, leases, wills, and other documents, which come in for registration after the land has been placed on the register. The register has to be always kept up to date so as to show the existing state of the title and nothing else.

51,041. When land has once been placed on the register, is it obligatory to record all further dealings with it?—Yes, it is obligatory in the sense that if you buy a registered estate and omit to register your conveyance, you run the risk of losing it, because you leave it in the power of the registered proprietor to deal with somebody else.

51,042. If you buy a registered estate and the previous owner has omitted to register some will or other matter affecting it, has that any effect on the title of the purchaser?—An unregistered instrument dealing with registered land has no effect on the title of a registered purchaser from the registered proprietor.

51,043. The compulsion arises in this way: a purchaser can absolutely neglect and leave out of account

Sir CHARLES FORTESCUE BRICKDALE.
(Mr. C. T. MUSGRAVE and Mr. PERCY LEE were in attendance.)

any document which has not been registered after the land has once been registered?—Exactly.

51,044. Is it entirely at the option of the person bringing land to be registered whether he registers a possessory or an absolute title?—Yes.

51,045. From the figures which you give, I gather that the number of cases of registration of possessory title is much greater than the number of cases of registration of absolute title?—That is so.

51,046. Is that proportion changing? Is there a tendency to register a larger proportion of cases with absolute title?—Yes, the proportion of absolute titles registered has increased definitely every year since the Rules of 1909, which gave greater facilities for doing it than existed before.

51,047. May it be said that the policy at present is to encourage registration with absolute title?—Certainly.

51,048. And to assimilate the cost of registration of absolute title to the cost of registration of possessory title?—Yes, we have brought it now to the point that there is hardly any difference. The fees are the same, the official charges are the same, and it is only very rarely that there is any additional cost in registering an absolute title as compared with a possessory title.

51,049. At present in what parts of the country is the registration of title obligatory?—In the County of London only.

51,050. What is the form of the obligation there?—A registered purchaser omitting to register loses the legal estate. He cannot get the legal estate until he is on the register; so, although the conveyance purports to give him the legal estate in the land, that is inoperative until he has been entered as proprietor on our register.

51,051. Does that mean that if the former owner took proceedings to get the land back again he could get it back if the conveyance had not been registered?—I believe the effect is to leave the legal estate in the former owner as a trustee for the purchaser until the registration has been effected, and on the registration being effected the legal estate vests in the purchaser, according to the deed.

51,052. The practical effect of that is that all transactions in land in London have to be registered?—Yes, it is practically invariable.

51,053. In the rest of the country is it entirely optional?—Yes, except in the case of purchases by county councils under the Small Holdings Act. Registration in the Land Registry is obligatory in all those cases.

51,054. Do the operations of the registry extend to the whole of England and Wales?—Yes.

51,055. But not further?—Not further.

51,056. And in England and Wales outside London is there any means of introducing compulsory registration?—The means provided by the Act of 1897 are that any county council may pass a resolution calling upon the Privy Council to make an order for compulsory registration; and if they pass that resolution, then the Privy Council can make an order, the effect of which is to bring the compulsory provisions into force in the county, or, it may be, part of a county.

51,057. How long has that provision been in force?—Since the 1st January 1898.

51,058. Have any county councils made application?—I am sorry to say that no county council has made an application.

51,059. Has there been any indication that they are likely to make, or that there is any movement in the direction of making application?—One county council on the motion of the Chairman and with the support of the Lord Lieutenant of the county mooted the question some years ago; but a considerable opposition was met with, and it came to nothing.

51,060. Do you anticipate that in future there will be any extension of compulsory registration? I am asking about this point because, although in itself it is somewhat outside the scope of the Commission's inquiry, it has a very direct bearing on the questions of the staff and the organisation of the office?—

Under the existing Act, I think it is quite possible that in time the landowners in the country will realise the immense benefits that the Acts bring them, and will insist upon the county councils passing the necessary resolutions; but that may be a work of considerable time. On the other hand, I think it is not improbable that Parliament may slightly increase the compulsory powers which already exist, either by putting the initiative into the hands of the Privy Council, leaving only a veto to the county councils, or in some other way. I think if the initiative were given to the Privy Council, and the county councils were only allowed a veto, that would make a very great difference. There is a very great difference between a county council embarking on an undertaking of that nature in face of a certain amount of opposition which must always be counted upon, and merely acquiescing in it when it has been proposed by the Privy Council under the provisions of a general Act of Parliament.

51,061. (Mr. Coward.) There is great divergence of opinion about this, is there not?—Among whom?

51,062. I mean generally among the profession?—In the legal profession, yes.

51,063. Of course, they are the people who determine it, because they would advise their clients?—That is really where almost the entire apparent opposition to these Acts occurs.

51,064. (Chairman.) A Royal Commission sat on the subject of the Land Transfer Acts—the Commission which reported in 1911?—Yes.

51,065. Did they make any recommendation as regards the extension of compulsory registration?—What they recommended in effect was a certain number of alterations in the detail of the working of the Acts, and I think I may say they expressed a hope that when the results of these alterations had been felt there would be some extension of the compulsory use of the Acts. They said, too, that this was a national and not a local question, which I think meant that it was not really a good plan to have England divided county by county, one registered and another not, and that the matter ought to be taken up in a larger and a more comprehensive sense.

51,066. Did the Commission express an opinion as to the reasons which had produced the small amount of voluntary registration, and had limited voluntary registration within comparatively narrow limits?—It is rather difficult to say from reading the report exactly what the Commission really did think about it. It was a unanimous report, and it probably represented a combination of a number of different opinions; and I must admit, for my own part, that I found the report rather difficult to gauge in that respect; but, speaking very broadly, I think the effect of it was as I put it—that they considered there were certain improvements which would be desirable, and that they could not recommend any large extension of compulsion until those improvements had been made and their effect had shown itself.

51,067. They suggested improvements, and proposed to wait and see the effect of those improvements before any large extension was introduced?—Yes.

51,068. Have the improvements which they recommended been effected?—One, to which they attached great importance, was that of encouraging and increasing the proportion of absolute titles as much as possible; and that has been carried out to a very large extent. In my opinion, if I may say so, that is the most important point in the whole matter.

51,069. Has that produced a very perceptible effect in the proportion between absolute and possessory titles that are registered?—Yes.

51,070. Can you give us figures as to the number of titles of those two kinds registered in recent years?—Yes, I could supply the figures of absolute titles during the last four or five years since the new rules came into force, but I have not got them with me. They came now to over 2,000,* whereas before 1909 they were not much more than 100 per annum.

* The annual totals of absolute titles registered from 1909 to 1914 are 467, 641, 830, 1,506, 1,742, 2,326.—C. F. B.

Sir CHARLES FORTESCUE BRICKDALE.

51,071. Are you speaking now of voluntary registrations, or do those figures include the compulsory registrations?—I mean the cases in which a compulsory registration of absolute title is registered instead of a possessory title.

51,072. Where registration is compulsory, as in London, it still remains optional whether you register absolute or possessory titles?—Yes.

51,073. Amongst those cases the proportion of absolute titles registered has very considerably increased?—Has increased and is still increasing.

51,074. To return to the question of the disposition of your staff; we had dealt with the two branches concerned with the registration of absolute titles and possessory titles, and subsequent dealings. You also have a Central Office, which deals with the recording and passing on of work?—Yes.

51,075. That Central Office has a small staff mainly of the lower grades?—That is so.

51,076. Then as regards the Map Department you told us generally what their duty is. Will you explain it a little more in detail?—Every registration involves making a plan of the land comprised in it, or at least identifying the land on an existing plan of the neighbourhood. It also has to be marked on a general index map, and its boundaries have to be compared with those of adjoining registered properties. The labour involved in those operations is much increased by the doubtfulness and inaccuracy of the materials that are often placed before us and the frequent necessity of revising the ordnance map.

51,077. At what intervals is the Ordnance map normally revised?—I believe the Treasury minute, under which the Ordnance Survey now act, gives 15 years as the maximum time in which the map is to remain unrevised. I believe they do revise it, in fact, rather more frequently than that.

51,078. In districts where building development is going on rapidly, it would be very much behind the time before revision comes?—That is so, and it is in those districts that the need of frequent revision is really rather a crying one, because it is at the moment of alteration and change that the public most want a large scale map, and to give them a large scale map five or six years after the alterations have been made, is of comparatively little value to what it would have been if they could have afforded it nearer the time.

51,079. Would it be also true to say that those are the districts in which registration is of most value to the proprietors?—These are exactly the districts in which registration is most active, because there are building estates being developed, and sales in plots going on every day, of which plans are required; and the result of it in London has been that the Land Registry has had to do its own revising in the suburbs during the last 15 years.

51,080. Have you any arrangement for co-operation with the Ordnance Survey in that work?—The Ordnance Survey help us a great deal, particularly in the matter of printing and lithographing our maps, but the actual surveying we have done ourselves, because we work on rather a different principle to the Ordnance Survey. The Ordnance Survey take a large district and send their surveyors two or three times over the whole district, mapping and correcting one another; and it is rather a lengthy process, taking a year or two, generally, from the first surveying to the completion of the map. Our work has to be done little by little and rapidly, because the purchaser of land wants to have his registration completed within a few weeks, or even days, of his conveyance, so that we have to send surveyors on whose work we can absolutely rely and to adopt it, and incorporate it very quickly, so that the two systems would not work very well together; and we have not been able to get very much assistance, except when very large surveys have been required, from the Ordnance Survey. The Directors-General have all been extremely kind and helpful wherever they could be, and our relations, if I may say so, are most cordial.

51,081. Does the Ordnance Survey use the materials provided by your surveyors?—In the revision of London, which is now going on, they have certainly had before them, and, I believe, have to a certain extent made use of, some of the work that we have done; but it must be remembered that their responsibility is rather a different one to ours. They have to make an absolutely complete survey of every object of importance on the land in the whole area. Our responsibility ceases when we have got the boundaries of every particular property, so that in many cases there may be alterations in the internal parts of the property which would entirely miss our surveyors, but which ought to appear on the Ordnance map.

51,082. On the other hand, also, your surveyors are concerned with questions of boundaries which might entirely escape the Ordnance surveyors. If the boundary was not actually marked on the ground, the Ordnance surveyor would have nothing to mark?—Exactly. There are many cases in which the boundaries of property are not marked by anything, and are only to be got from the title deeds; but our surveyors have to amalgamate the title deeds with the map, and show on the map where these imaginary lines are supposed to pass.

51,083. That involves a kind of inquiry which is entirely outside the work of the Ordnance Survey?—Yes, that is so.

51,084. And, I suppose, it is in some cases a difficult inquiry?—Yes, it is; it requires considerable experience. Our surveyors, in the course of 15 years, have acquired a considerable knowledge of the way boundary questions resolve themselves, and they can be trusted to form a judgment and to look out for indications which those who have not had their experience would miss.

51,085. Was the mapping formerly done for you by the Land Commission?—Up to about 1888. From 1862 to 1888 the Land Commission in St. James's Square did all the mapping for the Land Registry, but that was not a very convenient arrangement, because of the distance which separated the two departments. Maps were wandering about from one to the other, and it led to a good deal of complaint on the part of the public who were using the office; so, about 1888, a new arrangement was made, and when Sir Charles Wilson was Director-General of the Ordnance Survey he lent us two or three of his surveyors, who, under the superintendence of Ordnance Survey officers, carried out the work of mapping for us, which had formerly been done by the Land Commission.

51,086. Do you find it more satisfactory having the Map Department under your own control?—Very much. I regard it as almost essential, because you cannot dissociate the mapping from the legal aspect of things altogether. I do not see how we should ever get on without, at any rate, some surveyors exclusively employed upon our own work.

51,087. What is the staff of the Map Department at present. Is the present staff 65?—That is the staff employed on the Land Transfer Acts. There are a few more returned in the Map Department who are employed on the Middlesex Registry Map Index.

51,088. That staff is under two chief superintendents who receive pay of 550*l.* a year?—Yes, 400*l.*, rising by 20*l.* to 550*l.*

51,089. One of your chief superintendents came from the Ordnance Survey?—Yes.

51,090. Where did the other come from?—The other had been in Colonial service, and had been charged with government surveys at Hong Kong.

51,091. Is that a colony where land registration is in force?—Yes. I understand from him that they have a registry of deeds there where dealings with land are conducted on a mapping basis.

51,092. You have five superintendents, 26 surveyors, revisers, and draughtsmen?—For the Land Transfer Acts there are only 4 superintendents and 23 surveyors the others are in the Middlesex Index.*

* There are also 15 assistant draughtsmen, of whom 12 are employed on the Land Transfer Acts.—C. F. B.

51,093. Have they mostly come on to you from the Ordnance Survey?—There was a small nucleus of Ordnance Survey men given us in 1889, but now the great majority are men who have been recruited since from ordinary surveyors.

51,094. You also have a certain number of boys employed. What is their work?—They do a great number of things. In making maps there is a good deal of printing to be done. They prepare the printing of names, and there is a good deal of moving about and running messages in the departments, bringing maps from one room to another, keeping the instruments and colours and papers that are used, and so on.

51,095. Do they go out and about with the surveyors?—The boys do not go out of doors except possibly very occasionally, but they do learn to draw; they are taught to draw maps. Some of the assistant draughtsmen have been employed as boys before they were given their present posts.

51,096. Have the boys a reasonable prospect of further employment in the Map Department after they have ceased to be boys?—Not very much; the great majority have to go.

51,097. At what age do you send them away?—I think 19 in the Map Department.

51,098. Do you know what becomes of them?—That is, I consider, rather a weak point in our arrangements. Their parents are always warned before they are taken on that it does not lead to employment in the office, and that they must regard the matter as absolutely terminated when they reach 19. A certain number of parents object to that, and negotiations for a boy will cease when they know that. On the other hand, a good number are willing to let them come on those terms. Of course they learn a good deal while with us, and they do get placed about in business.

51,099. Do they learn anything that fits them for some definite employment or trade?—Yes, they learn to be draughtsmen. They learn the use of paints and brushes, and how to manipulate maps and something about them, but not very much.

51,100. Would it be possible to arrange their work so as to train them for the lower posts in the Map Department?—Yes, we do that all we can, but there are so few vacancies that most of them have to go away without any possibility of our employing them afterwards.

51,101. The number of boys employed is considerably greater than the number that can be provided for by subsequent vacancies in the office?—Yes, there are very few vacancies.

51,102. Do you anticipate that the work of the Map Department will continue fairly constant. I suppose, if there was considerable development in the amount of registration, the mapping work would equally develop?—It really depends upon that. If there is anything like the increase of registration which we all hope there will be in the course of the next 10 or 20 years, there will be plenty of employment for them; but if we remain substantially as we are, the amount of mapping work will tend slightly to diminish, because as we gather the land of London into the registry, the amount of mapping to be done becomes less and less, until it reaches a minimum.

51,103. The mapping being chiefly required on first registration?—Yes.

51,104. How are the wages of the mapping staff fixed. I see they are mostly paid at day rates. Are those fixed with reference to the pay for similar work in similar employments outside the Government service?—They were fixed originally rather with a view to the rates of the Ordnance Survey, because it was thought undesirable that there should be two Government departments employing apparently the same class of workmen and doing apparently the same class of work giving different rates of pay. I think our rates are a little bit above the Ordnance Survey in some respects, but not much.

51,105. The Ordnance Survey have an enormously larger staff?—Very much larger.

51,106. So naturally the determination of the rates of pay would depend rather on the Ordnance Survey than on your department?—Yes.

51,107. You have also a Scrivenery and Typing Department?—Yes.

51,108. Does the operation of registration include much copying for the purposes of record?—Yes, a good deal. The documents that come in for registration very often have to be copied. We also want copies or abstracts of deeds creating subsidiary rights in land, and also of deeds that come in to be perused on first registration, and of deeds that have to be referred to on the register, besides typing the registers themselves, which is a considerable work.

51,109. Is the matter entered in the registers themselves voluminous?—We try to keep the entries in the registers themselves as short as possible, and if there is any document relating to the land which is long and complicated, we make a copy of it and file it, and refer to it on the register. For instance, a deed creating restrictive conditions as to what is to be done with land, what you may or may not do on it, such as keeping to a building line, height of fences, using it only for a private dwelling house, and so on—those kinds of things are very often filed and referred to. We try to keep the register merely to outline who is the proprietor and what are the encumbrances.

51,110. And where it is necessary to file documents giving further information than the entry in the register itself, do you keep the original documents or a copy?—Where the document is prior to registration, we generally keep a copy only; if it is subsequent to registration, we keep the original.

51,111. In cases where you keep the original, is there also any copy or abstract made?—A copy is very often wanted to bind up with the land certificate. The land certificate is sent out to the proprietor, and he likes to have with that very often a copy of any document that is referred to on the register.

51,112. Then there is a large amount of copying work to be done?—Yes.

51,113. Is that done mainly in handwriting or in typewriting?—We do as much as we can by typewriting, but there is a certain amount which, owing to its being the filling in of forms, or being rather irregular and difficult to fit into typing machines, is done by hand.

51,114. The register itself is typed, is it not?—Yes.

51,115. Is that typed direct into a book?—Yes, there is a special machine which will type entries in a bound book, and at the same time we get a second copy for the land certificate.

51,116. It types a copy at the same time as it types the original in the bound book?—Yes.

51,117. Is that work done by men or by women?—That is done by women.

51,118. Is all your typing done by women?—We have one male typist, but only one.

51,119. Are they paid at the rates applicable to women typists in the Civil Service generally?—It is not quite the same. There is a chief superintendent of typists getting 30s. a week, and rising by 2s. to 40s. a week; a superintendent at 30s. a week, rising by 2s. a week to 35s.; and an assistant superintendent with 27s. a week, and 12 typists with 20s., rising by 2s. to 26s. per week.

51,120. How does that compare with the scales applicable to the Civil Service generally. Is it not the case that the Treasury have laid down certain scales for female typists?—I cannot say off-hand. I believe it is not very different.

51,121. You employ seven writers in all?—Yes.

51,122. Are they men?—They are men.

51,123. Most of them are paid by piecework?—Six are paid by piecework, and one has a salary of 20s. a week.

51,124. How is the examination of documents done after they have been typed or written?—The examination is done by the writers. The typists do not examine their own work.

(Mr. C. T. MUSGRAVE and Mr. PERCY LEE were in attendance.)

51,125. In examining documents, does one read and the other verify?—Yes.

51,126. Is that done by piecework also?—That is done by the piecework writers.

51,127. Do you know how your piecework-pay for the writers compares with the conditions in the Scrivenery Department of the Supreme Court offices?—They are modelled to be as nearly as possible on the same system. Our piecework writers, on the average, earn about 120*l.* a year.

51,128. That is partly by writing and partly by examining?—Yes.

51,129. In fixing their rates of pay, did you compare the rates with those of the Scrivenery Department and those for similar work done in the Probate Registry?—The work in the Supreme Court.

51,130. But not in the Probate Registry?—No.

51,131. The intention was to fix them at about the same level?—Yes.

51,132. Is any maximum fixed for the amount of work that they may do?—Not formally, but we think it is not very good for them to do very much more than 120*l.* or 130*l.* worth of work in the year. They have to work rather hard to do that.

51,133. How many hours a day do you estimate that they have to work, on the average, to earn that?—They come about half past 9, and they leave from about 5 to half past, and sometimes they stay rather later. Of course it varies very much. That is the advantage of piecework, that when you have a large quantity of work in, you can put in a little extra time, and so the work does not get into arrears.

51,134. Would the average be about eight or nine hours a day?—I will look that up.*

51,135. Do the writers also write index cards?—Yes, we use card indexes to a very great extent—many thousands of cards. Every proprietor of a registered estate has a card to himself, and the writers write all those cards. The card contains the numbers of the titles in which the proprietor is interested.

51,136. Besides the names of the proprietors, have you any other card index in use?—There are some for the internal work of the office—for correspondence, for instance. The writers do not do that. The Middlesex Map Index has a very large card index. Every parcel of land in Middlesex has a card, and the references to the registrations that affect it are entered from time to time.

51,137. That index is accessible to the public, I presume?—We do not allow the public to handle the card indexes, because there is a danger of losing cards, but the information in them is at the disposal of the public.

51,138. If a member of the public wants to know, with reference to a certain person, what titles are registered, he can obtain that information on application, but he does not himself have access to the card index for the purpose of obtaining it?—It is not quite that, because the registers under the Land Transfer Acts are private and not open to general inspection, but any person who shows that he has a general interest in the land belonging to any individual can ask that question, and get the answer.

51,139. Do you mean "interest" in the legal sense, or in the popular sense?—I mean in the legal sense. For instance, an executor may come and say: "Tell me the titles which my testator is the registered proprietor of," or a trustee in bankruptcy may come and say: "Tell me the titles you have got my bankrupt registered as proprietor of;" or the man himself, or his solicitor, can come and ask the same question.

51,140. In the case of the Middlesex Registry, is the index public?—The Middlesex index is public; anyone may come in and look at it. That is an index that is kept in books, and that is also part of the writers' work.

51,141. I thought you said that that was a card index?—There are two indexes in Middlesex, a map index and the book index. The book index goes by names of persons against whom deeds are registered, and the map index goes by parcels of land.

51,142. How are parcels of land stated for purposes of an index?—We have a map of the whole county on which every parcel has a number and that enables it to be entered on a card.

51,143. Then the cards in that case are in numerical order?—Yes, according to the sheets of the map.

51,144. Then if I wished to ascertain something about a particular plot, I should first of all have to turn to the map and find the number that that plot bears?—Yes.

51,145. And from that number the card in the card index could be obtained?—Yes.

51,146. Is that operation of finding that card done by the members of the public themselves or by an officer of the registry?—Only by officers of the registry.

51,147. So you do not in any case give the public actual access to a card index?—No.

51,148. And you do not think it would be practicable to do so?—I hardly think it would because of what I said before, the danger of losing a card, and also they require rather delicate handling. If you allow the public access to a thing you must be prepared to have rather rough usage sometimes.

51,149. But for the internal use of the office you find them satisfactory and convenient?—Extremely so.

51,150. In the case of this map index, where the cards are in numerical order, what is the advantage of a card index over a book index?—If the parcels in the county had been from the very beginning an entire and final set of parcels never requiring alteration, and all requiring notification in the same way, it would have been possible no doubt to construct a book index giving every number and then using that for ever afterwards; but as a matter of fact the index has been put together gradually and the parcels have only been brought on to it as registrations have occurred, and the numbers have been given to them conjecturally from time to time, and certain numbers have been kept in reserve in case alterations should occur on the map; so that the construction of the index itself has been more conveniently done by means of cards than it would have been by means of books. Of course it is very bulky. Everything in Middlesex runs to great quantity, and I do not know but what in the end when we have got something like the whole face of the county covered by our cards they might not be copied into a book or books with advantage, but certainly for the present while it is still in course of construction the card system is, I am sure the best.

51,151. That is to say, the series of numbers attached to the registered cards is not consecutive. You have numbers arranged on some other principle and some of those are registered and some are not. Some of those come into the index and some do not?—Yes.

51,152. And as you insert further plots that have not hitherto appeared in the index it is necessary to be able to insert them at different points in the index, and therefore the card system is more convenient?—That is so. Another thing is, that one number will have a very large number of references against it and another number a very few. It would be very difficult to apportion the space in a book beforehand to each number, because you have no possible means of guessing how many deeds will be registered against each one.

51,153. Is there a separate card for each deed registered?—No, but a separate entry on the parcel-card.

51,154. Do you find that the work of the women typists is satisfactorily done?—Yes, excellently done.

51,155. Continuing our examination of the structure of the office, you have a department which deals with the Middlesex Registry. That department has a chief clerk, a certain number of other clerks and a certain amount of mapping staff?—Yes.

51,156. Then the Land Charges Department is a small department?—Yes.

* Usual hours are seven only. At times of pressure they sometimes, but rarely, go up to about nine hours of actual work.—C. F. B.

Sir CHARLES FORTESCUE BRICKDALE.
(Mr. C. T. MUSGRAVE and Mr. PERCY LEE were in attendance.)

51,157. Besides those you have the Secretary's and Accounts Departments?—Yes.

51,158. Can you tell us, briefly, what their work is?—The secretary gives personal assistance to myself, and he also takes what I may term the domestic economy of the department—that includes all financial matters, the distribution of weekly and monthly pay to the staff of 230 people; the accounts connected with the Vote ranging over about 40,000*l.*; the preparation of the annual estimates, appropriation account, and account of receipts and expenditure. He also has the care of the building and stores, furniture, stationery, and other supplies, discipline of the attendants and cleaners, and the regulation of their duties; receiving, noting, and distributing all letters which come into the department (about 79 or 80 daily) and typing and sending out letters. He has official correspondence with the Lord Chancellor, the Treasury, the Civil Service Commission, and other Government departments, and the care of records relating to the individual members of the staff, including such matters as leave and sick leave.

51,159. The discipline and the allotment of duties, and so forth, is, of course, ultimately under your direction?—That is so.

51,160. Who is your principal officer for dealing with these matters in detail. Is that within the secretary's department?—Yes.

51,161. Would the secretary deal with minor matters of discipline, or do such matters all come to you?—Very minor matters he would deal with himself. He has a certain amount of discretion, but anything that is at all important he would bring to me personally.

51,162. Who deals with such matters as the allotment of leave periods?—Leave is strictly regulated in quantity, but the secretary would deal, for instance, with the arrangements among the attendants as to when they are to go, what week each particular man is to take, and so on.

51,163. Who deals with these arrangements among the clerks as to the period at which a particular clerk should have his leave?—That is arranged by his own immediate superior in the legal or clerical staff.

51,164. In the particular department in which he is working?—Yes.

51,165. Can you tell us generally how in these different departments the work is distributed between the different classes of clerks?—The duties of each grade of clerk vary considerably according to the department to which he is appointed, but, generally speaking, the assistant registrars and first and second class clerks are employed on purely legal duties of a superior kind. The third class and temporary clerks are employed on mixed duties, partly legal and partly routine.

51,166. Can you say that the second class clerks are employed in purely legal duties of a superior kind?—Generally speaking, yes.

51,167. They have not any work of what you would describe as purely clerical?—Except the secretary and assistant secretary. They are all employed on legal work of a fairly responsible kind. I have already described the work of the Secretary's Department.

51,168. You say that the duties of the third class and temporary clerks are partly legal?—Yes.

51,169. To what extent have they any legal duty which involves discretion or knowledge of law?—A good many of them prepare the entries for the register; they draft entries; but I do not think any of them finally settle entries.

51,170. The final settlement would be done by some one of a higher grade?—Yes.

51,171. Do they ever examine titles in a preliminary way?—Yes, one would do it whose previous education has fitted him for it.

51,172. In the case of first registration with possessory title, I see three third class clerks are employed?—Yes.

51,173. Would they do any of the prima facie examination of titles which you described in the case of possessory titles?—Yes, they would.

51,174. On what work are the assistant clerks employed?—The assistant clerks are employed almost entirely on routine work, of which there is a great deal.

51,175. That is to say, keeping lists and indexes, filing documents, and so forth?—Yes, that kind of thing.

51,176. Do you find that they do the work satisfactorily?—Yes, very.

51,177. They are good enough in quality for the work which they have to do?—Yes, we are very well satisfied with them.

51,178. The work of the Map Department you have already sufficiently described to us?—Yes, I have nothing to add to that. I am not sure whether I stated that one distinctive feature in their work, as compared with that of ordinary surveyors, is that the upper ones have to read deeds, and to read the descriptions of land in deeds, and to harmonise these descriptions with the maps and plans which they have to make, and with the state of the ground in cases of doubt; so that there is a semi-legal element in their work, which does not come into ordinary surveying.

51,179. What is the position of the staff as regards pension rights?—All members of the legal and clerical staff, except the boy clerks, temporary clerks, and writers, have pensions under the Superannuation Act. The Map Department and the attendants have no pensions. As regards the Map Department and the two chief attendants, I think it ought to be altered, and I hope we may get pensions for them.

51,180. The staff of that department have made representations on that subject in the past?—They have.

51,181. Have you seen the statement which they have submitted to this Commission?—I have.

51,182. Without going into the detail of that statement, do you generally support their application to be made pensionable?—Yes, I do, thoroughly, and I would extend it to the whole department. You will notice that that representation is only made by a few members, and on a ground relating to their leaving the Ordnance Survey; but what I hope is, that there may be a pension scheme applicable to the entire Map Department as such.

51,183. Are the staff of the Ordnance Survey pensionable?—A certain number are, and after these gentlemen left the Ordnance Survey, a general scheme of pension was introduced into the Ordnance Survey, and part of the grievance of these particular gentlemen is that, by leaving the Ordnance Survey and coming to us, they lost the benefit of that pension scheme which they would have had if they had remained; but I prefer to ground our claim for pension upon our own work.

51,184. It is inconvenient to have a pensionable staff unless the work that they are doing is permanent and fairly constant in volume?—Certainly.

51,185. Do you consider that the work of the Map Department complies with those conditions?—Yes, I think it does as regards all the members who are there now, at any rate those who are in any responsible positions; all the time they are likely to be at work there will be plenty for them to do.

51,186. Turning now to the question of appointment, by whom are appointments to the Land Registry made?—All appointments are made by the Lord Chancellor.

51,187. Are there statutory qualifications in any cases?—The registrar has to be a barrister of 10 years' standing, and an assistant registrar has to be a barrister or solicitor of five years' standing.

51,188. In the case of the other classes there is no statutory qualification?—No statutory qualification.

51,189. What is the practice as regards appointment to the other classes? Are appointments made direct to the third class or direct to the upper classes?—A certain number of appointments are made direct to both the third and the second class, although of late years there have been very few appointments from outside.

51,190. Were a considerable number of appointments made direct to the second class at the time when the department was expanding?—That is to say, the period of 1899, 1900, and 1901?

51,191. Yes?—I think the majority were brought in at the third class, and sometimes on a temporary footing. One or two were brought in at the second class at that time also, sometimes preceded by a temporary engagement.

(Mr. C. T. MUSGRAVE and Mr. PERCY LEE were in attendance.)

51,192. Are the members of the first and second class mostly barristers?—The first class are entirely barristers, with one exception, the Land Charges clerk, who was originally on the staff of the Law Courts.

51,193. And the second class?—In the second class seven are barristers and two are solicitors.

51,194. (Lord Mersey.) And the barristers do not practise, I suppose?—No, they give their whole time to the office.

51,195. (Chairman.) Had any of them been actually practising barristers before appointment?—In the first class, yes; five had been practising barristers, and one, who is now a barrister, had been a practising solicitor. In the second class two had been practising solicitors.

51,196. So that, speaking generally, the first and second class clerks are men who have substantial knowledge of the law, and have had substantial experience in legal work before entering the office?—Certainly.

51,197. What is the practice as regards appointments? Does the Lord Chancellor through his secretary consult you before appointments are made?—Yes. I may say that, as a matter of fact, I do not think I recollect any appointment being made since I have been registrar without usually my seeing the candidate and having some conversation with the Lord Chancellor's secretary about him.

51,198. Have several candidates been sent to you and your opinion asked as to which was the best, or has one candidate been sent in order that you might give your opinion as to whether that particular man was suitable for the appointment?—As far as my recollection goes, I think there have been cases in which there has been a question of more than one candidate on which I have been asked my opinion.

51,199. Do you ever suggest candidates?—It is not properly my province to suggest candidates, but I have sometimes been asked whether I had any suggestion to make, and I have made it to the best of my ability.

51,200. Turning to the subordinate classes, are the assistant clerks allotted to you by the Civil Service Commissioners?—Yes, for the most part. Some of them have been put into that grade after temporary employment in our department.

51,201. Temporary employment in what capacity?—Several as boy clerks. If we have found a boy clerk very good as he gets older we have asked for him to be made an assistant clerk, but with those exceptions I think they have all been sent to us from the Civil Service Commissioners.

51,202. How are the temporary clerks appointed?—We make inquiries of a general kind. One can generally, by making inquiries, find suitable men.

51,203. Are the appointments by you or by the Lord Chancellor?—By the Lord Chancellor.

51,204. On your recommendation?—Yes, to a certain extent.

51,205. In the case of the Map Department are the appointments in the hands of the Lord Chancellor?—Yes.

51,206. In that case does he act on your recommendation?—In the case of draughtsmen and map department boys, the registrar selects and reports to the Lord Chancellor. In the case of assistant clerks and boy clerks, the selection is usually left to the Civil Service Commissioners and reported to the Lord Chancellor.

51,207. What is the practice as regards promotion? Promotions are made, I suppose, by the Lord Chancellor?—Yes.

51,208. Do you make recommendations to the Lord Chancellor?—As regards promotion, the Lord Chancellor has always been good enough to consult me before making any promotions, and I always, naturally, make a point of consulting my principal colleagues or any other member of the department who I think would be likely to give me useful advice.

51,209. Do you consider that the system has been satisfactory as tested by the results?—Yes; I do not think we should have got a better set of men in the various grades by any other means that I can think of.

51,210. Your present staff you find thoroughly satisfactory for the work which has to be done?—Yes, I do.

51,211. The suggestion has been made to the Commission that in place of the Lord Chancellor a Committee or Board should appoint. The kind of Board which has been suggested is one on which the Treasury and the Civil Service Commission should be represented, and also the Lord Chancellor by his permanent secretary. It would include also the head of the department concerned and possibly some outside member of the legal profession. What is your opinion about that suggestion?—It is very difficult to make up one's mind how any very great change of that sort would work in practice. I think the drawback of a committee is that you lose the sense of individual responsibility, and it is likely rather to increase mediocrity. It would be more difficult, I think.

51,212. Why should it increase mediocrity?—It is rather difficult to express an opinion. Supposing the head of a department has a feeling that a certain man who is not the next in order is the best man for the post, it is more difficult for him to persuade five other people that it is so than to persuade one. I think he ought to make up his own mind.

51,213. You are speaking now rather of promotion than of original appointment?—Yes, I was thinking of promotion.

51,214. Dealing with the question of promotion, would not the head of the department, who is in direct and daily contact with the persons concerned, be more likely to be influenced by considerations of what I may call humanity than a committee, the members of which are mostly not in daily contact with the persons?—I think a committee would be much more likely to go by seniority. I think they would be much more difficult to move out of the routine of seniority. I think the principal wish of the head of the department would be efficiency in his own department. If he gets incompetent men in the upper grades he is making a stick to beat himself with. It is to his own personal interest to get the best men well forward in his staff.

51,215. But is there any reason why a committee of that sort should have any other object than efficiency?—Certainly not; but it would be more difficult, I should think, to persuade three or four men who have no personal knowledge of the staff as to the claims of any particular person to promotion, than to make up one's own mind if one were the responsible head.

51,216. Surely a committee of that kind would attach very great weight to the opinions expressed by the responsible head and his principal officers; in fact, that would be their only means of information as regards the persons concerned?—That would be so, no doubt.

51,217. (Lord Mersey.) You mean to say that that ought to be so?—One would hope it would be so.

51,218. (Mr. Boutwood.) But if so, what is the use of a committee?—I agree.

51,219. (Chairman.) The committee was suggested, I think, primarily with a view to original appointments rather than with a view to promotions. What do you say as regards that suggestion in the case of original appointments including, I may add the appointment of the registrar himself?—I think there would be no great objection to a committee, because, as you were saying with regard to promotions, the committee would naturally give great weight to the opinion of the responsible head of the department who would be a member of it, and I think in our own case, for instance, provided it was not more than five members, and that the Lord Chancellor was represented on it, and the registrar was represented on it, you would get a very good set of appointments probably; but I should like to say that I do not know that you would get a better set of appointments than we have now.

51,220. At present you have told us that the higher classes are, in part at any rate, filled by promotion from the third class and from the temporary clerks?—They have been at present, yes.

Sir CHARLES FORTESCUE BRICKDALE.
(Mr. C. T. MUSGRAVE and Mr. PERCY LEE were in attendance.)

51,221. The work of the third class is largely clerical, and so far as it is legal is not a responsible kind of legal work?—That is so.

51,222. The work is, to some extent, I suppose, of a routine and mechanical character in the third class?—To some extent, yes.

51,223. Do you consider that it is the right system to make appointments to the third class with subsequent promotion to the higher classes; or would you, as has been suggested in some of the other departments, separate the third class and appoint men to that without prospects of promotion in the normal course, thus confining them to the more mechanical kinds of work, and filling the higher classes by direct appointment?—I think the latter is the more suitable way for our work. I think the work in the lower branches is not much of an education for the work that they have got to do in the higher branches, and that it would be best to have quite a clear division between the clerical and routine classes and the legal and superintending classes.

51,224. In that case would you recruit the higher class from among men who have had some legal experience?—Yes, I think exclusively.

51,225. From barristers or solicitors?—I should say from the legal profession generally.

51,226. Do you include in that solicitors' clerks or only barristers and solicitors?—I think we ought to draw the line at barristers and admitted solicitors.

51,227. You would not consider solicitors' managing clerks suitable for that work?—Not for the higher grades. As you are doubtless aware, a great many managing clerks are solicitors, and those would be eligible; but a managing clerk, as such, unless he was an admitted solicitor, would not, I think, be suitable for the higher grade.

51,228. Then for the third class—the lower grade that you suggest—what method of recruitment would be suitable?—I think the most suitable men for us would be in almost all cases, but not quite, men who have had some experience in law offices—the class that we call law-clerks, mainly in solicitors' offices.

51,229. Do you want the kind of experience that they have got?—Yes, the sort of familiarity which they have with deeds and the general atmosphere and operations of law.

51,230. Would men of good general education and intelligence coming into your office at the age of 18, say, without any experience in a solicitor's office learn the work that you propose for this class without difficulty?—Yes, I think they would in time, and become as good as those who had begun in legal offices.

51,231. It would be merely a question of the time they would take to learn the work?—Yes, they would take some little time.

51,232. The assistant clerks that you get at present have not had any legal experience as a rule?—I do not think any of the existing assistant clerks have had legal training.

51,233. Would the work which you suggest for this lower grade be materially better, or more legal in its character, than the work done at present by the assistant clerks?—I think we should find that we could use them for certain classes of work which we cannot use assistant clerks for—things like making searches, and comparing abstracts with deeds, and some of the more elementary conveyancing work, but it would not be to any very great amount.

51,234. What should you say to open competition as a means of access to the lower grade?—My idea would be that we should have some recruited by open competition and some recruited by limited competition among law clerks.

51,235. Among persons with a certain length of experience as law clerks?—Yes.

51,236. When the first Civil Service Commissioner was speaking upon that point he said that he saw considerable difficulty in defining employment as a law clerk, since there is some difficulty in drawing a line between the work of an office boy or a bag carrier and a solicitor's clerk in his earliest stages. It might be difficult, therefore, to make a qualification of that kind effective.

What do you say to that?—I could always myself, on seeing the candidate and asking him as to what he had been doing, and putting a few questions to him of a test character, satisfy myself that he was of the sort that we wanted, but I do not know quite whether it would be possible for the Civil Service Commissioners—if they were charged with the whole work of sifting the candidates—to do it.

51,237. You would like, if it was not found impracticable, to have that grade recruited partly, at any rate, by competition among persons possessing some such qualifications?—Yes, it would be very useful to us.

51,238. If a separation were made in that way, would you suggest any alteration in the title of the higher grades?—Yes, as regards the term "clerk"—although one knows that it does apply to a great many very high officials indeed—I do not think, in a general way, in a legal department the term "clerk" at all well describes the sort of official that we want for the higher grades, and I should like to see the terms "first class clerk" and "second class clerk" changed to something that would convey a better idea of their status and the quality of their work. It has been suggested that there should be a new grade placed above the first class clerks, with a better salary, called "Acting Assistant Registrars," that the first class clerks should be called "Chief Assistants," and that the second class clerks should be called "Assistants"—but many other names would do equally as well, no doubt.

51,239. That suggestion, besides giving them titles, which you consider would be more appropriate, would also bring about an actual improvement in their position by inserting a higher grade between the assistant registrars and the first class clerks as they are at present?—Yes, I think that is very much wanted.

51,240. Is it your opinion that the first class and the second class are doing better work than they could be expected to do, having regard to the salaries that are paid?—Yes, it is.

51,241. Perhaps you will explain your reasons for that a little more fully?—My reasons are that since the increase of absolute title work we have entirely occupied the time of the assistant registrars and two of the first class clerks with examinations of title, thereby throwing the more important work, which the assistant registrars used to do, on to the first class clerks, and I think they ought to have a status and pay more nearly corresponding to the assistant registrars than they used to have, on that account. One wants to establish a grade which would be a sufficient maximum salary for a professional man, with fair prospects and good abilities, sufficient ultimately for an assistant registrarship (as is the case with several of the present first class clerks) to come into the office. I think a maximum of 600*l.* a year, which is the present maximum of a first class clerk, is hardly that. You could not expect, as time goes on, to get a good flow of other candidates from the Bar, or solicitors, if that remains the maximum to which they could look forward.

51,242. Have you seen the statement which has been presented to the Commission by the first class clerks?—Yes.

51,243. Do you support, generally, the statements made in that document? The first point which they make is that the scale is lower than that which obtains in other departments for work of a similar character. Could you say if that is the case?—It is very difficult to ascertain exactly what the work in another department is, of course; but so far as I can find that out, I think they are right in saying that.

51,244. Can you suggest any work of a really similar character that is done in other departments?—I do not think there is any department in which so much pure law comes in; but as regards the mixed work of law and administration, I should say that the work of the principal clerks and the assistant commissioners of the Charity Commission was not very different to that of the first class clerks that we have now. You want about the same stamp of man, I think.

51,245. What is the scale of pay of those two classes?—They get a maximum of 800*l.*, which is what I have suggested.

Sir CHARLES FORTESCUE BRICKDALE.
(Mr. C. T. MUSGRAVE and Mr. PERCY LEE were in attendance.)

51,246. Is that the principal clerks or the assistant commissioners?—I think the pay of those two classes is almost the same—a maximum of 800*l*.

51,247. Are you familiar with the Estate Duty Department of the Inland Revenue?—Except as sometimes having gone there myself on private business, I do not know much about it, but I have a sort of idea of what they do.

51,248. Is the work there at all analogous to the work at the registry?—I should not like to say; I do not know enough about it.

51,249. Without going through the whole of the statement of the first class clerks in detail, I would like to call attention to paragraph 5, in which they say: "The prospects of promotion throughout the department are small. It is nearly 11 years since the last promotion to a full assistant registrarship, and in the ordinary course it may be nearly 10 years more before another vacancy arises." Do you confirm that?—Yes, I agree to that.

51,250. Do you consider that the gentlemen who entered the department have any ground for thinking that the prospects of promotion are less favourable than they appeared to be at the time when they entered?—Yes, I think they have. I must confess that I, myself, have been somewhat disappointed at the long time that we have been kept at this London work without expansion into the country. I, myself, when most of those gentlemen were appointed, fully expected that by this time we should have had several counties under our system, which would have made all the difference as regards promotion.

51,251. Would it be correct to say that at the time they entered they thought the work of the registry would develop and increase rapidly, and that therefore there were likely to be increases in the higher staff above the level at which it stood at the time they entered?—Yes.

51,252. And those expectations have been disappointed?—Yes.

51,253. Not that any expectations based upon the existing state of things when they entered have been disappointed?—I do not quite follow.

51,254. Their expectations were based upon the prospect of development of the work of the office, and not on the actual condition of the office as it was at the time they entered?—Yes, that must have been so.

51,255. The work has developed to a certain extent?—Yes.

51,256. In an office where the work remains stationary there are certain prospects of advancement by lapse of time. Is there any ground for saying that the prospects arising from that point of view have been disappointed?—I think, perhaps, it was not fully realised by everybody on coming into the office how young we all were. I am the oldest person in the office, and it will be a good many years before I shall have to retire compulsorily. The result is, naturally, that unless there is expansion of the work somewhere there will be no promotion at all.

51,257. That is an inconvenience which almost necessarily attaches to the formation of a new staff?—That is so, no doubt. I think it is recognised in the public service sometimes that when through no fault of their own a staff finds itself blocked in that sort of way some special exceptions are made, and advantages are given which could not be allowed everywhere.

51,258. Towards the end of that statement it is represented that the Treasury have given as a ground for refusing improvements in the position of the staff, that there was no profit arising from the operations of the registry which would justify such an increase. Has that argument been used by the Treasury?—I am not sure whether it has been formally put forward in an official way, but it is no doubt the case that it is very difficult for us to get any increase of expenditure sanctioned as long as our surplus is so small as it is now.

51,259. The fees were fixed with the object of covering expenses and leaving a small surplus for the purpose of building up an insurance fund?—Yes.

51,260. That level of fees is a purely arbitrary level which can, if necessary, be altered?—Yes.

51,261. Would you say that it is not a reasonable position to take up, that the question of the payment of the staff ought to depend on the presence or the absence of a surplus?—I think it is a very unsatisfactory position to take up, that the payment of the staff should depend upon the existence of a surplus in the revenue of the office, because to do the office work efficiently requires a certain amount of what you may call capital expenditure. The expenses now in these early years, comparatively speaking, of the office are much heavier than they will be later on. The expenses of first registration are far heavier than those of subsequent dealings with land, and it places the present staff in a much worse position than the staff will be in the future if you adhere to that rule rigidly.

51,262. If that principle were adopted, would it not also imply paying the staff more liberally in offices of the State where a large profit is made?—It would seem to follow.

51,263. In the case of Government offices, where profits depend, I think I may say in all cases, upon fees or taxes or rates fixed arbitrarily, is not the only possible principle to adopt that the staff should be paid a reasonable remuneration for their services, entirely apart from the question of profit or absence of profit?—I feel that very strongly.

51,264. The Commission have also received a representation from the clerks of the third class. Have you seen that document?—Yes.

51,265. The principal representations are as regards the rates of pay, and also, again, as regards the prospects of promotion. Have you made any comparison between the rate of promotion in the Land Registry and in the departments of the Supreme Court?—I have not made any exhaustive comparison, but I have noticed what people say about the usual rates, and I think the rate of promotion in the Land Registry is probably slower than in the Supreme Court.

51,266. We find that almost every department alleges that its rate of promotion is slower than that of any other, and it would therefore seem necessary to make an actual comparison in order to arrive at the facts. You have not, in fact, made such a comparison?—No, and I have not the materials.

51,267. Towards the end of that statement they refer to a scheme for raising the maximum of the third class clerks after 15 years' service. Is that a scheme which you put forward?—Yes, I put it forward not, perhaps, as the best thing which I could wish for, but as the most which I thought we could get.

51,268. Was it in the nature of compensation, so to speak, for the absence of promotion?—Yes.

51,269. That after long service in that grade there should be some increase in the maximum?—Yes.

51,270. Do you think, that the third class clerks have a case for some improvement in their position?—Yes, I do, personally.

51,271. Turning now to the question of the conditions of service in the office, do the ordinary Civil Service rules, as regards hours of attendance, leave, sick-leave, and so forth, apply?—Generally speaking, the office proceeds on the analogy of the Civil Service in those matters.

51,272. What are the hours of attendance?—From 10 to 5 all through the year.

51,273. Have you an attendance-book?—Yes, we keep attendance-books.

51,274. Are they regularly scrutinised?—Yes, regularly looked over and noted every day. As a matter of curiosity, I had a portion of them looked over the other day for this inquiry, and I found, as regards arrival in the morning, that, owing to some of the members of the staff coming before the time, our punctuality is really a minute or two to the good.

51,275. Is the time of departure recorded?—Yes, it is recorded, but it is very rare for them to go away before 5 o'clock, and then it is only done by special leave from the head of the department, who gives leave if the state of business admits of it.

51,276. Is there much seasonal variation in the work of the office?—There is very great variation. I have had prepared four little charts of the four different

Sir CHARLES FORTESCUE BRICKDALE.
(Mr. C. T. MUSGRAVE and Mr. PERCY LEE were in attendance.)

branches of work in the office, which I will hand in. They show, roughly, that in the last 12 months before the war, the biggest month was double the smallest month. In May 1914 we took 781 first registrations, that is 30 a day; whereas in February previous we only took 393, which is 16 a day.

51,277. Can you adjust your staff to that by the corresponding allotment of leave periods?—Yes; it is managed in various ways. We arrange that the whole staff shall always be there at quarter days, for instance, and the periods immediately following quarter days, and we try to arrange the leave as far as possible when the work is slack. Those are the two principal ways of getting over the difficulty. No doubt one has to allow a little bit more of arrears when work is very heavy than one does when it is light. There is also a certain amount of internal work in the office, indexing, reviewing, putting things in order, and going over old work, which can be done when the current work is light.

51,278. Does the usual Civil Service age limit apply to the registry?—I am not aware of any absolute rule, but, as a fact, on appointment, I think all the present permanent staff have accepted liability to compulsory retirement at 65.

51,279. Do you consider that the Orders in Council governing the Civil Service generally apply to your department?—That is a matter upon which I have never been able to form an exact opinion. I think Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie's view would govern the matter, as we are a Lord Chancellor's department.

51,280. The staff is all pensionable except in the Map Department?—Except the Map Department and the attendants, and the boy clerks, and the writers.

51,281. Taking the staff generally, do you see any reason why the ordinary Civil Service rule should not apply; that is to say, you may retire at 60 and must retire at 65, but there is a power in very special cases of prolonging services beyond 65 to 70?—I think 65 is rather an early retiring age for legal posts. Legal knowledge is slowly acquired, and remains available almost indefinitely. The registrar's position is, to a great extent, judicial. Most judicial appointments have no age limit. Neither of my predecessors were subject to an age limit.

51,282. Did they remain much beyond the age of 65?—Yes, both of them.

51,283. Do you apply those observations to the superior staff of the office generally as well as to the registrar?—Yes, I think the whole of the superior staff of the office would probably be the sort of men who would keep on becoming more useful after 65.

51,284. From the statements to which I have called your attention, it appears that there is considerable complaint in the office about the slowness of promotion. Would not the absence of an age limit tend to increase the grounds for that complaint?—Yes, I am afraid it would not help that difficulty.

51,285. From that point of view there is some argument in favour of having an age limit?—No doubt.

51,286. In any case, leaving aside for the moment the position of the registrar himself, which, as you pointed out, is semi-judicial?—And the assistant registrars, I may say, because they take the same duties as the registrar in his absence.

51,287. So far as the registrar's work is judicial, they have a judicial capacity also?—Yes.

51,288. Taking the rest of the staff, can you say that the knowledge that is possessed by a man of 65 is so exceptional that his place cannot be perfectly well supplied by fresh accessions to the office?—I would not wish to put it quite so high as that, but I think he would go on improving after that age. I have had experience of clerks over that age, and I have found that their recollection of things that had happened a long time ago, and their general familiarity with all the proceedings over a long period, was very substantially useful very often.

51,289. (Mr. Coward.) Their memory of past events is better than their memory of those of a recent date, as a rule, is it not? The older the man the further back does he remember with accuracy?—Yes, one notices that. One remembers things which happened when one was young sometimes better than things which have happened recently.

51,290. I should be disposed to agree with you, that if you wanted to ask advice on a legal matter the man you would go to, as a rule, would be the older man; you would expect to get more mature judgment from him?—Yes.

51,291. (Chairman.) On the other hand, is not there often some failure of energy and powers after the age of 65?—No doubt there are failures of power after 65, and there is a tendency for it to become commoner as age increases; but, at the same time, it is all a question of degree. My own opinion with regard to people who have had legal experience, and looking at the way the profession work, it is that certainly the men over 65 have nothing to fear from those who are between that age and 60 or 55.

51,292. At present you have no one in the office who has reached the age of 60?—Except one writer, who is about that age, but he is paid in another way.

51,293. So that the question has not been one which you have had practically to face in the past?—No.

51,294. Apart from the points which have come up in the course of your evidence, have you any other suggestions to make with regard to the organisation of the office, or other matters?—May I say a word on the subject of competitive examination generally, though it is perhaps rather outside my own department? For appointments not requiring technical training or experience, I think it would be useful if some way could be found of giving more influence to the recommendations of masters and tutors in the schools and universities. Competitive examination tests principally intellect and a certain kind of industry: what you want in the public service, or, indeed, in any business undertaking, is not only intellect but judgment, good feeling, general ability, and power to manage others. These qualities are pretty clearly exhibited at school and college, and are very well known to the masters and tutors, and, I think, if some way could be found of utilising the competent and disinterested judgment of those gentlemen in the selection of Civil servants both in the higher and the lower branches, it would be a great advantage.

51,295. Have you any suggestions to make as to the relations of your department with other departments?—I think considerable economy would be effected, and the needs of the public would be considerably better served, if a closer official relationship could be established between the Cadastral Survey, the Land Valuation Office, and the Land Registry. In saying this, I hasten to add that the relationships of the Land Registry with the two other departments have always been of the pleasantest and most cordial. But after 25 years' experience I feel very strongly that a more direct official recognition of the close relationship which exists between our several functions would be a great advantage to us all. We work in the same material; we are customers one of another; we ought to have regular and fairly frequent means of communication and co-operation together. A joint board, composed of the working heads of each of our three departments, occurs to me as a possible expedient. Its functions would correspond very nearly to those of the original Commissioners of Domesday, and if that name were given to it a popular and eminently respectable status for the Board as a whole would result. Ultimately I should imagine that all three might usefully be grouped together under the Land Department.

51,296. Does the work of the Land Valuation Department involve to some extent a record of title, or, at any rate, of possession?—They want to know who is the owner, in a certain technical sense, of every bit of land in the country, and we contain in our office information which would be of great use to them and would greatly ease the public in the administration of their department. For instance, if there had been a Land Registry all over England a few years ago, all the trouble, or nearly all, that was caused by the celebrated Form IV. going through the country would have been saved, because we could have communicated it to the Land Valuation Department without troubling anybody. Again, we contain all the deeds of sale and mortgage of the lands that we have on our books. Those would give useful information to the Land Valuation Department. We could tell them of the changes of ownership, and so on. At present we have no means of doing that; in fact, we are prevented by Act of Parliament. I think it would be very advisable if that barrier were broken down. Of course, the Ordnance Survey is required by both of us.

(Mr. C. T. MUSGRAVE and Mr. PERCY LEE were in attendance.)

51,297. Does the Land Valuation Department use maps for recording the properties with which they deal?—Yes. At first it was thought, I believe, that they could do without maps, but they had not been at work very long before they found that maps were absolutely necessary. It was the only way of knowing that you had got the whole of the land in your schedules.

51,298. It appears, then, that the operations of the three departments you have mentioned overlap to a considerable extent?—Yes, I really think they do. I think we, probably, are all doing work to a certain extent which is done by the others.

51,299. Are there any other points that you would wish to mention?—No; I have no other suggestion to make.

51,300. (Mr. Boutwood.) You said, I think, that a certain number of your second class clerks have been called to the Bar?—Yes.

51,301. Were they called before they were appointed, or afterwards?—Those now in the second class were all called after their appointment.

51,302. We were told the other day that in another legal office clerks who wished to be called to the Bar could not be called, owing to some principle that clerks in legal offices could not be called. How did your men manage it?—I have never heard of that difficulty.

51,303. With regard to the suggested committee, I suppose that what you really meant was, that the head of a department, if he made a bad appointment or a bad promotion, would, as you said, be making a rod for his own back, but the committee in that position would not be making a rod for its back?—Yes; that expresses it very well.

51,304. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) Your secretary acts in a capacity which in other Government departments is called that of chief clerk; that is to say, he takes the details of organisation and discipline off the shoulders of his chief?—Yes.

51,305. As far as my experience goes, yours is the only legal department in which that system exists. Your experience suggests that it is a very great advantage?—Certainly. All the things that the secretary does, I think I may fairly say, or nearly all the things that he does now, were things at one time or other, when the department was smaller, I used to do myself, and it was the gradual growth of my own work in other ways that made it necessary to find someone to do them for me.

51,306. Do you think if the other heads of the legal departments would follow you in devolving that work they would find great advantage from it?—So far as one can guess how other people's work would fit in with such an arrangement.

51,307. You say one of your writers is something above 60. Do you know how much above 60 he is?—I could not say off-hand.

51,308. As a matter of fact, although piece-workers are paid by the piece, you do not get rid of any of them if they behave well?—No, there is no system of getting rid of writers on account of age.

51,309. But you do not treat the question whether you will take on the same writer each day as an open question; you try to keep them going?—Yes, they are regularly employed.

51,310. Therefore the time will come when they will all have become rather old. Have you any plan in your mind what to do with them?—I am afraid I have not.

51,311. It will be a serious difficulty, will it not?—No doubt it is a difficulty when a man who has been a good servant gets rather past his work, but in the work that writers do it is less inconvenient than in any other case, because they simply earn less, and finally, I suppose, one says, had they not better leave off.

51,312. You say in your memorandum that the appointment of boy clerks is usually left to the Civil Service Commission. Is it not a fact that the whole of your boy clerks are appointed by the Civil Service Commission?—All the present boy clerks came through the Civil Service Commission, but we used to have some appointed otherwise.

51,313. And all the assistant clerks now come from the Civil Service Commission?—Yes, now.

51,314. You have a very large business in preparing maps, plans, and so on, and there is a big technical art which rapidly develops with regard to the preparation of maps and plans. Do you ever receive from any Government office, such as the Stationery Office, any suggestions for improvements?—In regard to the preparation of maps and plans?

51,315. You have to prepare first temporarily and then finally in some permanent form an immense crowd of plans. Engineers, for instance, use photography very largely for the purpose of preparing what they call blue drawings?—Yes.

51,316. Have you any systematic method of trying to follow the development of applied science in that respect?—Yes, we have through our connection with the Ordnance Survey. I do not think there would be any great improvement in the reproduction of maps that we should not hear of from the officers of the Ordnance Survey with whom we often correspond. Also some of our own surveyors are very intelligent and up-to-date men, and from time to time they tell me of improvements. We do a good deal in the way of lithography and new processes.

51,317. (Chairman.) Is the actual reproduction and printing of your own maps done by yourselves or by the Ordnance Survey printing office?—Partly by the Ordnance Survey and partly by lithographers whom we employ.

51,318. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) You told us that you thought in the matter of appointment it would be wise for the office to rely much more than it does at present upon the disinterested judgment of schoolmasters and tutors. Does your experience of testimonials suggest that they are invariably disinterested?—What I was saying then was rather in the way of a general observation. I understand that this Commission wishes to know what suggestions anybody might have to make as to the general principle for recruitment of the Civil Service, and it has often seemed to me in thinking the matter over, that in the competitive examination, which now practically determines admission to the Civil Service and the order in which applicants are admitted, some value should be given (perhaps in the shape of marks added to the other marks) for the recommendations of the tutors and masters in the schools from which the candidates come. That is what I wanted to express.

51,319. You do not think that under such a system—a man knowing that a certain number of superlative adjectives in his testimonial would give a certain number of marks—there might arise in the testimonials a personal variation in inverse proportion to the moral character of the tutor or master?—Well, I believe people in business now resort very much to the universities and schools for recommendations.

51,320. But with a good deal of personal precaution; they do not have a mechanical system of giving marks?—That is true.

51,321. You suggested that if your Joint Board were called the "Commissioners of Domesday," it would acquire a popular status?—I did.

51,322. Does your recollection of contemporary documents indicate that the Commissioners of Domesday were at the time popular?—I know there is a passage often quoted rather to the other effect.

51,323. (Mr. Coward.) At the present moment the estimate for 1914–15 for your branch is 40,121*l*. Have you given any consideration to what it would cost if the whole kingdom were under the Land Registry Act?—Yes, I have—not very recently, but from time to time I have gone into it. Of course it would have to be with certain improvements in detail, and perhaps slight alterations in the organisation. I cannot quite remember what figure I brought it out at, but I could put it into the notes if you would like to have it. Roughly speaking, I should estimate the work would be about seven times the work that we do; so that the total estimates would be well within seven times the present estimate. That is very roughly so.

51,324. I notice that the number of boys employed was 19 in 1913-14, and it is eight this year. It would interest me to know how it comes about that there is so great a divergence?—The reason was partly that we found that we were having too much responsible work given to boys, and we had to level it up a little, and as they left we had assistant clerks instead.

51,325. With regard to the female typists, is it not your experience that they are excellent?—Certainly.

51,326. I should say they are better than the men?—I have no experience of employing men typists, so I could not compare them, but I have nothing whatever to suggest in the way of improvement.

51,327. (Chairman.) With reference to Mr. Coward's question, did you state in evidence before the Commission on the Land Transfer Acts, that the cost of the establishment for dealing with land registration all over the country—which, I suppose, means all over England and Wales—would be from 300,000*l.* to 400,000*l.* a year. I am reading from the Report and not from the evidence?—I should like to refer to the passage myself, and see quite in what sense the estimate had been made, because there are so many ways of estimating.

51,328. (Sir John Kempe.) With regard to your suggestion that you should have closer relations with two other offices, of course the Land Valuation Department is entirely a revenue department; that is its main object?—Its main object at the present moment is revenue.

51,329. Your only common ground is that you both have to keep a register of all the properties in the kingdom?—That is our principal common ground.

51,330. That is the only common ground. You do not have anything to do with the valuation or the revenue?—Except that valuation touches us a little because our fees are according to value, and we might sometimes find it useful to know the value of land.

51,331. Still you would not value the whole country for that purpose?—Certainly not.

51,332. Your relations could not come into conjunction until you have registered the whole country. Pieces are no use to the Land Valuation Department, they must have the whole country?—In London we have been of use to them already, and in Middlesex also. We have been able to supply them with revised maps, for instance, which they very much wanted. We could, if we had been at liberty to give to them the information, have supplied them with the names of the owners of a large quantity of land in that county, which would have been useful to them.

51,333. You said you might have an opportunity of working in common, and in time you thought you might take over the whole of the department.* That, of course, would leave the revenue in the hands of the Inland Revenue, and you would be the sole authority in the kingdom for keeping a register of the whole of the property. The valuation would have to be made by a separate body?—Yes, but I think it would have an advantage in one way if the valuation was not a part of the Inland Revenue, because it would give it a greater independence.

51,334. The Inland Revenue, you mean, would be able to trust a separate body to do the valuation rather than their own staff?—I mean, sometimes I have heard it said that the Valuation Department, to make a branch of the Inland Revenue, is really making the Inland Revenue a judge in their own case. Now, if the Valuation Department were separated from the Inland Revenue, and made part of a purely statistical Land Department, it would, in some cases, I think, be in a better position.

51,335. You have no facilities for getting the values in the way you go to work?—In this sense we have—that we see all the sales. The value is given on all sales.

51,336. I am afraid the Inland Revenue do not go upon sales?—Not exclusively, no.

51,337. Your proposal in regard to the staff is, that you should treat the upper part of the staff as professionals, so to speak, and the lower part as clerks, more or less?—Yes.

51,338. In the course of your evidence you said that now and then you give to the third class clerks—the lower class of clerk—work of more importance than the mere mechanical work. Is that only to those of the third class who have the right of rising? Could you cut them off altogether if you had two separate branches, one professional and one clerical?—I think if they were all originally recruited with that idea we could. The present third class clerks were recruited with the idea that they would become second and first class clerks, so that one could not, without injustice to the individuals who are now third class clerks, cut them off from the higher work; but my proposal with regard to future appointments is, that we should have two grades clearly divided.

51,339. You are quite clear that you could divide them absolutely? The great difficulty in the Civil Service has been the overlapping, from the very beginning, dating from the old copyist days. There is always the difficulty of overlapping, which gives a claim to clerks who are employed on higher work than they ought to be employed upon. Do you think that you could get rid of that in your office, and you could have a clear professional staff and a clear clerical staff?—I think the nature of our work divides very clearly into those two branches. I do not say that transfers from one to the other in exceptional cases might not sometimes be useful and possible, but it ought not to be an understood thing.

51,340. A man doing lower work, and given opportunity to display himself by doing higher work, immediately finds hopes upon that, and it extends to the whole class, and they all think they have a chance of rising?—It would be very rare.

51,341. You think your work is sufficiently distinct in the two branches to be able to avoid that?—I think so.

51,342. (Mr. Shipley.) A word or two about the suggestion on page 22 of your précis. You say you think it would be a good thing to give more influence to the recommendations of masters and tutors in the schools and universities. I was wondering what sort of posts they could fill. Would they be the first and second class clerks whom you would get from the universities?—I was speaking here of appointments not requiring technical training.

51,343. Not barristers?—No.

51,344. Would it be likely to attract university men? Is the salary sufficient? Some university men are very glad to get anything?—I include masters of schools and tutors in universities; so the idea would apply to every class of appointment.

51,345. Do you in effect take any measures to bribe before the notice of masters and tutors any vacancies?—It has not been my department to do that; we take our appointments from the Lord Chancellor.

51,346. Do you think he takes any such measures?—The initiative is not with us.

51,347. Do you think the Lord Chancellor or his secretary brings these vacancies before the various Appointment Boards which are connected with the various universities now?—This suggestion I make would involve that.

51,348. You say it would be a good thing to have closer relationships between the Land Valuation Office, the Land Registry, and the Cadastral Survey. What is the Cadastral Survey?—That is the large scale ordnance maps from 6 inches to the mile upwards—25 inch and 5 feet and 10 feet to the mile.

* My suggestion was in fact merely that closer relations should be established between the three departments [51,295]. C. F. B.

Sir CHARLES FORTESCUE BRICKDALE.
(Mr. C. T. MUSGRAVE and Mr. PERCY LEE were in attendance.)

51,349. That practically covers the Ordnance Survey?—It covers that, except the one mile to the inch—and other military and topographical maps and various special works of different kinds.

51,350. Is not the Ordnance Survey an army affair?—Yes, it is, I believe, entirely officered by Royal Engineer officers, but it is under the Board of Agriculture, so far as administration goes. It began with the War Office, but was transferred to the Board of Agriculture.

51,351. (Chairman.) Has it any military character now, except the fact that the superior officers in it are military officers?—Yes, and there is a strong military tradition in the administration of it. Mr. Musgrave has reminded me that one must not forget that the Ordnance Survey is very largely wanted for military purposes. It has to provide an enormous amount of information which nobody wants but the Army, such as the size of churches, wells, forges, and the things that an army wants to know about when going over the country.

51,352. (Mr. Shipley.) Is your office in the Law Courts?—It is in Lincoln's Inn Fields, just outside Lincoln's Inn. It is a separate building, built during the last ten years.

51,353. Is it pretty well up to date and well ventilated?—Yes, we feel that it is very comfortable and healthy, and it is rather roomy.

51,354. (Mr. Matheson.) It has been one of the objects of this Commission to get rid of boy labour that does not lead to any subsequent career. Have you thought at all whether in your Map Department it would be possible to reduce the number of boys to the number that could be absorbed in the higher ranks. Would it be possible to get the fetching and carrying done by retired soldiers, and then only employ enough boys to fill the places of draughtsmen as time went on?—I think it would be quite possible. Of course, it is recognised that it would be more expensive.

51,355. It would have to be rather more expensive?—Yes, it would cost more, but it would be quite possible to employ attendants to do that work.

51,356. The 22 boys you have at present is not an excessive number for the work that has to be done?—It is the cheapest way of getting the work done. It is a class of work which is very easily learnt, and for which boys are very suitable.

51,357. Elementary map work?—Yes, they do a little drawing, but mainly they go messages, keep papers in order, and make themselves generally useful.

51,358. But you think the work might be dealt with in the way I have suggested, possibly, if rather more money was spent?—Yes, it could be done by attendants certainly.

51,359. You have already been asked about the second class clerks. I was not quite clear from your answer whether all your second class clerks are persons who have qualified as solicitors or as barristers?—Not quite all, but very nearly all—all but three.

51,360. You think that qualification it is desirable so far as possible to retain?—In the large majority of cases it is desirable, but one of those three is the secretary, and he does not require legal technical knowledge.

51,361. (Sir Donald MacAlister.) I understand that your clerks as at present appointed all have the expectation that they will be considered for promotion right up to the top of the office?—Those who came in as third class clerks had no doubt a feeling that the career before them was substantially much the same as that in the Supreme Court, and a clerk in the Supreme Court has a reasonable expectation of becoming a first class clerk.

51,362. And assistant registrar?—There, I think, it is not quite so certain, but at any rate, up to the first class, there is reasonable expectation in the regular course of promotion in time.

51,363. Is the work of the first class clerk to which the third class clerk might aspire essentially different from that of an assistant registrar?—The assistant registrar has to have a qualification under the Act.

51,364. I asked you, is the work essentially different?—I think it is rather a question of degree than of any essential difference. One wants a higher degree of efficiency in an assistant registrar

51,365. Apart from the qualification you have referred to, a first class clerk might perfectly well perform the duties of assistant registrar if he was otherwise eligible?—Yes.

51,366. Are you in favour of retaining the statutory qualification for assistant registrar?—As a matter of fact, the assistant registrars have generally got considerably higher qualifications than the statutory one, and I think practically always, by the time a man comes to be an assistant registrar, he has a great deal more than five years' standing at the Bar. I think it is a good thing to keep up that amount of statutory qualification in the higher offices.

51,367. It means that the assistant registrar must in all cases be appointed from the outside?—No, not necessarily; in fact, they seldom have been, because there are usually men with that qualification already in the office.

51,368. With the qualification of solicitor or barrister?—Yes.

51,369. Did I understand you to say that you have not experienced any difficulty in regard to your staff in their acquiring that qualification while they are in junior positions?—What I tried to convey was that the junior work is not of a character to teach men the superior work.

51,370. I am speaking of the statutory qualification. The position of barrister can be acquired by some of your clerks?—Men can be called to the Bar from the office, yes.

51,371. And that constitutes the qualification?—To be called to the Bar.

51,372. To become assistant registrar?—The statutory qualification, yes.

51,373. So that a second class clerk, if there was no difficulty in the way, might be called to the Bar while he was a second class clerk, and thus possess all the statutory qualifications required for the post of assistant registrar?—Yes, he might do that.

51,374. So being called to the Bar is rather a technical than a real qualification?—It is rather.

51,375. It does not involve any practice as a barrister?—It is not necessary. He is not by the Act obliged to have any practice, but I should think as a general rule a man would be unlikely to be appointed an assistant registrar who had not had practice, but there I am trenching on what is a matter for the Lord Chancellor.

51,376. (Mr. Coward.) He has to pass the examinations?—Yes.

51,377. (Sir Donald MacAlister.) He has to pass those examinations while a second or third class clerk, and when called to the Bar he retains that, so to speak, latent qualification which he never uses, and at some time, when the question of appointing an assistant registrar comes up, he produces the qualification?—Yes.

51,378. But it never has been put to any use in practice?—Not in that sense.

51,379. So it seems rather a technical qualification, except for the fact that it involves his having studied and passed the examinations?—Yes.

51,380. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) The fees are quite real from the point of view of a second class clerk?—Yes.

51,381. (Sir Donald MacAlister.) The fees are more than technical?—Yes.

51,382. You spoke of the question of promotion, which has not been a very active question in your department, because not very much promotion has taken place of late years?—Not of late years.

51,383. You make a somewhat striking suggestion that, of course, ability should be the first consideration, but that seniority should come a very good second?—Yes, that is my feeling, broadly.

51,384. There has never been a case in your office where seniority has not been allowed to count in deciding the question?—Other things being equal, seniority would, of course, count.

51,385. The other things would, however, always be equal?—A very large proportion of our promotions have been by selection and not by seniority.

Sir CHARLES FORTESCUE BRICKDALE.
(Mr. C. T. MUSGRAVE and Mr. PERCY LEE were in attendance.)

51,386. Do you mean that the senior has been passed over?—Yes, there have been a good many cases of that.

51,387. In your own office?—Yes.

51,388. But when a man has been passed over once you would hesitate to pass him over a second time?—Yes. One does not want to pass over a man too often if he has got any good in him at all.

51,389. Seniority then must play a very strong part in your consideration. If a man is not good enough to be promoted to a vacant office, it practically means that you only postpone him, and he is quite certain of being promoted later?—I think I might say that there have been one or two who several times have been passed over and are likely to be always passed over, in regard to my recommendation, at any rate.

51,390. One would not have gathered that by reading your précis?—I am glad to have the opportunity of correcting it.

51,391. (Miss Haldane.) I gather that the only women employed in your office are typists, and I want to know whether you think women might suitably be employed in other capacities in your office?—I have not considered the matter very carefully until just recently in connection with the war. I have been considering whether, at any rate, now—and it might, of course, be carried on afterwards—certain departments might employ women with advantage.

51,392. Have you taken any other steps beyond considering the matter with regard to employing women? Have you employed any women as yet?—We have not yet got to it, but I am at this very moment intending in a few days' time to make inquiries as to the terms on which we could employ women.

51,393. I understand this is a very pressing matter at this particular time, but I want to know in what capacity you would anticipate employing women—as third class clerks?—I think one would begin them with duties that did not require technical education, so I believe it would be rather in the simpler and more routine kind of work.

51,394. I suppose they could do the work of third class clerks without very much instruction, they would soon learn?—It would be that type of work and that of an assistant clerk.

51,395. Supposing there are no technical objections, do you think they could be suitably employed as third class clerks?—I see no objection in principle.

51,396. Indexing, and so on, is not done by women at present?—No, not at all.

51,397. That is work, I suppose, that women could do well?—I should think so.

51,398. Then as regards mapping, is not a good deal of map work done in outside firms by women?—I think I have heard of it being done by women—drawing perhaps rather than surveying. The copying of maps I think is done by women in business.

51,399. Then as regards the boys, do those boys attend evening schools or in any way carry on their education?—The boys and the assistant clerks have for a long time been in the habit of going to colleges and places of that sort, where they are prepared for higher examinations, and recently, at the suggestion of the London County Council, we have started an evening class for such of the boys and younger members of the staff as are willing to join it, and are not having any other courses of education.

51,400. So that you make it practically compulsory for them to go on with their education in some form or another?—Not exactly compulsory, but we give them every facility for doing it.

51,401. Otherwise, it seems rather a blind-alley occupation?—Yes, the occupation of a boy in the Map Department is of that nature. Their parents are told before they are engaged that we do not see much chance of providing them with work afterwards ourselves, and that they must look to what they can get outside in the world.

51,402. The writers you employ on piecework are all men?—Yes, all men.

51,403. Do you give out no work to women?—No, there is no work given out.

51,404. Is there any particular reason for that, or is that just from custom?—Only from custom.

51,405. I think you only employ one male typist?—That is so.

51,406. And that, I suppose, is somewhat accidental?—I think it is because he is wanted in a room where only men are employed, and, so far, we have kept the staff of women in separate rooms by themselves.

Mr. ARTHUR DENMAN (Clerk of Assize of the South Eastern Circuit), called and examined.

51,407. (Chairman.) You are Clerk of Assize of the South Eastern Circuit?—Yes.

51,408. How long have you held that office?—Twenty-seven years, less one month.

51,409. You are the senior of the clerks of assize?—Yes, I have that honour.

51,410. How many clerks of assize are there altogether?—There are seven circuits and eight clerks of assize; that is to say, the North and South Wales Circuit is divided into two divisions, each of which has a clerk of assize, and therefore there are eight clerks of assize.

51,411. Their salaries are fixed on the scale recommended by the Committee of 1887?—That is so. The salary of the clerk of assize of the Northern Circuit is 1,000*l.*; the salary of the clerk of assize of all the other circuits, excepting the Welsh Circuit, is 800*l.*, and the salaries of each of the clerks of assize of the Welsh divisions is 500*l.*

51,412. What other officers are there on each circuit subordinate to the clerks of assize?—There are two officers subordinate to the clerk of assize. The officers are really deputies; that is to say, in the clerk of assize are embodied all the offices of "clerk of the Crown, associate, clerk of indictments, and clerk of arraigns, and any other office the duties of which are performed by the clerk of assize." That is by Section 8 of the Clerks of Assize Act, 1869. There are actually two subordinate officers and one bailiff.

51,413. The subordinate officers being termed "Associate" and "Clerk of Indictments"?—Yes. They are variously termed on different circuits, but inaccurately other than that. The duties originally were performed by a clerk of indictments, an associate, and a taxing officer. On the reduction of the staff, those duties had to be distributed according to the necessities of the case. There is no such officer now as a taxing officer, but the duties of the taxing officer are performed indifferently, and as occasion may require, by one or other of the officers. Therefore, there is the clerk of assize and his two officers; and he puts upon them, with consideration, such duties as are required to be performed.

51,414. The two officers are differently designated on different circuits?—They are usually called "Clerk of Indictments" and "Associate."

51,415. They act as deputies to the clerk of assize and perform certain parts of the work?—They do not act as deputies except under special appointment. All the official documents have to be signed by the clerk of assize, and one particular thing—a certificate of indictment found, which has to be signed by the clerk of indictments—is signed by the clerk of assize as clerk of indictments. As I explained, the clerk of assize is clerk of indictments, he is associate, he is clerk of the Crown, and all those things in his office; but these particular officers are primarily designated by the names of the offices which they hold.

51,416. The salary of those officers does not rise above a maximum of 300*l.* a year?—Except that I find in Whitaker's Almanack, that on the Northern Circuit the associate gets 500*l.* Of course the Northern Circuit is different; they have, I think, four civil assizes, and I understand that the civil work is very much heavier on it than on any other circuit.

Mr. ARTHUR DENMAN.

51,417. There appear to be certain cases in which the officers have salaries exceeding 300*l.* a year, but those salaries are to be reduced on the next vacancy?—I did not know that. I can only speak for my own circuit first hand. The subordinate officers start at 200*l.* a year, and rise by 20*l.* a year to 300*l.* a year, which, I take this opportunity of saying, is to my mind wholly inadequate.

51,418. Is the clerk of assize required to give his whole time to the duties of his office?—During circuit he is exceedingly busy, and his is very responsible work. In between circuits he has to see that the work is done, but there is no regular attendance required, or anything of that sort. As long as the work is done and goes right, he has no further responsibility; I mean he is not an officer of the High Court of Justice.

51,419. How much of the year do the circuits occupy?—I gave evidence before the Royal Commission on Legal Delay, and I worked out that the actual days occupied from the start of the circuits in the years 1910–11–12, were 171, 175 and 171—that is five months and 22 days of the year. There is, of course, the Long Vacation. Before each circuit, certainly for a fortnight, the clerk of assize is very busy, and after circuit, especially now that the Criminal Appeal Act is in force, he is also busy. At other times there is something to be done every day throughout the year, but his attendance at regular hours is not, of course, required; still he must have clerks or keep officers there.

51,420. Has he an office in London?—Yes, we all have chambers. One, Mr. Stephen Coleridge, has an office at the Royal Courts of Justice; the others have chambers.

51,421. Do you have to provide those yourself?—My own case is very exceptional. When I was appointed there was a question of amalgamating the two divisions of the circuit, and my predecessor, who had 95*l.* a year, was succeeded by myself, and they reduced the salary to 300*l.* in 1887, and, in consideration of that very big drop, they allowed me chambers. On my own circuit I am doing the work for which, the day before I was appointed, the salary was 1,853*l.* for 800*l.*, so there has been a very considerable saving.

51,422. Speaking generally, apart from that exceptional case, the clerks of assize are not provided with offices?—I believe the clerk of assize for the North-Eastern Circuit has an allowance of 50*l.* My allowance, I think, is 70*l.*, and 25*l.* for postage, so I get about 95*l.* altogether. The clerk of assize to the Western Circuit has 50*l.*, and of the Oxford Circuit 50*l.*

51,423. That is an allowance for office expenses?—Yes; office and postage. I should say that mine is exceeded considerably nearly every year.

51,424. Where are your records kept?—Those were, I hope, admirably kept. I had them chronologically arranged since 1700, and I had them all down in my basement at chambers in perfect order. The Public Record Office took them over about two years ago. I believe some of them were pulped; those up to 20 years ago are now in the Public Record Office.

51,425. The records of the last 20 years you keep still in your own chambers?—They have to go to the Record Office every 10 years. I have them for the last 15 years—I forget exactly what the arrangement is. I have not them for more than 20 years, certainly.

51,426. Does the same arrangement apply to all the clerks of assize, that each clerk keeps the records of his own office?—Yes; but only for the last, not more than, 20 years.

51,427. Records older than that go to the Public Record Office?—Yes.

51,428. During such time as is not occupied by the duties of his office may the clerk of assize do what he likes?—He is at liberty, except for the provision of the Statute 33 Henry VIII., Chapter 24, Section 6, which enacts that the clerk of assize shall not be of counsel on the circuit whereof he is for the time being clerk of assize “duryng the onlye time of the session of or for anye assize.” Practically, it never occurs that anyone offers one a brief at all. I have had two offered me on my old Midland Circuit, which I refused.

51,429. Do any of your colleagues practise?—I know of none at all.

51,430. What is the case as regards the subordinate officers?—They can practise. I have had an associate who was a solicitor, and he practised in London. He was succeeded by an associate who was a barrister on the circuit, and he practised at County Courts on the circuit. I do not think that is a good plan, because it brought him in contact with the local solicitors and others, and he might have used undue influence. I did not think it was right, and I resisted it as much as I could, but I was powerless.

51,431. Do the subordinate officers have as much work outside the assizes as the clerk himself has?—No, I do not think so. In my case, the clerk of indictments, or, rather, the most experienced officer, is very often called upon to advise and consult about questions from Government offices and that sort of thing. The associate has very little circuit work in between whiles, but then, if the associate were the more experienced officer, I should call upon him, as two heads are often better than one in replying to Government offices. I may have, perhaps, to submit a letter and a proposed reply, and that sort of thing, and am glad to have the advice of the best man; but the associate, as a rule, has very little to do between circuits.

51,432. As regards the appointment of clerks of assize, taking them first, who is the appointing authority?—The senior judge going the circuit has the appointment.

51,433. Is that under the Act of 1884?—Yes.

51,434. The section of that Act says that the appointment to certain offices, which include the clerk of assize, “shall henceforth be vested in the senior judge “going on such circuit for the winter and summer “assizes respectively.” What is the meaning of that?—The autumn assize is only a gaol delivery; there is no civil work, and the judges decided among themselves that it should not carry the patronage.

51,435. To what does the word “respectively” refer?—That is the summer and winter circuits respectively.

51,436. Then is it the case that the judge of the winter assize on any circuit appoints to a vacancy on that circuit until the Commission for the Summer Assize is signed?—I have always understood so.

51,437. And from that time onwards until the Winter Assize Commission is signed the judge on the summer circuit appoints?—That is so.

51,438. Who is the appointing authority for the subordinate officers?—That is the same under Section 21 of 47 and 48 Vict. chap. 61.

51,439. It is vested in the judge?—Yes, in the same manner exactly. Prior to 1884 the clerk of assize had the appointment of his subordinate officers. About that I feel exceedingly strongly, as the clerk of assize is responsible for the acts of all his officers, and yet a judge may come and may appoint anybody to be a subordinate officer.

51,440. You would prefer that the appointment should remain with the clerk of assize?—It ought never to have been taken away from him, but the judges in 1884 got it taken away.

51,441. Have you found any inconvenience resulting from that?—The gravest possible inconvenience. Without mentioning anybody, I have had two officers who have been nothing but a handicap to me and put me in the most awful position.

51,442. (Lord Mersey.) You had to get rid of one, I think?—One I had to threaten to get rid of. I had to get rid of two bailiffs, and the Treasury supported me.

51,443. (Chairman.) Has the clerk of assize the power of removal of his officers?—Yes, with the sanction of the Treasury.

51,444. Although it is the judge who appoints?—Yes, and in the case of those bailiffs, fortunately, the Treasury saw the justice of the dismissal, and I was relieved of them. But the same danger might occur at any time.

51,445. The duties of the clerk of assize are extensive and varied?—Very; and they are fairly set out in the Report dated 8th July 1869, of a Committee which sat to inquire into the whole office of clerks of assize just after a gentleman who had been a soldier was appointed by his father. They went into the matter very thoroughly. Sir Balliol Brett was the Chairman of that Committee, and Mr. Slater-Booth was also a member.

51,446. That statement is fully quoted in the Minutes of Evidence before the Committee of 1887 on the Central Office?—That is so.

51,447. It is unnecessary, I think, for our present purpose to go very minutely into the nature of the duties, but I will read one paragraph from that document which sums it up, and ask you to tell me whether that may be taken as a correct and complete statement: "From what has been before stated, it will be apparent that the whole of the administrative business of the criminal and nisi prius courts on circuit is vested in the clerk of assize. He is responsible for putting the entire machinery in motion, and for its correct working at every stage. He may personally perform any part of the duties of his office which he sees fit to undertake, and either attend as associate in the civil court, sit as clerk of arraigns in the Crown Court, or devote his time to the taxation of costs." Is that a fair summary of the duties?—That is so, and that is the responsibility which we have on us.

51,448. The clerk of assize is, of course, responsible for the officers and the satisfactory performance of their duties?—Absolutely responsible, and yet he has not the appointment of them.

51,449. What is your opinion as regards the present system of appointment of the clerks of assize?—I was not appointed by my father at all, although my name might suggest it; on the contrary, he was very angry with me for taking the post. Judges' sons are constantly appointed, and I maintain that there is nobody more likely to start with a knowledge of circuit business—and it is all circuit business—than the son of a judge who has been round with him as marshal, and talked with him and heard him talk about the conduct of assize business. The last thing I want to do is to mention the names of any persons who, being judges' sons, have been more or less incompetent. I have only known one or two cases where they have not shone exactly, and there is hope for all.

51,450. May one say that it has been recognised as a normal and proper thing for the judge who appoints, if he has a son, to appoint him?—I have been consulted by one judge as to whether it was right for him to appoint his own son.

51,451. May I ask what opinion you gave him?—I said if he did it I did not think there would be very much criticism about it, and he did it, and his son turned out to be a most excellent clerk of assize. The judges used to have an enormous amount of patronage; now they have nothing but the revising barristerships and the clerkships of assize.

51,452. Have the persons appointed, as a rule, been practising barristers?—I think, as a rule, they have. The Clerk of Assize Act was passed after the appointment of a Mr. Bovill, who had been a cavalry officer. He really did not know much about it at first.

51,453. Was he the son of a judge?—He was the son of a Lord Chief Justice, and that raised rather a scandal, because his military methods did not quite accord with the practice. That gave rise to discussion and the passing of the Act; but it has not made any difference in the number of judges' sons who have been appointed, nor in the efficiency of the conduct of the business, so far as I know.

51,454. You spoke of familiarity with the business of the circuit acquired through going as marshal?—It is superficial, but it is something. I know that it stood me in good stead when I first started.

51,455. Would not a barrister who practised on the circuit have a more useful knowledge of the work?—No, it is a different position if you sit up on a dais. It is extraordinary how different it is if I go and sit down in the well of the court and look up at the judge; it is a totally different thing. It is most extraordinary. As marshal you are behind the scenes, and you can turn over the papers and see all the confidential calendars and things.

51,456. But, as regards drawing indictments, for instance, would not the legal knowledge of a barrister practising in the court be more valuable than personal knowledge?—Forgive me for saying that the clerk of assize does not draw indictments himself.

51,457. He is responsible for them?—He is responsible for them. He frames the indictment, in consultation, as to this or that count being added. After all these years I could not draw an indictment for false pretences with any degree of certainty properly. The clerk of indictments does that, but he would ask me whether it should be framed in this or that sort of way if he had any doubt.

51,458. But the technical form of the indictment is a matter of special knowledge?—Entirely so. I would not pretend to say that being a marshal had the slightest effect in that. Look how little some of the judges even know about indictments.

51,459. If the question were to be considered de novo without any reference to the past, would you suggest the present system of appointment as the most satisfactory one?—You mean, would it occur to me to suggest it as an original plan? I do not suppose it would, at all, but it has been in existence for a great number of years and has worked well. As far as my circuit goes, perhaps I should not hear complaints, but I do not think people complain very much of the way business is done on my circuit. A clerk of assize, although he is responsible, does not stand alone; if he has good officers with him they support him, and keep the thing on the right lines. The person who really might complain is the judge, who is, of course—saving Lord Mersey's presence—at times very reliant upon the clerk of assize.

51,460. Would not you say that the object in selecting a person for an appointment of that kind would be to select the most competent person?—I really do not think so, as long as he is competent. A man who is brought up in the traditions has a value in that office.

51,461. That might be one element in competence, but as between two men, would not you say that the more competent was the man who ought to be appointed?—It depends upon competence for that particular kind of work, and I do not know anyone who is more likely to be competent than he who has been round and seen how the work has been done from the elevated position of marshal. No clerk of assize will know all the technicalities of an indictment at first—he cannot; nor does a barrister. The indictments that are drawn by counsel, and handed in, are very few on my circuit, but they are almost invariably wrong, and have to be corrected by us, because it is technical work which the clerk of indictments by years and years of practice performs currente calamo, and the other man has to think out, as perhaps it is the first or second, or one of the half-dozen, indictments he has drawn in his life.

51,462. The suggestion has been made to the Commission with reference to other legal offices that the duty of appointing should be entrusted to a board or committee composed of a representative of the department concerned, of the Civil Service Commission, of the Lord Chancellor, and of the Treasury, and possibly an eminent solicitor. Can you express any opinion as to that suggestion?—I fail to see the advantages of it unless there is anything very wrong in the present system. I speak from a personal point of view. I do not think that at the time I was appointed it would have been a good plan; that is to say, nobody would have been more likely to know, or to have taken an interest in that kind of work, as much as I did. I do not say I was the best man at all, but I was fairly competent, I hope.

51,463. The present system, as you have told us, has produced appointments made largely on the ground of personal relationship?—you mean nepotism?

51,464. Yes. If the appointments were entrusted to a board of that kind, you would exclude those grounds of appointment, or, at any rate, there is much greater probability that you would exclude them?—You would deprive the judges of the little patronage which they have.

51,465. Yes but we are looking at the matter from the point of view of the appointment?—They each go circuit a certain number of times, and giving an appointment to a man that they know about, they would take advantage of the fact that he was a man they knew of, and could trust, and so on; whereas if you had a board, is the judgment of the board likely to be better than that of the judge himself? I should doubt it very much.

51,466. The board would not have the same family motives in making the appointment?—No, but it is not every judge who appoints his own son. The judge, perhaps, appoints the sons of others.

51,467. (Lord Mersey.) That may be because every judge has not got a son?—It may.

51,468. (Chairman.) You told me that the majority of the present clerks of assize had fathers who were judges?—I rather think there is a majority.

51,469. (Lord Mersey.) How many clerks of assize are there altogether?—Eight altogether. The Welsh circuit has two divisions, and there is one to each of those divisions. There are seven circuits. Mr. Bancroft is the son of an actor; Sir Herbert Stephen is the son of a judge; Mr. Wade is not the son of a judge; Mr. Grantham is the son of a judge; Mr. Channell is the son of a judge; Dr. Stubbs is not; Mr. Coleridge is the son of a judge—so there is a small majority.

51,470. Whose son is Dr. Stubbs?—I do not know, but he has nothing to do with a judge. Mr. Justice Bucknill appointed him. He is a Doctor of Laws and a very excellent clerk of assize.

51,471. Who was Mr. Wade?—He was the associate on the circuit. He came in, I think, under the recommendation, when the staff was reduced, that they should fill up the post of clerk of assize from the existing staff.

51,472. What is the statutory qualification for a clerk of assize?—Under Section 3 of the Clerk of Assize Act, "No person shall be appointed to be clerk of assize unless he has during a period of not less than three years been either a barrister-at-law in actual practice, special pleader or conveyancer in actual practice, or an attorney of one of the superior courts of law at Westminster in actual practice, or a subordinate officer of the clerk of assize on circuit."

51,473. Have there been any cases of appointment of a subordinate officer to be clerk of assize?—Yes, after the 1885 recommendation they filled up from subordinate officers the post of clerk of assize on the Western circuit. Mr. James Read, whom Lord Mersey will remember well, was a most excellent lawyer, trained at the Old Bailey, and made a very good clerk of assize, but I doubt if he would have been appointed clerk of assize in the ordinary way.

51,474. (Mr. Coward.) He was not a judge's son?—And, more than that, he was not either a barrister or a solicitor. He was a most excellent man and a most learned man.

51,475. (Chairman.) Would the work of the subordinate officers be such as to qualify them, from the practical point of view, to be appointed clerks of assize?—They are not brought into the same confidential relations with the judges as the others; they are in the office behind. We know what is the desirability for a clerk of assize, and the judges know. Some of them would do and some would not; they vary.

51,476. They would acquire familiarity with all the technical parts of the duties?—Yes. I have often had to put one of my subordinate officers into court when I have had to go out for some special business, or interview, or illness. Some of them know the work admirably—my clerk of indictments, who has been Deputy Clerk at the Old Bailey, knows the work far better than anybody else. One of my officers does not know it well, as yet, and it is a strain on him and something might go wrong if any point turned up in a moment—that is all—but he would pick it up, of course, if once in the post.

51,477. There is nothing to prevent the appointment of one of the subordinate officers if he is the most suitable person?—Nothing at all; in fact Mr. Wade was associate. Mr. Matthews, in 1889, on the Oxford Circuit came up in the same way; and Mr. Shuttleworth had been associate to his father before him. Neither of them were sons of judges, or had anything to do with them.

51,478. Are the clerks of assize pensionable?—No. It is a freehold office.

51,480. Does any age limit apply to retirement?—No.

51,481. Has any inconvenience arisen from the absence of an age limit for retirement?—I think in some cases there has, but it has been got over. One associate of mine, Mr. Collisson, became rather old and suffered from illness, but he supplied a deputy to himself with my approval, and it worked all right; but, of course, it left very little for himself. It was arranged that somebody should do his work for him and take, I think, half his salary.

51,482. Have you known any case of a clerk of assize continuing to hold office when he was no longer capable of performing the duties?—Yes, there was one old gentleman, Mr. Wilde, who is dead now. His case was mentioned in the report of 1887. It was notorious that one gentleman never went near the place at all. Those were good old-fashioned times when they got a large salary and apparently did nothing.

51,483. You have known such cases?—There have been cases in the past where the gentlemen have not done as much as they do nowadays, or anything like it.

51,484. (Mr. Coward.) What became of the assizes in those times?—The clerk of assize then had three officers. The thing was over-staffed a little, and then they cut down not only the staff, but the salaries; and the subordinate officers, I think, are shockingly underpaid.

51,485. (Chairman.) The question has been raised in the past whether some combination might be made between the assize duties and the duties of some of the officers in the Supreme Court, in order to avoid the position of having officers like the clerks of assize and their staff who are fully employed for part of the year only?—Yes. That surely was before the Committee of 1887. They said they had considered the question, but could not come to any conclusion about it. They said: "As to the question whether it would be a better arrangement to amalgamate the staff of circuit officers with the Central Office, the Committee have not found themselves able to make any definite recommendation."

51,486. Are you prepared to express an opinion upon that point?—All I can say is, that when there is no circuit work the time of the associate might possibly with benefit be employed at the Royal Courts of Justice if there is sufficient work, but one could not spare any other officer.

51,487. You do not suggest any combination of the functions of the clerk of assize with a post in the Central Office?—He could not do it.

51,488. What do you say with regard to the final suggestion of the Committee of 1887, that there might be some combination of the circuit duties with those of the district registrars of the High Court or the district probate registrars?—We know nothing about the district registrars beyond this, that most inconveniently causes may be entered with the district registrar up to a certain time, and he frequently delays information, and we do not get it without having to telegraph for the lists, and so on. We have really no touch with them at all and know nothing about their work. There are ten circuit towns on my circuit alone, and as many on the Midland and other circuits, and an associate could not go wandering about to these places all the year round. I think an associate might be made use of with an adequate increase of salary in the High Court. I think that is quite a possible suggestion, but not the clerk of indictments nor certainly the clerk of assize.

51,489. And you think there is nothing in the suggestion to utilise the local registrars?—There is nothing in that at all.

51,490. Have you any observations to make as regards the present scales of salary?—I should like to say a great deal. 200*l.* a year for a man who, by the opinion of the judges, should be a barrister when he is appointed to one of these subordinate offices, is a wholly inadequate salary; it is neither one thing nor the other. It rises up to 300*l.*, and that is not enough. I would earnestly ask that the pay of the subordinate officers on such circuits as mine—I do not know what they are on the Welsh circuits—should be increased. The clerks of assize, of course, have had a great deal more work put upon them by different Acts, but till other people suggest it, I do not think I am here for the purpose of asking for money for ourselves, and I would rather not do it.

51,491. Both those questions, the salaries of the clerks of assize and the salaries of the subordinate officers, were fully inquired into by the Committee of 1887?—That is nearly 30 years ago. There was no Court of Criminal Appeal Act then, and the staffs have been reduced.

51,492. Have the changes since the date of that committee, such as the institution of the Court of Criminal Appeal, largely increased the work of the circuit staff?—Yes, most certainly; but it does not follow that because that committee gave that report it was quite a correct one on that point. If you come to think of it, the cost of living has increased—has it not?—in the last 30 years, and especially now. I only put it forward on behalf of the subordinate officers, for whom I have always strongly felt, and I had hoped when I was senior clerk of assize I could have got my brethren to memorialise on this. I think they are grossly underpaid.

51,493. Do they get allowances as well?—They get the same travelling allowances, when actually on circuit, as myself.

51,494. Although they are at liberty to do other work when their services are not required for the circuit, do you find in practice that they do not generally do it?—They can do literary work to a certain extent, but they could not follow any other profession, certainly.

51,495. Apart from the new work, such as has been produced by the creation of the Court of Criminal Appeal, has there been an increase in circuit business?—That is a very difficult point without going into figures extending back several years. The statistics which I return to the Home Office would show you better than I can now tell you. The difference is, that crimes are now far more intellectual crimes, the cases are longer and more complicated. There are not so many crimes of violence and drunkenness and that sort of thing; they are cases well thought out and intricate, and last a long time. As to the numbers I really cannot now tell you. I should think they have increased, but not enormously. Then, at the present time, there is hardly any crime.

51,496. Has the length of circuits increased?—Yes, certainly.

51,497. Is the greater part of your work criminal or civil?—I am responsible for all. I attend in close detail to all the criminal work, leaving the civil work, which, on my particular circuit, is inconsiderable, to the associate. Then, on the other hand, I make him tax the costs, which is a tedious and troublesome job, and hard work whilst the courts are sitting. Personally, I interfere but little in the civil work.

51,498. Does the greater length of the cases and the greater intellectuality of the crimes increase your work?—Most certainly. It is far more difficult to grasp. I have to read every deposition that comes in.

51,499. It increases the volume of the documents and papers that come to you?—Yes. Not only that, but there is constant watchfulness necessary under the Court of Criminal Appeal Act. Every document handed in has to be carefully watched by me, docketed and numbered and returned, and a receipt taken for it, and that sort of thing. Then there are returns to the Court of Criminal Appeal.

51,500. I am anxious to arrive at an understanding as to the increase of work. In the case of work on circuit, if the whole assize was occupied with one long trial, would your work be greater or less than if occupied with 20 short trials?—Very much less, of course. The first day of the business, when you get there 20 or 25 prisoners, taking their pleas, and that sort of thing, is work that ought to be paid very highly. That is where the responsibility comes in. Absolute accuracy is necessary.

51,501. That is much heavier work?—Very much heavier. If you get a long case it is tedious; the clerk of assize, who sits there, can almost go to sleep, except that he has imprisonment orders and costs orders to make out. A long case is nothing after he has once got it prepared.

51,502. So that the long cases, while they are going on, do not increase the work?—No.

51,503. Except so far as they prolong the whole circuit?—Yes, they keep him away from his home, which is a consideration.

51,504. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) You say in your memorandum that the tenure of your office is freehold. Is the word "freehold" there a term of art? What does it exactly mean?—It is a term of art, perhaps. It means for life.

51,505. Does it mean as long as he behaves well?—Yes; he is removable by the Lord Chancellor, with the consent of the Treasury.

51,506. It is not a pensionable post in any sense; but I understand from you that a sort of arrangement, which is very like a pension, is arrived at in the case of subordinate officers. A subordinate officer when, as you say, he fails, provides a substitute acceptable to the clerk of assize, and then, as in the case you put to us, retains half his salary for himself and gives the other half to his deputy?—It is entirely a matter of arrangement. When a man who has served you and the office faithfully for 20 or 30 years is broken down by illness, it is rather hard to say: "Now you cannot come upon circuit, you have no pension, but you must go." So when that did occur, I said to the gentleman whom I knew to be a very good, honest old Churchman: "Let somebody come and take your place until you get better, and make your arrangements," and so on. Then he came to me quite as a friend, and said: "Will this arrangement and this man suit you?" and so on, and I said: "Yes, by all means." I think that was only common charity.

51,507. Then that arrangement so as to provide what is in effect a retiring allowance out of the salary has in some cases happened also in the case of clerks of assize?—In my particular case they were waiting till either I, or Mr. Platt, then 81, should die, to amalgamate the offices in the person of one. He happened to get very ill and in his dotage before he died. It was rather a scandal that he should go on, unable to write the books up, and so on, and one of the judges gently urged him to take better care of his health and let me do the work. So I became his deputy; but I only took one third of his salary from him.

51,508. The present arrangement is that there is a definite date at which the patronage of one judge comes to an end and the patronage of another judge begins?—Yes.

51,509. So it would not be contrary to precedent for it to be notorious that if an old gentleman died at one date an appointment would go to the nominee of one judge, and if he died a few days earlier it would go to the nominee of another?—That has happened.

51,510. You told us that the Inquiry of 1887 originated with the appointment of a gentleman who had been a cavalry officer?—Yes.

51,511. Would it be contrary to recent precedent if a gentleman should be appointed who had been for some years a tea-planter in the East?—Being a barrister?

51,512. Being a barrister?—I think I know the case you mean. I do not think it would be contrary to precedent, therefore. But may I say that that gentleman is at the present moment fighting in the trenches. I coached him myself for the circuit business, and two judges have told me afterwards that he was as good a clerk of assize as they had ever seen.

51,513. Mr. Coward has asked me to ask about a point arising out of the Estimates. In the Estimates for last year it is stated that the travelling expenses of the clerks of assize and their officers and fees of interpreters come to 4,725*l.*?—Yes, that represents a good many clerks of assize and a good many officers.

51,514. To each clerk of assize and officers that is almost exactly 600*l.* a year for each group. If the estimate was 4,800*l.*, and there are eight clerks of assize, that would be 600*l.* a year for each group?—Possibly, but you have left out their bailiffs, who get 10*s.* a day. A clerk of assize gets 30*s.* and his officers get 30*s.*, that is, 5*l.* a night for the four.

51,515. Do the fees to interpreters represent a large amount of that 4,725*l.*?—No, they would not be included in that at all. They are charged in my costs order on the county. I do not suppose that the interpreters on my circuit cost 5*l.* a year. They may at Liverpool, or that sort of place, be much more.

51,516. (Sir John Kempe.) You rather object to the power to appoint your second being taken away from you?—It was taken away three years before I was appointed.

51,517. You object to that, but you are aware that it is the rule throughout the Civil Service that nobody appoints his own clerks or officers; they are all selected by an outside body?—Yes, but are they responsible for them?

51,518. Responsible in the same way as you are responsible?—That I should much doubt. We are told by the Treasury that whatever is done by our officers we are responsible for.

51,519. In a different sense from a departmental sense?—I think it is.

51,520. You do not know why the change was made?—I do, indeed—because the judges wanted to get it into their own hands.

51,521. (Mr. Shipley.) You say in your précis, “it does not seem fair that a judge should have the power to appoint his butler to act as clerk of indictments to a clerk of assize.” Having had a good deal of evidence of what becomes of the butlers of Prime Ministers and members of the Cabinet, it would be interesting to know what becomes of the butlers of judges. Have they ever appointed a butler to act in this way?—They have been recommended, but not appointed, as bailiff; but that is a different thing. One bailiff whom I had to discharge in less than a month, shortly afterwards applied for the vacant post of clerk of indictments on the ground of his experience as a circuit officer.

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FIFTH DAY.

Wednesday, 14th April 1915.

PRESENT:

SIR HENRY BABINGTON SMITH, K.C.B., C.S.I. (Chairman).

SIR DONALD MACALISTER, K.C.B.

SIR JOHN ARROW KEMPE, K.C.B.

MR. ARTHUR BOUTWOOD.

MR. CECIL COWARD.

MR. PERCY EWING MATHESON.

MR. ARTHUR EVERETT SHIPLEY, F.R.S.

MR. PHILIP SNOWDEN, M.P.

MR. GRAHAM WALLAS.

MISS HALDANE.

MR. E. W. H. MILLAR (Secretary).

MR. BENJAMIN JAMES BRIDGEMAN, called and examined.

51,522. (Chairman.) You are Superintendent of the County Court Department of the Treasury?—I am.

51,523. How long have you held that post?—17 years last August.

51,524. You are, therefore, thoroughly familiar with the whole system of County Courts and their administration?—I think I ought to be.

51,525. Will you tell us first, briefly, the nature of the jurisdiction of the County Courts?—The present system of County Courts was established by an Act of 1846, the object being to provide an easy and uniform method of procedure for the recovery of small debts and demands at convenient centres throughout the country, so that in such cases no person might have to seek justice more than 10 miles from his residence or place of business. Originally the boundaries of the County Court districts corresponded with those of the superintendent registrars of births, marriages, and deaths; they have, however, been modified by Order in Council from time to time as local convenience suggested. County Courts were at first given a jurisdiction to try personal actions in which the debt or demand did not exceed 20*l.*, that being then the equivalent, or thereabouts, of the “40*s.*” jurisdiction conferred on the ancient County Court by Edward I. The amount was raised to 50*l.* in 1850, and to 100*l.* in 1903. Amounts in excess of this jurisdiction may be sued for, and the action tried in the County Court by the consent of the parties. The jurisdiction is concurrent with that of the High Court. General rules, prepared by a committee of five County Court judges, concurred in by the Rules Committee of the Supreme Court, and approved by the Lord Chancellor, prescribe a common method of procedure for all the County Courts. This procedure is by plaint or petition, hearing in court, and judgment. There are no pleadings. The judgment may be enforced against goods by warrant of execution, or against the person by warrant of commitment, which can only be obtained after an order of the judge made on the hearing of a judgment summons. In the matter of serving summonses and enforcing judgments, each County Court acts in aid of all the others, thus, e.g., a summons issued, or a judgment obtained at, say, Carlisle County Court, may be served or enforced by the high bailiff of, say, Dover County Court, and so on. Speaking generally, all process is prepared and served by the County Court, in this respect differing from the High Court, in which writs, &c., are prepared by a solicitor and served by him, and in which process of execution is prepared by the solicitor, who gets it sealed in the Central Office, and then hands it to the sheriff for enforcement. Certain County Courts, 135 in number, have a jurisdiction in Bankruptcy. Adjoining County Court districts not having the jurisdiction are grouped with and form part of the Bankruptcy district of one or other of those which possess it. Since 1890 the County Courts having Bankruptcy jurisdiction have also jurisdiction under the Companies Acts where the capital of the company does not exceed 10,000*l.* An equity jurisdiction, as regards matters usually belonging to the then Court of Chancery, was conferred in 1865 on all County Courts, the general limit being 500*l.* There were 712 cases in 1913. Jurisdiction in workmen's compensation cases was conferred on all County Courts in 1897, and continued and developed by the Act of 1906. This has largely added to the work of the County Courts. Numerous other Acts dealing with a variety of subjects have added to the jurisdiction of County Courts, but proceedings under them are seldom resorted to. There were only 258 cases in 1913. District Registries of the High Court have been established under the authority of the Judicature Acts of 1873 and 1875 for the issue of writs, &c., at 84 of the County Courts. Interlocutory proceedings in an action may be taken at the

District Registries as in the Central Office and Masters Chambers at the High Court. There are now 493 County Courts, to some of which are attached branch County Courts to the number of 68. They are grouped in 53 circuits, for which there are 55 judges, there being one extra judge at Liverpool and another in London. Judges of County Courts, at one time paid by fees, are paid by salaries charged on the Consolidated Fund, and are entitled to a pension for incapacity on the recommendation of the Lord Chancellor.

51,526. May I sum it up by saying that the County Courts have a jurisdiction which is limited in area and in amount, and, to some extent, by the nature of the proceedings?—Yes, that is so.

51,527. In practice is the work of the County Courts to a very large extent the recovery of small debts?—It is mainly the recovery of small debts; that is their principal work.

51,528. Dealing next with the finance of the courts, will you tell us briefly what the arrangements are with regard to that?—The courts were formerly grouped under 23 treasurers, and by degrees the work of the treasurers and their responsibility have been absorbed by the County Courts Department of the Treasury. Every registrar has a local banking account, into which he must pay all moneys not immediately required for cash payments.

51,529. The moneys that he receives consists, I suppose, partly of fees and partly of suitors' money paid into court?—Yes, of a large amount of suitors' money and a fair amount of fees.

51,530. Those two categories cover the whole of the moneys passing through his hands?—They cover the whole of the moneys, with the exception of moneys under the Workmen's Compensation Act and a few miscellaneous items.

51,531. Are those for the most part lodged in the savings bank?—For the most part they are lodged in the savings bank; there is nearly always an order by the judge to invest in the Post Office Savings Bank.

51,532. So that the actual control of those moneys does not come into the hands of the registrar except so far as his order is necessary for their payment?—That is so after the registrar has made the deposit. The order must be made by the judge, and that order is sent up to the Treasury, and the Treasury authorise the withdrawal from the Post Office Savings Bank.

51,533. Your department exercises control over the registrar's banking account?—Yes.

51,534. If a registrar has more money in his account than is required for the payments he has to make, what is done with it?—We take over the money and form a fund called the "County Courts Fund," with which we finance other courts where there is a deficiency of funds. Ultimately the money may be wanted by the Court, and, if so, it is handed back to the registrar from time to time.

51,535. How are the expenses of the courts and the salaries paid?—They are paid out of the fees; but if the fees are not sufficient the suitors' money is used. In fact all the moneys in the County Court in cash are pooled and used indiscriminately for anything that may be wanted.

51,536. They are pooled, and if, finally, there is a deficit to be met, it is dealt with on the whole mass and not on the individual court?—That is so. The accounts are rendered quarterly, and after audit there is a settlement between the registrar and the Treasury, and between one registrar and another through the Treasury.

51,537. How are the accounts dealt with for Parliamentary purposes?—As a matter of public accounting, estimates of expenditure are prepared every year and presented to Parliament, credit being given for fees and other receipts as appropriations in aid, the actual receipts and expenditure being embodied in an appropriation account after the close of the year; but in law and in practice the salaries are payable and are actually paid out of the produce of the fees on which they are charged by statute, and the effect of a recent opinion of the law officers is to confirm the view that, notwithstanding the formalities of public accounting, the salaries are not paid out of moneys provided by Parliament.

51,538. Has some importance been attached to the question of whether the salaries are paid out of moneys voted by Parliament from the point of view of the position of clerks in the courts?—Yes. During the last 20 years from time to time there have been memorials to the Treasury, and one of the allegations has always been that the clerks in a County Court were paid out of moneys provided by Parliament, and therefore have some claim to pension.

51,539. You tell us that the law officers have stated it as their opinion that the salaries are not paid out of moneys provided by Parliament?—Yes; the question went to the law officers on a point arising on the Police Act of 1890. I will not say most, but many of the bailiffs are pensioners, pensioned policemen or pensioned soldiers or sailors; and the Receiver of Police, under some provision of the Police Act, used, in the case of policemen, to abate their pensions when they received over a certain amount in salary from the County Court. That went on for some time until one day a bailiff disputed the right to abate his pension. There is a provision in the Police Act that if a man obtains an appointment and is paid out of moneys provided by Parliament his pension should be abated; and this bailiff objected to having his pension abated, with the result that the Receiver of Police had to refer the matter to the Home Office, and the Home Office asked the Treasury Solicitor to submit a case to the law officers. The law officers held that the man was not paid out of moneys provided by Parliament; and, a fortiori, if he is not paid out of moneys provided by Parliament the clerks are not, for there is no provision at all for their payment. The payment of salaries is charged on the fees.

51,540. You refer to Section 44 of the Act of 1888?—Yes.

51,541. In that section it is stated that, "The salaries and remuneration of the registrars and high bailiffs shall be paid out of the produce of the fees payable under the provisions of this Act"?—Yes.

51,542. It is also stated that if there is any deficiency it shall be paid out of moneys provided by Parliament?—Yes, it says so; but it has never been necessary to provide for a deficiency; the fees have always been sufficient to pay all the salaries.

51,543–552. What is the position with regard to meeting the other expenses as well as the salaries?—As regards meeting the expenses of salaries, the fees have always covered them, but there are other allied services, such as the Stationery Office Vote and the Vote for the Office of Works, and when all those are taken into account the average net cost of the County Courts in the last seven years has been 143,045*l.* per annum, or, excluding judges' salaries and pensions, 53,452*l.*

51,553. And the gross salary includes the amount paid to the clerks?—Yes.

51,554. You say that the fees are more than sufficient to cover the salaries of the registrars and clerks?—Yes.

51,555. But looking at the Estimates for 1915–16 is that the case?—The year 1915–16 is an exceptional year. I think I ought to have left that year out entirely, because that is a year affected by the war, the provision there is really to make good a deficiency in the fees. That is a very exceptional year; we have never had anything like it before.

51,556. I see that the figures for 1915–16 are very much lower than the figures for 1914–15. Is that owing to a falling off of business?—Yes, quite.

51,557. And, owing to the fact that the payments do not fall off so rapidly as the business, the fees for 1915–16 are insufficient to meet the salaries?—Yes, it is mainly because of the payments to clerks and bailiffs. We never, as a general rule, reduce an allowance either for a clerk or a bailiff unless there is a vacancy on the staff; so that those fixed allowances remain.

51,558. That is to say, the allowances move upwards rapidly to correspond with an increase of business, but they do not move downwards when there is a decrease of business?—We are in the unfortunate position that we cannot reduce them without causing great hardship. A reduction would only be effected if it could be done without causing hardship.

51,559. Then it follows that in the present year a part of the salaries will actually be voted by Parliament since a deficiency of fees is voted by Parliament?—That is so.

51,560. But in ordinary years, when the fees are sufficient, the whole of the salaries and remuneration are, as prescribed by the Act, paid out of fees and not voted by Parliament?—Invariably.

51,561. And the law officers have held that the fact that the Estimate is presented in the form of complete payments, and then appropriations in aid have to be deducted from them, does not alter the principle of the Act that payment is out of the fees?—Yes; that was the case with regard to the particular bailiff which was submitted to them.

51,562. Will you tell us what the staff of the County Courts is? In the first place, you have told us that there are 493 courts, to which are attached 68 branch courts. In order to make it clear, although the Commission is not dealing with the County Court judges, will you state what number of County Court judges there are?—There are 55 County Court judges and 53 circuits. There is one additional judge for Liverpool and one for London—53 circuits and 55 judges.

51,563-4. Each circuit contains a varying number of individual courts?—Yes; in some instances as many as 15 or 16 courts, and in a few only one. Westminster has a judge entirely to itself, and so has Manchester; Birmingham has almost—except for a little court called Solihull; the judge goes there, otherwise he is entirely at Birmingham.

51,565. Each court has a registrar?—Yes, each court has a registrar.

51,566. By whom is he appointed?—He is appointed by the judge, with the approval of the Lord Chancellor.

51,567. Is there a statutory qualification?—He must be a solicitor of at least five years' standing, and he must reside in the County Court district.

51,568. And has he to give security?—Yes; he gives security to the Crown, often of a very large amount, which covers his own acts or omissions as well as those of all persons whom he employs in his office, and for whom he is responsible.

51,569. What are the registrar's duties?—A registrar has certain judicial powers enabling him, with the leave of the judge, or in the judge's absence, to enter up judgment in undefended cases and make orders as to methods of payment; also, with the judge's leave, he may hear disputed cases where the claim does not exceed 2*l.*; and when the claim is more than 2*l.* he sometimes hears the cases by consent of the parties.

51,570. I suppose cases under 2*l.* are a very large proportion of the whole?—A very large proportion; probably two-thirds.

51,571. I see from the judicial statistics that the average amount of a County Court claim is about 3*l.*?—It is a little over 3*l.*, I think; slightly over.

51,572. As a matter of fact, does the registrar hear all cases which are within his competence?—I think he does now. We have had judges who objected to the registrar hearing anything; but, I fancy, in every case now the registrar hears his own cases—cases that the legislature has given him power to hear.

51,573. In the cases which are within his competence is there any appeal from him to the County Court judge?—Yes, the parties can appeal to the judge.

51,574. What are the registrar's duties apart from that judicial work?—He prepares and issues processes, draws up judgments and orders, keeps the records of the County Court as well as the cash books and ledgers, and is charged with the receipt and payment of all moneys passing through the court, of which he has to render proper accounts. In this work the registrar employs persons to assist him—as many or as few as he pleases.

51,575. How far is he required to perform his duties himself, and how far can he perform them by persons whom he employs?—It is very difficult for me to say anything about that, because we never differentiate the registrar from his clerks. Some registrars in small courts have been known to perform all the duties, to keep all the books, prepare all the accounts and draw every order; and even registrars in some of the large courts take very great interest in the work and do a great deal of it themselves. On the other hand, there are registrars with large practices who leave as much as possible to their clerks; but they pay them for it; at least, we believe they do.

51,576. Can they delegate their judicial work?—No, they have no power to delegate their judicial work, unless a deputy registrar has been appointed.

51,577. That they must perform?—That they must perform. There is a good deal that they can delegate, of course, in the way of drawing up orders, drawing awards, and things of that sort.

51,578. Are they required in any cases to give their whole time to their duties?—There are 12 courts* as to which the Lord Chancellor has made an order that the registrar shall not practise, and whenever that is done the registrar becomes an officer of the Supreme Court under the Judicature Acts and is entitled to a pension, and the Treasury are bound to assign him a pensionable salary.

51,579. By "practise" you mean practise as a solicitor?—Yes, practise as a solicitor.

51,580. Are there any other kinds of activity that are excluded. Would he be allowed to engage in business, for instance?—I do not know whether the Lord Chancellor would allow him to do that. I think the Treasury would raise some question when the time came for his pension.

51,581. You are not aware that any such case has arisen?—I cannot say at the moment.

51,582. Among those registrars who are prohibited from practising?—I have no definite information. I have had a suspicion, but I do not think I ought to mention it to the Commission, because it is only suspicion.

51,583. Do other registrars, apart from those who are not allowed to practise, carry on at the same time their private practice as solicitors?—Yes.

51,584. Have they in all cases a private practice as solicitors?—No, I do not think they have. I think in some cases the judges have made it a condition on appointment that they should not practise. That is not the case of the Lord Chancellor making an order; it is merely a sort of agreement, an honourable understanding between the judge and the registrar, a condition on appointment.

51,585. How are registrars appointed?—Registrars are appointed by the judge with the approval of the Lord Chancellor. Their testimonials are sent up to the Lord Chancellor and he has to approve the appointment.

51,586-7. How are their clerks appointed?—The registrars' clerks are appointed by the registrars.

51,588. Besides registrars what other officers are there?—There are 55 high bailiffs—it is an expiring class of officer—charged with the service and execution of process, and they, like the registrars, give security to the Crown.

51,589. You say that is an expiring office?—That is an expiring office.

51,590. How is that extinction effected?—The extinction is effected upon a vacancy. If a high bailiff dies or retires the registrar takes over the duties under Section 37 of the County Courts Act, unless the Lord Chancellor and the Treasury agree together that there should be a separate officer. That has been done in the case of very large courts.

51,591. The effect of that will be that, except in those particular cases of very large courts, the high bailiffs will cease to exist and their functions will be merged in the office of registrar?—That will be so.

51,592. Does the registrar receive additional remuneration when that happens?—Yes; he gets a small addition to his salary. I do not think it is intended to be an equivalent for the work; but there was an officer being paid a liberal salary, and the Legislature decided that he might perform those duties for a small consideration; he gets one-fifth of his net salary as registrar for performing those duties.

51,593. The high bailiff's duties, you tell us, are the service of summonses and execution of process?—Yes.

* Vide Appendix XCVIII.

14 April 1915.]

Mr. BENJAMIN JAMES BRIDGEMAN.

51,594. How does he perform those duties?—In very small courts he does a great deal of the work himself, and in the larger courts he appoints as many bailiffs as he requires.

51,595. Does he appoint those bailiffs himself?—Yes.

51,596. Without anyone else's approval?—Yes.

51,597. And where the office is merged in that of registrar, then the registrar appoints the bailiffs?—He does.

51,598. Is the registrar's staff employed exclusively upon County Court duties?—In the courts with above 6,000 plaintiffs the registrar's clerks would be employed exclusively upon either County Court duties or duties connected with some jurisdiction annexed to the County Court, such as the Bankruptcy jurisdiction or the district registry—something of that kind; they would be employed on public business connected with the County Court. Under 6,000 plaintiffs, there is nothing at all to compel the registrar to employ his clerks entirely upon County Court business; he may employ them on anything he pleases. If he is a clerk to a magistrate he may use the County Court clerks for doing that work, or he may employ them in his private practice. In fact, in 80 per cent. of the County Courts, the offices are housed in the same building as the registrar's private practice; the registrar gets a small allowance from the Office of Works for providing and furnishing an office, including lighting, heating, and cleaning; it begins, I think, at something like 7*l.*, and goes up according to the number of plaintiffs.

51,599. Is there, as a rule, a separate room for County Court business?—Yes. Not in the very small courts, but, as a rule, I think there is a separate room. In those courts that I have visited I have found a separate room with one or two clerks engaged on County Court work sometimes and sometimes on other work.

51,600. Is it the general practice in those smaller courts to employ the staff partly on the registrar's private work and partly on official work?—Yes, certainly, in courts below 2,000 plaintiffs. When you get above 2,000 plaintiffs you find men who are more or less whole-timers.

51,601. But there is nothing to prevent their being employed on private business if the registrar desires so to employ them?—There is nothing at all.

51,602. In the case of the high bailiff's staff, or where the registrar performs the duties of high bailiff in the case of the staff employed by him, are they employed exclusively upon their official duties?—They are in the larger courts, but in the very small courts they are only part-time employees; sometimes it is a gardener or a tradesman or a small auctioneer who is doing the work.

51,603. In those cases there is not nearly enough work to employ men for the whole of their time?—No. I believe in some cases the only allowance is 35*l.* or 40*l.* a year for service and execution of process; there is not enough work to justify whole-timers.

51,604. Will you tell us now the method by which the remuneration of those various officers is fixed?—I have mentioned that there are 12 of the courts in which, on appointment, the registrars were ordered by the Lord Chancellor not to practise, and were assigned a salary equivalent to the average net remuneration received from all sources in the previous three years less the estimated value of pension rights. Provision for this course is contained in Section 45 of the County Courts Act, 1888. During the first 10 years (i.e. 1846 to 1856) registrars were called clerks, and were remunerated wholly by fees. They numbered 229, many of them having more than one court. They kept one court themselves and appointed at the other places local attorneys called assistant clerks, with whom they shared their fees. This arrangement ceased in 1856, when it was enacted that the clerk should be called registrar and should have only one court, with compensation for the loss of the others. The necessity for assistant clerks ceased, and they were not again referred to by the Legislature. In the year 1856 registrars ceased to be paid by fees, being thereafter paid by salaries out of the produce of the fees. The minimum of the scale was at first 120*l.*, covering an entry of 200 plaints, with an increase of 5*l.* for every 25 plaintiffs above 200 and not exceeding 1,000, and a further increase of 4*l.* for every 25 plaintiffs above 1,000 and not exceeding 6,000. That scale was subsequently modified to a minimum of 100*l.*, with an addition of 4*l.* for every 25 plaintiffs above 200 and not exceeding 6,000.

51,605. Is that the present scale?—That is the present scale. Above 6,000 the salary was to be fixed by the Treasury with the consent of the Lord Chancellor, but so that the net salary should not exceed 700*l.*

51,606. Are those the scales laid down in the Act of 1888?—Yes.

51,607. A clear distinction is drawn between the courts with more than 6,000 plaintiffs* and those with a smaller number of plaintiffs?—Yes.

51,608. In the case of courts below 6,000 the salary is fixed entirely by the sliding scale?—Entirely.

51,609. But in the larger courts it was found that that scale would produce an excessive remuneration, and it was therefore laid down that the total remuneration should be fixed by the Treasury within the amount represented by the scale, and in such a manner as to leave, after providing reasonable remuneration for the clerical staff, a salary not exceeding 700*l.* for the registrar?—That is practically so; but I have explained further on, in some other part of my memorandum about the 6,000, and we shall get to that later.

51,610. A broad distinction must be drawn between the courts with 6,000 plaintiffs and upwards and those with below 6,000?—Yes.

51,611. Would it be correct to say that that distinction corresponds to the line between a whole-time staff and a part-time staff—speaking of the clerical staff now and not of the registrars themselves?—A compulsorily whole-time staff. I think the word compulsorily is necessary there, because I do not think one could say that it applied generally to all the clerks in courts below 6,000 plaintiffs. They are not obliged to be whole-timers in courts below 6,000. They are obliged to be whole-timers in courts above 6,000.

51,612. In some cases they would be whole-timers in courts below 6,000, although they are not compelled to be so?—Yes, although they are not obliged to be so.

51,613. Then as regards the high bailiffs' salary, what is the position?—They are paid a salary varying with the business of the courts. If the entry of plaintiffs does not exceed 6,000, the salary is one-sixth part of the registrar's gross salary. When the plaintiffs exceed 6,000, the high bailiff receives a salary of 250*l.*, increasing by 12*s.* 6*d.* for every 25 plaintiffs. A maximum of 1,000*l.* is fixed for future appointees.

51,614. Do the present salaries in many cases exceed 1,000*l.*?—I will not say in many cases, but there are cases in which they do exceed 1,000*l.* at present.

51,615. Is that the net salary or the gross salary?—The net salary.

51,616. In how many cases is it likely that high bailiffs will be permanently retained?—I should think in most courts above 10,000 plaintiffs.

51,617. How many courts is that?—There are 24 courts above 10,000 at present, and there are, I think, 51 high bailiffs; but some of these high bailiffs take a number of courts, they are high bailiffs of a group.

51,618–20. Then will the high bailiffs who will be permanently retained in any case be high bailiffs for more than one of the 10,000 plaintiffs courts?—I do not think they will in future. I do not think they can be. When the Legislature determined that a registrar should not have more than one court, that enactment applied to everybody, whether he was a registrar appointed before the Act or after it; but in the case of high bailiffs there is a similar provision applying only to future appointees, so that we have a certain number of high bailiffs who have more than one court at present. Their successors will not; their successors will probably be registrars; but the way in which they get so many plaintiffs is by the aggregate of the number of courts.

51,621. (Chairman.) Can you say in how many cases, on a vacancy in the post of high bailiff, it has been decided that a high bailiff should still be appointed instead of merging the office in that of registrar?—I

* Vide Appendix XCIX.

14 April 1915.]

Mr. BENJAMIN JAMES BRIDGEMAN.

think there have been three or four during the last 17 years; they are not numerous.

51,622. In such cases is there an additional remuneration in respect of special work?—For the high bailiff?

51,623. I am speaking now of the registrars?—Yes. In 1865 and 1868, when Equity and Admiralty jurisdiction were conferred, the former on all County Courts and the latter on certain of them, additional schedules of fees to be paid by the parties were prepared, and such fees were assigned to the registrars for their own use. They are called Schedule B Fees, Schedule A Fees being those out of which salaries are paid.

51,624. Then does the registrar retain the whole of those fees, or does he pay some portion of them to his clerks?—He does pay some portion of them to his clerks—an indefinite sort of amount.

51,625. No control is exercised over that?—The Treasury have no control there. It has been the practice ever since, when any special jurisdiction or duty is conferred by statute or rule on the County Court registrars, instead of revising the scale of salary, to add fees to the schedules and assign them to the registrars as remuneration.

51,626. Under that arrangement, has there been some substantial addition to their remuneration in respect of workmen's compensation?—Yes; for duties under the Workmen's Compensation Act, prior to date of award (after which fees are chargeable), the registrar is paid 10s. on each application for arbitration and 3s. 6d. for perusing and registering or refusing to register an agreement.

51,627. If the registrar is also a district registrar of the High Court, he receives a separate remuneration for that work?—He has a special remuneration, which is allowed in his accounts as County Court registrar, and is ultimately recovered by the Treasury from the Supreme Court Vote.

51,628. Is there a limit to this total amount of his remuneration from all sources?—The total amount of his net remuneration from all sources is 1,400l. a year.

51,629. You yourself are the head of the County Courts Department of the Treasury?—Yes.

51,630. Can you tell us briefly what the work of that department is in relation to County Courts?—Its duties are primarily financial. It considers the financial effect of draft rules; it issues, under the general supervision of the Treasury, instructions to officers of County Courts as to accounts, book-keeping, fees, &c., and authorities for making payments, and acts generally as a department entrusted with the "accountant" duties of the County Courts.

51,631. What means of inspection have you?—We have a local audit by examiners. The local audit of the courts has gradually fallen to be performed by the department, the treasurer's duties, as vacancies occurred, having been absorbed by it. The department settles all accounts with the registrars and high bailiffs, and is the clearing house for the numerous transactions between one court and another.

51,632. Has it also the duty of settling the amount allowed for the registrar's salary and the payment of clerks in the case of large courts?—It looks into the quarterly accounts of everything that is paid. There are a few remarks I have to make with regard to administration, if I may be allowed.

51,633. If you please?—The administration of County Courts properly appertains to the Lord Chancellor's department; financial control, to the Treasury. When necessary, questions of discipline have to be referred to the Lord Chancellor. Finance and administration are, however, intimately connected, and the Lord Chancellor has no itinerant staff through whom he could promptly and effectively obtain independent information needed in dealing with 500 County Court offices, in which the majority of the judges scarcely ever set foot. They merely attend the sittings of the Court. The result of that is that certain duties not strictly financial fall on the County Courts Department.

51,634. Will you explain the nature of those duties?—The Lord Chancellor issues rules; the County Courts Department transmits them to the officers, and from time to time reports if the rules are not properly observed and performed in their offices.

51,635. Then in such a matter as issuing rules, the Lord Chancellor does not communicate direct with the officers of the County Courts?—He does not transmit them to the officers.

51,636. He always does it through your department?—Through my department. The department also observes how the office work is done, and acts if there is any inefficiency.

51,637. What is meant by "acts"?—We should call the attention of the registrar to the state of inefficiency and require it to be remedied.

51,638. And if it was not remedied, would you report it to the Lord Chancellor?—We should probably make a further effort by writing an official letter from the Treasury, and if that failed we should report the matter to the Lord Chancellor for disciplinary action.

51,639. But, ordinarily speaking, if it is not an extremely grave case, the department acts without reporting or referring to the Lord Chancellor?—Yes, if it does not affect the personal character of the registrar. The Lord Chancellor prescribes forms; the department decides how many the officers require, on applications from the registrars, and then gives the order to the Stationery Office. In the same manner the department checks and controls the supply of stationery, books, and stores, costing about 20,000l. a year.

51,640. In fact, you act as an inspecting department and, to some extent, as an executive department, as regards the general administrative control of the County Court offices?—Yes.

51,641. In addition to the proper financial duties, for which the department was originally created?—That has always been so. Then the Lord Chancellor appoints the judges; the department considers their applications for ushers, books, &c., and negotiates with them for their travelling allowances.

51,642. By that, do you mean that you consider the amount of allowances to be made for payment of ushers and books, &c.?—Yes; it requires a good deal of negotiation sometimes. We order the books from the Stationery Office.

51,643. So far as the persons are concerned, that is a matter entirely for the County Court judge himself?—Yes, quite; we have nothing to do with that.

51,644. What the County Court judge discusses with you is the amount of money to be allowed for such things?—As to the necessity of employing an usher.

51,645. That would come under the head of amount, would it not; the amount might be nil?—Yes. The department also sees that the judges' libraries are transferred from a retiring or deceased judge to his successor, and keeps a record of the judge's books, which are very often kept at his own house. The judges appoint the registrars and high bailiffs; the department considers the amount of their business, and from time to time negotiates with these officers as to the amount of their respective allowances, whether for clerk hire or for service and execution of process, and takes steps for obtaining security from these officers.

51,646. The fixing of allowance for clerk hire, I suppose, is a matter that gives rise to considerable difference of opinion sometimes?—Yes, it does, sometimes; but I think, on the whole, the registrars are satisfied. If a clerk or a bailiff is injured in the performance of his duties, the department investigates the circumstances before allowing the registrar to charge compensation in his accounts. If a clerk or bailiff is ill, the department considers, on the registrar's or high bailiff's application, whether the circumstances justify an allowance of the cost of a substitute. The department considers and reports on proposals of the Office of Works to build or lease County Courts and offices, also on questions as to the use or discontinuance of local public buildings for County Courts. Complaints about the service and execution of process, and questions as to fees properly chargeable, arise on communications from persons using the courts. The department deals with all of them.

MR. BENJAMIN JAMES BRIDGEMAN.

51,647. To whom would complaints of that kind be addressed?—They are generally addressed to the superintendent. If any question arises at a court about a fee, or about a complaint, the registrar usually refers it to the superintendent, and so we get, of course, sheaves of letters about things of that sort which we have to deal with.

51,648. Are such complaints ever addressed to the Lord Chancellor?—I am afraid I cannot answer for the Lord Chancellor.

51,649. Have you ever had such complaints referred to you by the Lord Chancellor?—Never.

51,650. (Sir John Kempe.) I suppose the Treasury is behind all these matters you are now citing; they are not settled by the superintendent himself, but they go to the Treasury for final decision, do they not?—I am afraid not.

51,651. In no case?—I will not say that. The amount of an allowance for clerk hire, or for a high bailiff's men, when settled by me, would go to the Treasury for approval; but these numerous questions, for instance, about a complaint of non-service of a summons or delay in execution of process, would not go beyond me.

51,652. But in the event of providing a substitute which would involve a question of salary, that would go to the Treasury?—I should put the paper forward, and it would be initialed by the principal clerk in the Legal Division.

51,653. Whenever it involves extra expenditure it goes to the Treasury?—Always.

51,654. (Chairman.) Such a question as the provision of a new court would go to the Treasury?—Certainly.

51,655. Then, in addition, have you the charge of the Registry of County Court Judgments?—Yes; that was established under a provision contained in the County Courts Extension Act of 1852, requiring a register to be kept of County Court Judgments for sums of 10*l.* and upwards. Its institution was due to mercantile rather than legal considerations, for, unlike that kept at the Land Registry of High Court Judgments, the registration does not affect transactions with the property of the debtor. Its functions are to provide authentic evidence in an easy form suitable for searchings, &c., to guide traders in their credit transactions. Its utility is undoubted, and chambers of commerce, as well as the various trading associations in the country, to whose efforts the institution of the registry was probably due, would have to be heard on any question as to the necessity or otherwise of continuing to register judgments. The income of the registry is nearly 700*l.* a year, and its cost is under 200*l.* a year.

51,656. It is, therefore, much more than self-supporting?—Much more than self-supporting; it is quite a profitable little department.

51,657. Has any suggestion been made for its discontinuance?—Its abolition was recommended, I believe, by the Judicature Commission years ago, and as recently as five years ago I had a very long letter sent to the Treasury by the then Lord Chancellor from one of the registrars suggesting its abolition, which I had to deal with at considerable length.

51,658. But, in your opinion, it is useful and should be maintained?—I think it is serving a useful purpose.

51,659. Have you any information as to the actual salaries of clerks employed by registrars?—We have no records in the County Courts Department showing the total remuneration of the registrar and his clerks in any of the courts, or the number of clerks. I have obtained from the registrars particulars of the numbers of clerks employed, and I hand in an abstract of the registrars' returns (handing in the same). For purposes of audit, payment to clerks with the names of the clerks employed, are shown in the quarterly accounts rendered by registrars of courts having an allowance for clerk hire, the vouchers being annexed; these are, of course, available should any questions arise. There is no similar information for the courts entering less than 6,000 plaintiffs; if a registrar of such a court claims abatement of income tax in respect of his clerks, I am furnished with particulars of the clerks in respect of which the claim is made; but this is furnished to me in any particular case only as a Commissioner of Income Tax.

51,660. That is merely incidental; it is not part of a system of returns?—No.

51,661. It is entirely a matter for himself to fix?—Yes, many registrars do not claim abatements at all.

51,662. So that although you have not official returns on the subject, you do see in a large number of cases what the amount of salaries is?—Yes, we can see; they are included in the accounts. The examiners see them, and they are also assessors of income tax, so that they see them. I cannot say that I personally see them unless some question arises.

51,663. From what you have seen, can you form any opinion as to how the salaries paid to clerks employed on County Court work would compare with those of clerks employed by the registrar on his own private business?—I do not pretend to know very much about it, because I do not often see these clerks' receipts and I do not know what they are paid; but on one occasion a registrar received in gross income more than 1,400*l.*, and it became necessary to find out whether he received in net income more than 1,400*l.*, and so we had to ask for the production of the receipts. I saw those. Then in some 12 cases during the last 17 years the courts have emerged from the scale below 6,000 plaintiffs and have got into the other category; and there we had to call for the receipts of the clerks, and I saw those. I have also discussed the matter frequently with registrars, and I do not think they are underpaid. I think they are paid something like what a registrar pays his private staff. In 80 per cent. of the courts the staff are housed in the same building as the registrar's private staff; if he does not use the same clerks they are certainly in the same building, and I do not think it is an unnatural thing for a solicitor who is appointed registrar, when he selects his clerks, to select men of something like the same calibre as the other men in his office, and to pay them something like the same salaries, probably a little more. I think that is just what he does.

51,664. (Mr. Coward.) They might do very different work, too; for instance, he might have conveyancers in his office to whom he might pay considerably more than he would pay the man who happened to do the County Court work?—Yes, certainly.

51,665. (Chairman.) Can you compare the work that these clerks do with the work that clerks in an ordinary solicitor's office do?—You can compare it to some extent. In the registrars' offices they prepare the process; in solicitors' offices they prepare the writs and things of that sort, and in the London offices there are men who are called common law clerks who have a great deal of that sort of work to do. I think there is some comparison. I am not dogmatizing at all about it; I only think it probable that what the registrar does is that he selects men of the same calibre as the other clerks in his office, and he gives them something like the same salaries.

51,666. Of what does the work mainly consist in the offices of the County Courts?—There is a great variety of work. Although in the large courts men get into a groove, and are doing the same thing day after day, it is a sort of special routine. A man may be entering nothing but small amounts in a cash book or in a ledger—they are very small amounts as a rule—it may be something like the work, perhaps, of a man in a cash desk who is entering figures all day long; there is nothing much more in it than that. Some of the clerks fill up a good many forms, forms of summonses and various kinds of process. I do not think you could call it intellectual work.

51,667. Does the accounting work constitute a large part of the whole?—A very large part. I should say that of a registrar's work and responsibility fully 60 per cent is financial.

51,668. Is that accounting work of a very simple character?—Quite.

51,669. The entry of small sums paid in by debtors?—Yes, paid by debtors under judgments.

51,670. Which have to be entered in the cash book and brought to proper account in the ledger?—Yes.

14 April 1915.]

MR. BENJAMIN JAMES BRIDGEMAN.

51,671. (Mr. Coward.) Or paid in court before judgment?—Yes, they may be; sums are frequently paid into court before judgment.

51,672. (Chairman.) So that it would be a very simple kind of accounting work?—The bulk of the work consists of very small instalments ordered by the judge to be paid, instalments, say, of 4s. a month; that, I believe, is a very common order in a County Court.

51,673. Work of that kind would not be more complicated than the work of a post office clerk taking savings bank deposits?—I should think not.

51,674. Then as regards the work which is not accounting, would a large part of it consist of filling up forms?—Yes, a good deal of it.

51,675. Is a large part of that work done by means of printed forms to be filled up?—Yes, there are some 500 printed forms.

51,676. (Mr. Coward.) They would have the same work to do with regard to arresting ships, for instance—executions to issue, and all that kind of thing; it would be just the same kind of work as is done in the Superior Court?—They would do that in a solicitor's office rather than in the Superior Court.

51,677. Not the warrants for arresting a ship?—There are very few warrants for arresting ships in the County Courts; it is only where they have Admiralty jurisdiction, and I think there are only 43 courts that have Admiralty jurisdiction out of 493.

51,678. (Chairman.) The suggestion is made in one of the representations from the staff of clerks, that the work covers all the different kinds of work done in the Central Office of the Supreme Court. Can you form any opinion upon that suggestion?—I think that would come better from a registrar having a district registry; I think he could tell you more about it. I know something about it, but I think it would come better from him.

51,679. Are you acquainted with the report of a committee appointed in 1900 by the Lord Chancellor and the Treasury, on certain questions connected with County Courts?—Was that the one over which Sir David Brynmor Jones presided?

51,680. Yes?—That was as to County Court clerks. I assisted the Committee somewhat in the inquiry.

51,681. I find in that report an opinion expressed about the work of the clerks. I will read it to you, and ask whether you concur in it: "We cannot wholly agree with Mr. Grimsdale's characterisation of the 'work of the clerks, &c., as being highly skilled labour' in the sense of being work that requires any very great special training, expert knowledge, or ability above the average. Speaking broadly, the work is of a very specialised routine character. Unlike the work of those clerks in solicitors' offices who are not merely keeping books, but doing the necessarily varied work of such an establishment, it resembles rather the work of a bank clerk. No knowledge of law is requisite for most of the work that is performed by the ordinary County Court clerk, though, of course, it is greatly to the advantage of the suitor in person that there should be at any rate one man in the office to whom he can appeal for aid in drawing his particulars of demand, and occasionally in other matters. What, over and above the qualities of a good clerk, the ordinary County Court clerk requires is good temper, the capacity of doing dull and monotonous work with patience, and the faculty of being courteous in dealing with illiterate and sometimes rough and irritable persons." Do you think that is a fair statement?—I think it is fairly accurate. Instead of saying a bank clerk, I should say a clerk in a Post Office doing Savings Bank business at the counter. I think that a bank clerk is a rather more important personage altogether, and has more important duties than those of receiving and paying cash in the County Court.

51,682. I ought to add that the report makes an exception as regards cases where the registrar does not perform many duties himself, and where, consequently, the senior clerk in the office has for a great many purposes to take the place of the registrar; in those cases it is stated in the report that the work is of a decidedly better character. Would you concur in that view?—Yes, I think so: I think that is right.

51,683. On page 10 of that Report there is also a statement of the staff employed at the Bow County Court. In that court nine clerks are employed with salaries varying between 400*l.*, which is the highest, and 80*l.*, which is the lowest. Should you judge from your experience that those salaries might be taken as fairly representative of a court of that class?—In London I should say yes, though the chief clerk at Bow gets now 500*l.*, and I am not sure what they get in the other London courts; but I think that is about right as a fair sample. I am not sure that the chief clerks generally get as much as 400*l.*, certainly not from the clerk hire allowance; they may get it by additions made to them by the registrar from his fees. I have got the particulars of the Lambeth County Court staff here, which perhaps might be of use. (Handing in the same).

51,684. It is not stated in the report whether those salaries include any additional remuneration from fees or not. Do you think that they include such remuneration, or are they the salaries without extra remuneration?—You mean the fees on page 10?

51,685. Yes?—No, that is entirely clerk hire allowance. I remember the figures very well.

51,686. So that there will be some additional remuneration from fees for special work?—Yes.

51,687. Can you tell us how many complaints there are in the Lambeth Court?—In round figures 10,000.

51,688. There appear to be seven clerks with salaries varying between a maximum of 300*l.* and a minimum of 80*l.*?—Yes.

51,689. The total allowance for clerk hire being 1,200*l.*?—Yes.

51,690. They also receive additional remuneration under Schedule B varying apparently for individuals between a maximum of 70*l.* and a minimum of something over 20*l.*?—Yes.

51,691. Is that a court in which the registrar does a great part of the work himself?—He does very little, I think, except his judicial work; he is a practising solicitor in London.

51,692. So that the senior clerk who receives a salary of 300*l.* a year would be doing the greater part of the administrative duties of the registrar?—I think he would.

51,693. In the cases where the County Court registrar is also a district registrar of the Supreme Court, what is the arrangement as regards staff?—There is a common staff for the two as a rule. There are not more than 16 courts where they are obliged to have a special clerk for district registry work.

51,694. In those cases where there is a common staff how is the remuneration arranged?—The registrar is paid a special allowance in respect of the district registry work, and he is supposed to remunerate the clerks out of that.

51,695. That is to say, he receives two allowances, one for the district registry work and one for the County Court registry work?—The special allowance is in the nature of remuneration to him personally as district registrar, and out of that he employs and pays his own clerks.

51,696. Then as district registrar does he receive no allowance ear-marked for clerks?—Not at all, unless he is a pensionable registrar. Where he is a pensionable registrar he gets no other sort of remuneration, and then the fees are accounted for and paid over, and therefore he gets an allowance for clerks from the Supreme Court. That is charged to the Supreme Court Vote and is paid direct by the Paymaster-General for Supreme Court business. I have nothing to do with that except fixing the allowance.

51,697. When he is not a pensionable registrar he receives as district registrar an inclusive salary out of which he employs such part as he thinks fit on the payment of clerks?—It is not called a salary; he gets so much per writ. He is paid by the piece.

51,698. Is the district registrar not paid a salary?—He is paid in the same way; he is paid by results, which is the same thing.

14 April 1915.]

Mr. BENJAMIN JAMES BRIDGEMAN.

51,699. In all cases?—In all cases, except in the case of pensionable registrars, who have an inclusive salary.

51,700. When you speak of pensionable registrars you mean pensionable County Court registrars?—Yes.

51,701. In such cases does he receive an addition to his salary as district registrar of the High Court?—An ordinary County Court registrar who is a district registrar of the High Court is paid so much for each writ issued in the district registry, and that is his remuneration. Out of that he pays his clerks for their assistance. If he is a pensionable registrar he gets an inclusive salary for all his duties, whether County Court, or District Registry, or Bankruptcy, or whatever it may be; the whole thing is commuted for a fixed salary; and that is the net salary of a pensionable registrar. In addition to that, he gets an allowance for clerk hire in the County Court from the County Court Vote, and he gets an allowance for clerk hire for the District Registry work from the Supreme Court Vote, and that is paid to him by the Paymaster-General for Supreme Court business under Treasury sanction.

51,702. In such cases is the salary divided up into two parts for the purposes of the Estimates?—Yes, it is apportioned.

51,703. Then the payment of the high bailiff's staff is partly a piecework payment, is it not?—Yes, the payment to the high bailiff for service and execution of process was originally composed of details of the process, and was calculated upon a scale, the basis of which was distance. For the service of a summons he received 3d. if the service were within one mile of the court house. The allowance increased with every mile, becoming 2s. 6d. beyond seven miles, and 6d. extra for every mile beyond eight. For the execution of a warrant he received double those rates. The allowance included travelling expenses and all payments to the bailiffs employed. After 1870, mainly to save the work of auditing the numerous details, a different arrangement was made as vacancies occurred. A fixed allowance was granted, calculated on the average produce of the scale in a period of three years. There is now no automatic fluctuation with a rise or fall in the work. On a substantial increase of business, an application is made to the Treasury to revise the allowance, which is then raised accordingly. On the other hand, should the work fall off, a reduction is effected only as a vacancy occurs in the staff of bailiffs.

51,704. That change of system must have very much simplified the work?—Yes, it has saved a great deal of labour.

51,705. Under the old system it was necessary to audit a number of minute payments and changes?—Yes.

51,706. The present system may be broadly described as a system of piece-work or payment by results?—Yes.

51,707. The staff is considered to be in the employment of the individual registrars and is not pensionable; the clerks are not Civil servants?—No, they are not.

51,708. The individual registrars are appointed by the County Court judge, and the registrar's staff is appointed by the registrars, who are responsible for them?—Yes.

51,709. You are aware that claims have been put forward by the staff that that system is wrong, that the whole staff ought to be treated as in the direct employment of the State, given the status of Civil servants and made pensionable; and I presume it would follow from that that the system of appointment should be changed and that they should not be appointed by the individual registrars?—I think that must follow.

51,710. We should like to have your opinion on that claim, and generally as to whether the arguments put forward in favour of that claim have any validity?—There is, first of all, an explanation, which I think the Commissioners ought to have, as to why the existing system of payment by result was introduced, if I may deal with that point.

51,711. If you please?—When the County Courts were established it was not possible to foretell the extent to which they would be used and the consequent amount of work and responsibility that would be thrown upon the officers. There was no foundation upon which to construct a scheme of fixed salaries, and the Legislature decided that the officers should be paid by fees, a means adopted for securing that the officers should receive a fair equivalent for their services. The courts were a success; the officers had a direct interest in their efficiency; but the fees, of which there were several tables, were high; and the subject came up for review by a Royal Commission (appointed by Lord Palmerston in 1853). The Commissioners made their report in 1855, recommending the abolition of certain fees and the institution of a scheme of salaries fluctuating with the amount of business to be transacted, measured by plaints. This scheme was adopted (except that instead of an initial salary of 60*l.*, this was fixed at 120*l.*, reduced to 100*l.* in 1888), thus again giving the officers a direct interest in the amount of business drawn to the courts. It seems to have been a good plan; anyhow, it is endorsed by nearly 70 years of efficiency. Its necessity depends upon whether the County Court business is of so stable a character as to justify a fixed salary.

51,712. Do you think it can be said that that particular system contributed largely to the efficiency of the County Court system generally?—I think so. I think it had a great deal to do with it.

51,713. In what way?—I mean to say that the registrars had a direct interest in keeping their staff efficient, in keeping their offices in a state of efficiency, the system providing a stimulus to prudence and energy in the selection of their clerks and management of their offices.

51,714. Do you mean because it was their interest to attract business?—Certainly; unless everything were done in that efficient way, it is obvious that people would not think it worth while to trouble the County Court registrars at all.

51,715. You think that if the registrar did not have a direct pecuniary interest in the success of his court, he would not have the same incentive or inducement to satisfy the public?—I do think so.

51,716. (Sir John Kempe.) I suppose by attracting business you mean not driving away business?—Yes, not driving away business.

51,717. (Sir Donald MacAlister.) The suitors always have the alternative of the High Court?—Yes, in many cases they have.

51,718. (Chairman.) Have they other alternatives besides the High Court?—They have; there are Courts of Record, and in London there is the Mayor's Court; in Salford there is the Salford Court of Record; in Derby there is the Derby Court of Record, and in many places there are Courts of Record.

51,719. And apart from the question of alternative courts, if the business is not done quickly and efficiently, and to the satisfaction of the public, they would prefer to let small debts go?—Yes, I have had experience of that. I have actually seen, where the registrar has not been as attentive as he ought to be, that the business has fallen off.

51,720. What is the present position as regards the business of the County Courts; is it increasing or diminishing?—The tendency at the present time is to diminish, and I think that will continue, and will become more marked if the power of securing obedience to the orders of the Court by imprisonment should be seriously interfered with. The basis of a fixed salary would presumably be the statistics of a series of past years, say, three or five, and in the circumstances that could hardly be recommended.

51,721. Are you speaking of a fixed salary for the registrar just now, or for the staff?—A fixed salary for the registrar. The present arrangement is economical. A court is sometimes affected by the removal of a trading firm from one district to another, and in such a case the loss to the former of, say, 1,000 plaints a year, can be adjusted without expense. With fixed salaries this would not be so. The officer whose business had been taken away would still receive his salary; the officer who had acquired the increase of business would expect his fixed salary to be increased unless it were a statutory one.

Mr. BENJAMIN JAMES BRIDGEMAN.

51,722. The automatic decrease of which you speak applies to courts below 6,000?—Yes.

51,723. You told us that in courts above 6,000 an adjustment downwards does not take place, or only takes place on a vacancy?—An adjustment downwards, you mean, in the case of clerks. I was speaking here of a fixed salary for registrars. The fixed salary now for registrars above 6,000 is 700*l*.

51,724. What is the minimum net salary?—The minimum net salary is 650*l*. There is only a margin of 50*l*., which is equivalent to 12*s*. 6*d*. for every 25 pounds.

51,725. Within those somewhat narrow limits, does adjustment downwards ever take place?—Yes.

51,726. Even although there has not been a fresh appointment of registrar?—Yes.

51,727. Does adjustment downwards in the allowance for clerk hire take place if there is a diminution of business?—Adjustment downwards, no. In the case of clerk hire we cannot touch it unless there is a vacancy—or we never do, speaking generally.

51,728. Once raised it remains up until there is a vacancy?—Yes; and that accounts for the clerks saying that sometimes a court with more business is getting a less allowance than another court with less business. A registrar applies to the Treasury, after a series of prosperous years, and gets his clerk hire raised, and then that may go on for a period of five years perhaps, and the complaints drop, but you have not been able to effect any reduction in the clerk hire allowance; whereas, in some other court with rather more complaints, and with a smaller allowance, the clerks complain and say they are not getting enough. That, of course, is one of the inequalities that you cannot help. I do not see how you could adjust a thing of that sort unless you took the arbitrary method of reducing the allowance to the larger court which has, since the fixing of this allowance, become a smaller court by a reduction of business. Of course the object in not reducing the allowance is not to cause hardship to the clerks.

51,729. Is that hardship not caused in the smaller courts if there is a diminution of business?—I do not believe it ever is caused; I believe the registrar is very good to his clerks.

51,730. You mean that if there is a diminution the registrar takes it off his own part of the remuneration and not off his clerks?—Yes, I quite believe it.

51,731. If the diminution of business was large I presume he would meet it by a reduction in the number of his clerks?—It is possible that he might do so. I have not heard that he has. I think many of the registrars have been very badly hit by the war and are paying their clerks exactly the same as they did before; they are suffering the loss, not the clerks.

51,732. Do you think that the system of payment by results has conduced to the efficiency of the courts and the convenience of the public?—Yes, entirely.

51,733. Do you think there are any objections to which it is open from the point of view of the administration of justice?—I do not think there is any reason to suppose that there is anything prejudicial to justice in such a system. The officers can only attract business to the County Court by keeping their office and staff in a state of efficiency. It is possible that if a judge will not exercise his power to commit to prison in proper cases, people will refrain from proceeding in the court because of the uselessness of going to the expense of obtaining a judgment which cannot be enforced. In such matters, however, no judge would be influenced by the officers of the court to commit debtors to prison against his own inclination. That, I think, was the suggestion of the clerks. It has been suggested also, as an objection to payment by results, that a registrar may be led to grant leave to issue a summons in his court against a person residing out of the district on insufficient grounds, for the sake of increasing his salary. I think that there are two answers to that objection: in the first place his brother registrars' remuneration would be lessened and they would object.

51,734. (Mr. Coward.) They would not hear of it?—Yes, they would, because the summons would be sent to them for service, and they would return it; and they occasionally have done so; I have had three cases in 17 years. And in the next place, the defendant himself could question the jurisdiction. Three instances have come before me in 17 years, and in each case the information came from a registrar who thought the action belonged to his court. I struck those three complaints out of the respective registrars' claims for salary, leaving them to appeal to the Lord Chancellor if they thought proper to do so.

51,735. Probably the proportion of cases such as you have just been discussing would be very small in comparison with the number of complaints issued in the particular court?—Yes. It is a ridiculous suggestion altogether, because unless the registrar could get 25 of them he could not get an increase in his salary at all.

51,736. (Chairman.) From the point of view of the clerks themselves, will you give us your opinion as to the arguments they put forward, the main argument being that they are employed on work of the State, that in many cases they are in whole-time employment, and therefore they consider that they ought to be treated as Civil servants and placed upon the permanent establishment?—Well, we have rather been on that, I think, in the evidence before—I mean as to the utility of the present system and as to its success and efficiency; all that, I rather think, is in favour of preserving a system under which the registrar has carte blanche and can do as he pleases with his staff.

51,737. I should like to go a little further into that point. You attach importance, I gather, to the personal control that the registrar exercises over clerks whom he appoints himself, and whom he can dismiss himself?—Yes.

51,738. If the staff were made permanent Civil servants, the registrar would not have that individual power of appointment and dismissal, presumably?—He would not have power either to appoint or dismiss, I imagine.

51,739. And you consider that that would seriously interfere with his powers of control over his staff?—Yes.

51,740. Would that argument not apply practically to the whole of the Civil Service?—I dare say it would.

51,741. Throughout the Civil Service you constantly have a staff under the control of an officer who has not himself power of appointment or dismissal of the staff?—Yes, I should think it would probably apply; but then there is no head of a Civil Service department who has to undertake the risks that registrars and high bailiffs have to undertake.

51,742. There are public departments which deal with large amounts of money, in which individual members of the staff are constantly dealing with large amounts of money, and in that case, if there are losses, somebody has to be made responsible?—I suppose that somebody would be the delinquent; it would not be the head of his department, unless there was negligence, and that could be proved against him.

51,743. Probably not; but is there any conclusive reason why that individual responsibility of the head of the department should be more essential in the case of County Courts than in the case, say, of a post office?—It is a difficult question to answer.

51,744. I will put it to you in this way. In a post office large sums of money pass through the hands of the staff—very much larger sums, taking the aggregate, than pass through the hands of County Court officials. A postmaster, or the head of a post office, is not responsible for any deficiency on the part of his subordinates; the subordinate in whose hands the deficiency occurs is responsible. That system works satisfactorily, certainly so far as the aggregate amount of losses is concerned, which is insignificant. Is there any conclusive reason why a similar system should be out of the question in the case of County Court staffs?—When you say a conclusive reason, I do not quite know whether we are starting on a clean sheet, or whether we have to take things as we find them; because it certainly is a conclusive reason if the Act puts the responsibility upon the registrar and makes him give security for everything. I do not know whether you would consider that a conclusive reason; that is, taking things as we find them. If it was contemplated to alter that position it might be different.

Mr. BENJAMIN JAMES BRIDGEMAN.

51,745. If the position of the staff were to be altered in the manner they suggest, clearly legislation would be necessary; therefore we may take into consideration any amendments of the Act that would be necessary for the purpose of such alteration?—If that were so, then, instead of taking security from the registrar to cover everything that happens in his office, we could only take security to cover his personal acts or negligence.

51,746. (Mr. Coward.) Have you ever made a registrar responsible for anything else?—Yes, always. It does not matter in the least whether he knows anything about it, he is responsible for everything; he indemnifies the State and indemnifies the individual.

51,747. (Chairman.) Does the registrar often take fidelity guarantees from his staff?—Yes, I believe he frequently does; but they do not cover everything; they do not cover mistakes. The registrar is responsible for mistakes. If a man makes a mistake and carries an amount to a wrong account in the ledger and it gets paid out to the suitor, the registrar has to make it good.

51,748. Have you any idea of the amount of losses incurred by registrars on that account?—I am afraid I have not. Defalcations are considerable, not as considerable as they used to be. When I first went there we used to get one about every fortnight; we get about six in 12 months now. Sometimes they are considerable, as much as 400*l.* or 500*l.*, and we have had them 700*l.* The registrars have to find the money.

51,749. (Sir John Kempe.) Fidelity guarantees can be made to cover mistakes?—Oh, they can? Thank you.

51,750. (Chairman.) I gather that you think the present system of responsibility works satisfactorily, and that you would not be in favour of the alteration of that system that would be necessary if the staff were to be made independent of individual appointment and dismissal by the registrar?—I think this is the best system; I think it is a system that has been successful, and it is perfectly easy as a matter of administration. At present we have some 560 points of contact, so to speak. If you had an army of established clerks and bailiffs, each with the right to approach either the Lord Chancellor or the Treasury on questions of discipline which are now left to the discretion of the registrar, I imagine that the system of control and administration would require strengthening and would become more costly. Then there is the question of audit which, although it is a subsidiary one, cannot be entirely disregarded. The transactions in County Courts, often small in amount, number millions, and such an audit as would be required if the registrars could not be held personally responsible would cost far more than it does at present. The millions of postings from cash books to ledgers could not be checked by my present staff of examiners, nor has it been necessary to check them, because any deficiency on the audited balance sheet has always been made good by the registrar. But when his liability is repudiated, it would not be possible to fix liability for defalcations or mistakes upon any particular clerk, without auditing every posting; in other words, the audit would have to be a complete one, and a very large addition to the staff would have to be faced.

51,751. Is there any detailed audit at present of registrars' accounts?—Yes, the audit that used to be conducted by the treasurers has been taken over by the County Courts Department. I have men who travel from court to court and examine the accounts; they are examining the fees. In fact, I have here a statement in detail of their duties, and I think, perhaps, rather than my giving oral evidence on this subject, it would be better if I were to hand in that statement; it is a lengthy one (handing in the same).

51,752. Thank you. I take it that the principal object of the claim put forward on behalf of the clerks, or one of the principal objects, is to obtain pensions. Do you think from your experience that practical inconvenience arises at present from the absence of a pension system?—I do not think any inconvenience arises. I think that probably some of the junior clerks are retarded in their promotion because men stay on. I know of one case of a man, 81 years of age, who has been in the County Court probably all his life under successive registrars, and he is still efficient. He has had the advantage, of course, of that; he has been earning his salary, whereas, if he had been a Civil servant, he would have retired at 65 on pension. But I do not think there is any other sort of inconvenience.

51,753. A fixed age for retirement does not necessarily go with a system of pensions?—In the case of legal departments, I suppose it does not.

51,754. Although there is a system of pensions it is the case, nevertheless, in legal departments, that a certain number of officers remain to an advanced age?—Yes.

51,755. So that a system of pensions in itself would not deal with the question of promotion?—No. Then I do not see, unless you could compel a man to retire at a certain age, that a pension would be any advantage to a County Court officer, because he remains on as long as he can work.

51,756. But what happens in the case of a man who gets beyond his work?—If a man gets beyond the work he has been accustomed to do, they give him some other duty, and as a rule, he earns something certainly sufficient to keep him alive.

51,757. And if a man breaks down from ill-health or incapacity of some kind?—If a man breaks down he is allowed his full salary for six months; or if he comes under the Insurance Scheme he gets his full salary for six weeks and half salary for 40 weeks. The two together are the equivalent of six months' salary. He gets nothing beyond that.

51,759. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) When you say he is allowed that, do you mean that he is allowed it by the individual kindness of the registrar, or is there any rule of the Treasury which enforces it?—The Treasury does not enforce anything, but if the registrar submits the case to the Treasury, it will come under the usual Treasury regulation; the Treasury will allow as a concession the usual thing in the case of injured servants, namely, six weeks on full pay. It is Section 47, I think, of the National Insurance Act; they get full pay for six weeks.

51,760. I am not talking of the National Insurance Act, I am talking about your statement that they get six months' full pay, which you spoke of apparently as a universal rule. How is that rule enforced?—It never is enforced; it is rather in the nature of a concession. If a registrar applies for it, he always applies that a substitute shall be appointed during the man's sick leave; it comes in that way. It means an extra payment by the Treasury allowed in the registrars' accounts.

51,761. (Chairman.) In fact, it is an addition to the clerk-hire allowance for that particular purpose?—Yes.

51,762. Have any suggestions ever been made for a contributory pension system?—Yes, I believe your Secretary has a précis of the Treasury correspondence about it. Some two years ago, I think it was, Mr. Hobhouse was approached at Bristol by Mr. Hemans and some other clerk employed at the Bristol Court, who suggested that there should be some scheme of contributory pensions. Mr. Hobhouse said he was quite willing to consider it; he did not promise any money, but if they proved that it was a suitable scheme advised on by an actuary, he would be very glad to consider it; he gave them some encouragement in that way without promising any money. But it never came to anything, because they were unable to get from the County Court clerks particulars of their ages and salaries. I do not know how that was. It raised a suspicion in my mind that they were not fully representative; because if the County Court clerks in courts over 6,000 plaintiffs were all joined in a sort of society to forward their own interests, one would suppose that there would be no difficulty in getting all the information wanted. But there was difficulty, and the thing dropped.

14 April 1915.]

MR. BENJAMIN JAMES BRIDGEMAN.

51,763. No scheme has ever been put forward?—No.

51,764. Does a scheme of that kind exist in the City of London Court?—I am told that it does. I do not know anything about it personally. I am told there is some such scheme.

51,765. I see in the report of the 1900 Committee a statement that the clerks of the City of London Court pay 2½ per cent to a pension fund. You are not acquainted with the details of that fund?—No, I am not. I do not know anything about it.

51,766. Do you see, prima facie, any reason why a contributory scheme should not work for County Court clerks?—I do not see why it should not. There are plenty of them, I should think quite enough of them, to form a very good scheme.

51,767. There is one point that has not been mentioned yet that has some bearing on a pension scheme. When there is a change in the registrar he has the power of appointing a fresh staff if he likes, has he not?—He has the power, but he does not exercise it.

51,768. As a matter of fact, is the staff ever changed on a change of registrar?—I should say No. I have not made enquiries, but I have never heard of a case in which the registrar has changed his clerks on appointment.

51,769. You think that they have practically permanency of tenure?—I think so, practically; they are always retained by the registrar's successors.

51,770. At any rate they have sufficient permanency to make a pension scheme perfectly practicable?—I think so.

51,771. The absence of security of tenure has been put forward by the clerks as one of the grounds on which they claim that they should be made permanent Civil servants, or rather one of the objections that they raise to the present system. I gather from what you say, that in practice you do not think that objection has very much force?—I feel quite sure it has none, or very little.

51,772. Do you consider that to meet the claim for establishment on the part of the clerks would be likely to increase the total cost of the offices or not?—I think it would. I had a letter, which perhaps you will allow me to read, some years ago when Sir David Brynmor Jones' Committee was sitting, which came from the man who was then chairman of the Registrars' Association. I wrote to him for his views and he sent them to me, and I believe they are the views of the registrars generally. I have a copy of the letter here, if I may read it.

51,773. If you please?—"Dear Mr. Bridgeman, The subject of pensions to registrars' clerks should not be dealt with without full consideration. If pensions are to be given, they must necessarily be so on the Treasury having the right to control the registrars in the promotion and discharge of their clerks. The risks, money, and otherwise, attached to the office of every registrar are too great to allow of his being deprived of the fullest control of his office staff. To allow an unsatisfactory clerk, whom the registrar feels he cannot keep with safety to himself or advantage to the public service, to have a right of appeal to the Treasury, would result in duties having to be undertaken by that department which could not be satisfactorily performed. The Treasury could not attempt to decide all cases on the personal attendance of the registrars and their clerks, nor would the settlement of matters by correspondence be practicable. The fact of a decision adverse to the registrar in any case, would place him in a most difficult position, and would weaken his legitimate authority. A registrar might have the gravest suspicions of the honesty of a clerk and yet not be able to substantiate a case against him; under such circumstances, it may be asked if the registrar must keep the clerk, or is it only open to him to make an apparently unfounded complaint to the Treasury. If the Treasury are prepared to make good all losses arising from dishonest, inefficient, or careless clerks, some of the objections I have raised may not exist. I feel, however, that under any circumstances, if the registrars are not to have the fullest power in the management "of their offices, a larger outlay for clerks' salaries may be expected, as it is certain that clerks will not do as much work for registrars who are not their masters as they will for those on whom they are dependent." That was from the late Mr. F. F. Clarke, Registrar of Walsall.

51,774. You concur generally in the opinions expressed in that letter?—I concur entirely in those views.

51,775. Turning now to your own department, have you an established staff?—Yes, we have an established staff of examiners and assistant clerks, with a staff clerk coming between.

51,776. How are your examiners appointed?—The examiners are the pick of the County Court clerks. Numbers of them apply for appointment and they are kept on a waiting list in the Treasury, and when a vacancy occurs, four of the most promising are selected and come up for examination.

51,777. Examination by the Civil Service Commissioners?—No; I examine them in the presence of a principal clerk of the Treasury.

51,778. By that do you mean a verbal examination or a written examination?—A verbal examination. I ask them about 50 questions on the subjects of the County Court and the district registry, and on the result of that examination we get the man most familiar with the work; then he is recommended to the Treasury, and the Lords of the Treasury appoint him as an examiner subject to his obtaining the Civil Service certificate.

51,779. Having obtained the Civil Service certificate and having been appointed, he then becomes a permanent Civil servant and is pensionable?—Yes.

51,780. Subject to the ordinary Civil Service rules and regulations?—Yes.

51,781. At what age are they generally appointed?—The average age is 35.

51,782. And you find the result satisfactory?—Yes, on the whole. I think we get the pick of the County Court clerks.

51,783. Are you satisfied with the organisation of the office?—Yes, I think quite so. Of course we are on three floors; if we could get all on to one floor it would be more convenient.

51,784. Your staff come under the ordinary Civil Service rules as regards hours of attendance, leave, sick leave, and so forth?—Generally speaking, yes.

51,785. (Mr. Boutwood.) I have only one question to ask you. Have you in front of you the statement of the County Court clerks?—I have it here.

51,786. On the last page, in paragraph 3, they say: "The County Court officials, by the alteration of the words of the last County Court Act, after assurance from the Treasury that no alteration in their status would be made, were astounded to find that their position as Government servants is interfered with." What does that mean?—I know what it means; but I thought that statement had been withdrawn. The late Chancellor of the Exchequer under the previous Government, Mr. Austen Chamberlain, received a deputation from these clerks, which was introduced by Sir David Brynmor Jones, and he most completely withdrew that allegation which is now repeated. It is really an allegation of bad faith on the part of the Treasury, for which there is no foundation whatever. It arose in this way. In the Act of 1856, 19 & 20 Victoria, cap. 108, there was a provision that, in the case of certain registrars who were taken over from Courts of Request, their net salaries should not be less than they were in their former positions; but in order to arrive at that, the clerks' salaries had to be deducted, and there was a provision as regards those registrars that the Treasury should decide the number of clerks to be employed, and the salaries to be paid to them. That was not in favour of the clerks; it was not to give them any status, but it was to see that the registrar's net salary was ascertained in the proper way. That was the real object of it; but the clerks seemed to think that it gave them some sort of status, and the general body of clerks in the County Courts seem to have taken it as applying to themselves, although it only applied to particular courts where the registrars had been taken over from the old Courts of Request. When the Consolidation Act of 1888 was under consideration, the clerks wrote to Mr. Nicol, asking whether their status was likely to be altered, and he replied, No; that there was no intention of altering their status; but inasmuch as all these old officers had died out, that provision about those clerks was not inserted in the Act of 1888. That is the foundation for this allegation.

Mr. BENJAMIN JAMES BRIDGEMAN.

51,787. (Sir Donald MacAlister.) The old provision could not have applied to any of the clerks who are now presenting this allegation?—No.

51,788. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) Would you agree that the system which you call payment by results was at one time almost universal in the public service?—I am afraid I do not know.

51,789. It applied to the collection of revenue, it applied to the Commissioner of Stamps, who used to receive a percentage on what he collected?—It applied largely in the Law Courts.

51,790. It applied to the expenditure of public revenues and to the Paymaster-General also; he and his subordinates received a percentage on what was paid?—I am afraid my knowledge is rather limited about it. I do not know. I will take it from you.

51,791. You may take it that from 150 to 100 years ago there was a very large system in the public service of payment by fees, the fees depending upon the extent of business done?—I dare say it was so. I will certainly take it from you.

51,792. Could you say whether in the 19th century there has been in the public service generally a marked and general diminution in that system?—As I do not know much about its existence, I am afraid I cannot compare the two periods.

51,793. Then in that case, if I may go to existing facts, you say that a system of payment by fixed salaries would be difficult because the amount of work in any particular County Court varies. A court you say is sometimes affected by the removal of a debtor from one district to another?—Yes.

51,794. That would apply in such instances as the excise also; the amount of business in a particular excise district might be enormously affected by the opening or shutting of a great distillery, might it not?—I should think it might.

51,795. That does not prevent, in the Inland Revenue Department, the payment of fixed salaries, does it?—Really I do not know what they do; but I will accept it from you that it does not.

51,796. You can imagine at any rate that it would be possible, if the business in a particular area were very largely increased by the opening of a great distillery, to appoint another official, and if the business largely decreased by the shutting of a great distillery, it would be possible to meet that by the transference of an official?—Yes.

51,797. Is not that conceivable also in the case of County Court business?—I do not know whether the two things are comparable. In the case of registrars, the registrar would get a fixed salary. I do not know who the corresponding officer would be in the excise; probably the collector. The collector has a fixed salary, but he has a very great variety of duties, I imagine, and if one is falling off another is coming on, probably.

51,798. But if in a certain district there is a large shift of population or a large shift of distilling, it is possible to increase or diminish the number of collectors in the district?—I should think it is quite possible to do that, to transfer a collector somewhere else and to put another collector there, as you were saying. I do not know whether you could do that with the registrars, unless you had power under some Act of Parliament.

51,799. Assuming throughout that our business is to advise Parliament on legislation as well as to advise the executive Government on Orders in Council, would you not agree that undoubtedly almost anything we are likely to propose with regard to different departments would require legislation?—I should think that is extremely likely to be so.

51,800. (Chairman.) In any question of transfer of clerks, would not great difficulty arise from the fact that in most cases the registrars have private business of their own as well?—Yes, there is that difficulty, and a very serious difficulty, too. That is why I do not think there is any comparison.

51,801. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) That, again would be a difficulty that used to apply to nearly the whole of the public service, and must have been got over by appointing extra officials or by transfer?—I think it would be extremely difficult in the case of registrars of County Courts.

51,802. Then you stated that the basis of a fixed salary would be presumably the statistics of a series of past years. Now, when an attempt is made to provide everybody with a sufficient amount of work as, for instance, for the excise, no such basis is in fact used, is it?—There, again, I am afraid I am quite ignorant of that; but I can tell you that that is the practice in the Treasury with regard to the registrar of a County Court. If we give a fixed salary it is always based on the average of the produce of his various remunerations for three years, his net remuneration.

51,803. But, supposing we were appointing a system of superintending postmasters or postmasters of large districts, you might vary the district so as to provide sufficient work for a good man, instead of taking the district as fixed and varying the salary according to the return of business, might you not?—But here you could not vary the district.

51,804. (Mr. Coward.) The registrar is fixed there?—Yes.

51,805. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) But do you think it would not be possible in course of time so to rearrange the County Court districts that there shall not be, either for judge or registrar, any district which does not provide adequate work for a man in the enjoyment of a good fixed salary?—I do not see how you could. But the object of the Legislature was entirely different; the object of the Legislature was to provide convenient centres for people regardless altogether of the amount of business to be drawn to those centres.

51,806. Then in the Paper which we have from one of the County Court officials, Mr. Fletcher, he is quoting judges, and he says: "One of these judges said in effect that he regretted that the registrars of courts under 6,000 plaintiffs were paid by results, as he felt that his registrars, all excellent men, could not but be influenced by this circumstance, though entirely sub-consciously, in their attitude towards such questions as judgment summons and imprisonment for debt." Would you agree with that statement?—I do not know what it means.

51,807. It was apparently made to a meeting of persons thoroughly familiar with the system by a person who is professionally employed under the system; but you think it had in fact no meaning?—I should say that it has no meaning unless it is a very base innuendo.

51,808. I only want to know. Do not you think it is more likely that it had some meaning than no meaning, even if it was a base innuendo?—I think that the innuendo is that the judge and the registrar conspire together to increase the business by committing people to prison.

51,809. And you think that innuendo may be neglected?—I think so; I hope so.

51,810. But would you agree that it is not purely a question of deliberate conspiracy, but it may be a question of a difference of opinion—a difference of feeling on a very difficult point?—But it has no real meaning at all, unless it means that from the clerks' point of view. They are trying to show the effect of payment by results, and, if it means anything, it means that the registrar tries to get a larger salary by having people committed to prison. Unless it has that meaning, it has no meaning at all from the clerks' point of view.

51,811. In the memorandum which you have submitted to us, you say: "It is possible that if a judge will not exercise his power to commit to prison in proper cases, people will refrain from proceeding in the court because of the uselessness of going to the expense of obtaining a judgment which cannot be enforced." There, I think, you make no innuendo against the judge. It is a very difficult question of opinion whether people ought to be committed in certain cases to prison or not, and you think that some judges may exercise their discretion wrongly on that difficult point; they may, as you think, not commit to prison people whom they ought?—I think they refrain from exercising their discretion at all, and decline to commit because they are biased against imprisonment for debt, as they call it.

Mr. BENJAMIN JAMES BRIDGEMAN.

51,812. Then you agree, without making any base innuendo, that a judge may commit to prison too little?—Yes, I do, most certainly. I have had experience of it.

51,813. But you think it is quite inconceivable that he may commit to prison too much?—I do not even say that; but I do object to the suggestion that the registrar influences him to commit.

51,814. But you would agree that if it is conceivable that he does commit to prison too much, then the revenue connected with his court in certain cases—the payment assigned to the officials—would increase, or might increase?—I think it would. I think that if suitors found that they could get their money by coming to that court, they certainly would come.

51,815. I am assuming in this case that he commits to prison too much, more than you think desirable. In that case the revenue would be larger than if he committed to prison to the exact extent that you think desirable?—I cannot say “too much.” I can say that relatively to other judges he commits more. I do not think that I am in a position to say “too much,” but I say that relatively he commits more than another judge would.

51,816. But while it is a serious evil that a judge may commit to prison too little, you will agree that it is at least an equally serious evil if he commits to prison too much?—Yes, quite so, without committing myself to either. Whether they do or not, the registrar has no power to commit anybody to prison.

51,817. You refer, I see, in your memorandum to a certain difficulty arising from the absence of pensions; you say that, “A difficulty confronting the registrars is, ‘I think, how to dispense with the services of their ‘clerks when they are past work’; you would agree that there is such a difficulty?—There is such a difficulty, which they endeavour to deal with as far as they can.”

51,818. Would you mind outlining the way in which you think that difficulty ought to be dealt with?—The way in which the registrars actually deal with it is this: If a man is an inefficient man the difficulty, of course, does not arise at all because of his age; but if he becomes inefficient on account of age, then, I believe, as a rule, they give some less important duty to the man and keep him on at a less remuneration.

51,819. Then you would say that there is a difficulty confronting the registrar as to how to dispense with the service of clerks when they are past work, and they get over the difficulty by not dispensing with them at all, even although they are, as you say, past work?—I did not say past work, did I? I said, less efficient than they were before.

51,820. I do not want to cross-examine you, but your words are “when they are past work”?—Have I said that? I beg your pardon. There may be cases in which they are past work. I do not know how many cases.

51,821. I assume that there must be cases, because you say, “The difficulty confronting the registrars is, ‘I think, how to dispense with the services of their ‘clerks when they are past work.’ It is a difficulty, I think, we all feel, and we want your help as to how you would propose in that particular case, when a man was in fact past work, to deal with the difficulty; how you think the registrar ought at present to deal with that difficulty?—I do not quite know what he ought to do. I suppose he would deal with the man somewhat in the same way as he would if he were in his private office.”

51,822. (Mr. Coward.) Give him lighter work to do?—Yes. I do not intend that “past work” should mean that the man was entirely unable to do anything. I think it was probably an unwise phrase to use. I think I ought to have said “less efficient than formerly.”

51,823. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) But you tell us that as regards tenure, “I do not think a clerk is ever dismissed except for misconduct,” do you not?—I agree to that; those are my words.

51,824. If a man is never dismissed except for misconduct, if he is kept on till death in all cases except for misconduct, surely there must be cases in which they are past work?—I am afraid I cannot say more than I have said on that subject.

51,825. Then you say that, “If the whole body of ‘clerks and bailiffs were established, each would have ‘the right to approach either the Lord Chancellor or ‘the Treasury on matters of discipline.’ Now, there is a great body of Post Office officials and a great body of Excise officials, and you would agree that means are found to exercise discipline without bringing every case of discipline before either the Chancellor of the Exchequer or the Postmaster-General?—I should think it is very likely.

51,826. You say, “If you create an army of established clerks and bailiffs, each with the right to ‘approach either the Lord Chancellor or the Treasury.’ Establishment does not involve direct access, in all questions of discipline, to the ultimate head of a great department, does it?—I mean the department. I do not mean the person of the Lord Chancellor or the person of the Chancellor of the Exchequer; I mean the department of either.

51,827. You agree, therefore, that establishment might be consistent with discipline without breaking down the machine at all?—I do not think it would break the machine down; but what I think is, that the administrative control would have to be strengthened, because it would become a very serious question. Take the case of a clerk who has been put upon a scale of salary and who does something which may not be outrageously bad, but something the registrar disapproves of, and he says to him, “I shall stop your increment this year.” There are 500 courts, and it might frequently happen. The clerk would consider that he had a right to appeal to somebody; I do not care whether it is to the Lord Chancellor or to the Treasury or to myself; but that is going to increase the administrative work considerably. At present we have so many points of contact, and we never have anything to do with the clerks at all.

51,828. (Mr. Coward.) The registrars take the responsibility?—Entirely.

51,829. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) But in every Government department minor points of discipline are arranged for without necessarily exercising a severe strain upon the ultimate directing power, are they not?—I do not know how that may be; but I think that, with 500 County Courts, these questions would frequently arise, and you must have some central department to deal with them. There would have to be a central department to deal with appointments and promotions, and it may be, removals from one district to another. The method of administration would have to be strengthened in some form.

51,830. You have in your own department 26 examiners of accounts?—Yes.

51,831. And they are practically the only representatives of the central Government who visit and control the County Courts, because, as you point out, the Lord Chancellor has no corresponding officials?—That is so.

51,832. Their work therefore is of extreme importance, you agree?—Yes.

51,833. Not only to the Government, but to litigants and to the public generally?—Yes, certainly.

51,834. At present they are appointed by a system which you describe as four men selected for each appointment from a waiting list containing names of clerks appointed in the County Courts; the average age on appointment is 35 years, and they are appointed after a viva voce examination conducted by yourself in the presence, I think, of another Treasury official?—That is so.

51,835. That is an interesting type of limited competition, and I suppose it gives you, from the moment of the man's appointment, a man very experienced in the particular kind of work he will have to do?—It does.

14 April 1915.]

MR. BENJAMIN JAMES BRIDGEMAN.

51,836. Have you ever thought whether a system by which you got men of perhaps greater natural ability but less experience, and trained them in their work, might, in the whole run of a man's life, have better effects?—What sort of man may you be referring to?

51,837. I take the man that you refer to as your staff clerk. You say you have a staff clerk who entered the public service by open competition as a second division clerk, and got into administrative work by open competition. Do you think he would have been capable of learning the work of an examiner?—I dare say he would in time; but I do not want a man who has to learn the work; I want a man that I can put on to the work at once.

51,838. You think that in this case the disadvantage of having to train your man would outweigh any advantage of getting a rather longer period of service out of him, and possibly getting a more able man at the beginning?—I think it is very likely; because after all we do get fairly able men, because we get the pick of the County Court clerks. One of them is a barrister, he has been called to the Bar since he was appointed to the department.

51,839. Then assuming that you appoint people by a system of competition plus interview, do you think you might have a rather wider means of access. Might not it be known that these posts are going, and so you would get a rather larger body of applicants?—They all know; every County Court clerk knows perfectly well when there is going to be a vacancy. How he gets to know I do not know, but they do know.

51,840. But the ideally best man may not be a County Court clerk?—I do not know that we should entertain anybody but a County Court clerk; I do not think we should.

51,841. Then you say in your memorandum that a "fusion of small District Probate Registries with High Court and County Court Registries is desirable, and has frequently been recommended by the Treasury." You think that such fusion is entirely desirable?—Most desirable, and quite practicable except for the question of patronage.

51,842. Putting aside for the moment the question of patronage, do you think that fusion accompanied by a certain rearrangement would be more convenient than obsolete districts, so as to make a more convenient administrative division?—What do you mean by obsolete districts, may I ask?

51,843. You spoke of the area of the probate registry or the County Court in some districts as inconveniently small. If a general fusion was adopted, would it not be possible to make the areas generally, rather than in exceptional cases, more convenient than they are now?—I had not thought of that. I do not know. I should like to consider it.

51,844. You say that the difficulty is one of patronage. Would you mind enlarging upon that. The patronage in the case of the district probate registry is in whose hands?—The President of the Probate Division.

51,845. The patronage of a High Court registry is in whose hands?—In the case of a district registrar of the High Court, that is to say, of Liverpool and Manchester, Preston, Durham, and Ipswich, where the district registries are separate entirely from the County Courts, the patronage is in the hands of the Lord Chancellor; but in the case of a district registry attached to a County Court, the patronage is practically in the hands of the County Court judge, because directly the County Court judge appoints the registrar to the County Court he becomes automatically district registrar.

51,846. When one says that the difficulty is one of patronage, I suppose it always means that someone has the right of patronage and is in fact objecting to have that right taken from him?—Yes, I think the difficulty has arisen because the President of the Probate Division and the Lord Chancellor have not been able to come to terms about the appointment; the President is pushing one man and the Lord Chancellor thinks it ought to be given to the County Court registrar. That is the difficulty.

51,847. I do not quite understand. You say that the Lord Chancellor thinks "it" should be given to the County Court registrar; what do you mean exactly?—The probate registry when a vacancy occurs.

51,848. That the minor officials of the probate registry should be appointed by the County Court registrar?—I am thinking about the probate registrar.

51,849. I am asking why there was objection to this fusion. You say that the objection was that the Lord Chancellor and the President of the Probate Division were not able to come to an agreement, and then you said something I did not understand, namely, that the Lord Chancellor desired that "it" should be given to the County Court registrar?—The Lord Chancellor is always in favour of the fusion of the probate registry with the County Court registry where there is a district registry of the High Court as well; but, of course, although he may be in favour of doing that, the President of the Probate Division is not obliged to give way; he has the patronage of the appointment, and unless they can come to an agreement it cannot be done.

51,850. (Mr. Coward.) There is great variety in the character and extent of the work done by the County Courts?—Very great variety.

51,851. Some of it is very hard, and the other of it is not?—Well, yes; certainly, relatively, some things are easier than others, but I do not know that they are extremely difficult.

51,852. I should rather put it the other way, that there are some who have comparatively little to do?—Some registrars?

51,853. No, judges—the work done by the County Courts as a whole?—Yes, there is no doubt about that. Some judges work much harder than others.

51,854. They have to?—Yes.

51,855. The present County Courts were established many, many years ago, and they have not been rearranged?—They have not been completely rearranged, but a number of the circuits have been absorbed from time to time.

51,856. Has it occurred to you whether it would be possible further to rearrange them so as to make a considerable reduction in the number of judges required, and in the work to be done generally?—I think it is quite possible that there might be some modification, but I am not sure that you could reduce the number of judges.

51,857. I do not know whether you know that some of these judges, for instance, take about a fortnight or three weeks out of a month's holiday?—I should have hardly thought that. They certainly have a very good time on the whole, but I do not think they take as much holiday as that. I do think that the County Courts might be rearranged, and it is quite possible that if they were rearranged the judges would be able to sit oftener where they are wanted. That is the trouble at the present time; I do not think the judges sit often enough in some places; but that is really more a question for the Lord Chancellor than for the Treasury. The Treasury are interested, of course, but it is peculiarly a question about which the Lord Chancellor would be jealous.

51,858. The only thing I am interested in at the moment as a member of the Commission is whether something could be done to economise the work of the County Court circuits?—Quite so. I think that would be the direction in which it would be done—to make the judges sit oftener.

51,859. Have you considered it? I do not like to take individual circuits, about which, perhaps, I know something, but I do know that a good many of the judges consider that when they have got a County Court judgeship in particular circuits they have got a "very soft thing," as they call it?—Yes.

51,860. If the County Court circuits were rearranged, it might have a great effect upon the number of the registrars appointed?—If you were to rearrange the circuits while the present Act was in existence, you would have to have a registrar for every court.

51,861. But you would have to have a regular rearrangement?—Yes. A statutory rearrangement were you thinking of?

14 April 1915.]

MR. BENJAMIN JAMES BRIDGEMAN.

51,862. Yes?—That would be a different thing.

51,863. (Sir Donald MacAlister.) The members of the County Court Clerks and Officers Association make a great point about their all being put on the establishment with a view to superannuation. Is it not one of the great difficulties that the larger proportion of these men are not full-time servants of the Court?—I should say it is not so in the case of clerks and officers, because I believe those are men who are employed in courts having more than 6,000 plaintiffs. I think this is a different association to the one which has really a more ambitious title—the County Court Officials Association, that is the association which represents courts entering less than 6,000 plaintiffs. This particular association of clerks and officers is, I think, confined entirely to clerks and bailiffs employed in courts entering more than 6,000 plaintiffs, and in those courts, I think, so far as official time is concerned, those men are wholly employed in County Courts, district registries, and in Bankruptcy jurisdiction. They might do some evening work. I know some of them are connected with some local societies—co-operative stores and things of that sort—in the evening, but I think during official time they are wholly employed in this particular work.

51,864. Could you give us any idea of the number in proportion to the whole number of clerks and officials in the County Court Association who are so employed for their full time?—I do not know what the membership of this association is. I am inclined to think that it is not truly representative, because so many of the men employed in the courts entering above 6,000 plaintiffs are remarkably well paid, and they would not be so well paid if they were in the Civil Service. I do not think it is truly representative.

51,865. Can you give me any idea of the proportion that these full-time men bear to the whole number of clerks and officials of the County Courts? Is it a half or one-third?—I think I know what you mean. The clerks employed in courts—not the members of the association?

51,866. Yes?—I think you have that in the form of a return which I sent in to the Royal Commission in 1912. There is a lump-sum arrangement. There are 656 men and 11 women, as compared with 761 clerks employed in courts under 6,000 plaintiffs.

51,867. So that the numbers employed for their whole time, and the numbers not employed for their whole time, are approximately the same?—A little less than half of the whole.

51,868. But this statement which has been presented to us purports to be on behalf of clerks in County Courts of all sizes?—I do not know what it means quite. The Clerks and Officers Association is an association of County Court clerks and bailiffs in courts above 6,000 plaintiffs.

51,869. Apart from the difficulty of control, discipline, and so on, it would be an easier matter to establish the clerks whose whole time was given to court work than it would be to provide anything like establishment or pension for those whose services are only partly employed?—Speaking generally, yes.

51,870. So that this appeal, although it appears to be in general terms here, practically applies and can only apply to less than half of the officials of the system of County Courts which we are considering?—Yes. That is, of course, supposing that all these men are seeking to be placed in the Civil Service—which I doubt.

51,871. (Miss Haldane.) With regard to the women you were talking of just now, how are those employed?—I am afraid I cannot tell you much about them, because they are only employed at Birmingham, and it is quite a new idea, I believe. I have not been to Birmingham to visit the court for some considerable time, and recently since I was last there, they have introduced girls or women into one of their departments. I rather think it is the Accounts Department, but I have never seen them at work, and I am afraid I cannot explain what they do.

51,872. Do you mean by “recently” that it is in connection with the war?—No, it is not so recent as that—I meant some years ago.

51,873. But you do not know whether they are typists, or assistant clerks, or what they are?—No, but I am inclined to think that they are not typists, with the exception of one, perhaps, who I know does the bankruptcy reporting; she is a shorthand writer. With regard to the others, I rather think they are engaged in the accounts work.

51,874. On your own staff you have assistant clerks Are they established?—In the County Courts Department of the Treasury, yes, they are established men.

51,875. Have you any women in your department?—There is no opportunity of employing women there, because our typewriting is done in the Treasury proper, where they do employ women in the copying department.

51,876. You have no women typists in your department?—We have no typing done at all in the department. It is all done in the copying branch of the Treasury.

51,877. Then you have not considered the matter? I understand the matter has been considered with regard to some of the legal offices of introducing women at the present time, owing to the necessity for getting for war service all the men possible, but you have never had the question come up in your department?—I am afraid not. I have never considered it, certainly. It has not come before me.

51,878. Do you think it is a question which will come up?—I doubt whether it will, because our staff consists mainly of examiners who go travelling all over the country and have to have peculiarly skilled qualifications.

51,879. I was talking of assistant clerks at the moment?—We have only a few assistant clerks.

51,880. How many have you?—Four assistant clerks. I am afraid there is not much room for any arrangement for employing ladies there.

51,881. And the housing accommodation for your work is not very satisfactory, you say?—We should be very much better off if we could get them all on to one floor. We are spread about rather. Of course, the Treasury has outgrown itself.

51,882. (Sir John Kempe.) Can you tell us whether any results followed the report of that Committee of 1900. Was any recommendation of theirs carried out?—I do not think so. The Treasury never heard officially about that report for two years, and then the Lord Chancellor sent on the report of the Committee and seemed to assume that the Committee's report was favourable to the establishment of these men. I do not know whether the Commissioners have read that report, but I do not think it is in favour of establishment.

51,883. That Committee said: “The object of the Legislature was to create local courts, the actual working of which should be as far as possible independent of central control, and, therefore, distinct from the usual organisation of the Civil Service,” and they went on, as you say, to object to the organisation on Civil Service lines. But I rather understand that you approved of the establishment of the staff above the 6,000 plaintiff limit?—I do not think I have said that. I did not intend to.

51,884. On page 11 of your statement you say, “Subject to the considerations I have already suggested as to establishing registrar's clerks, the only offices in which this course could be conveniently taken would be those of the 12 County Courts in which the registrars are excluded from private practice”—those would be the courts above 6,000 plaintiffs?—But the adjectival phrase there is of more importance than the substantive one.

51,885. Then you would not support that on the whole?—Those are not the courts above 6,000 plaintiffs. Those are the courts in which there are pensionable registrars, and I was trying to explain that whatever difficulties there may be with regard to other courts—and I think there are many—they would not be so great in the case of those 12 courts. That seems to me to be the only line, if it were decided to establish any, that could be drawn.

Mr. BENJAMIN JAMES BRIDGEMAN.

51,886. The reason of the existing system of organisation, that is to say, the making of solicitors registrars and allowing them to use their own clerks, is to meet the difficulty of the varying work in different places?—Yes.

51,887. That is the main point of it. Exactly the same thing exists in the case of post offices. In the case of a post office a local grocer, say, is made post master, and is allowed to employ a staff of his own and pay them, or else he can have—I think I am right in saying—a clerk from the regular post office organisation to help in his office?—Yes.

51,888. Would not that arrangement be possible in the case of County Courts?—I do not think the circumstances are quite on the same lines, although I do not pretend to say that I can explain the difference. What I do think is, that you would largely increase the expense of administration, and that your inspectorate would be a very expensive one—far more expensive than the class of examiners we have at present. I think the men would be in a different position if they were Civil servants, and I think the inspectorate would have to be something different. We should have to have a higher class of man altogether.

51,889. Why should it be different from the case of a post office. That is controlled from a central office. Your own office would be in control of the staff; somebody would be at the head of it?—I do not know how far I could do that if these men were Civil servants. I think we should have to have a larger staff and a more elaborate arrangement, and I think it would be more costly.

51,890. In what way would it be different from a post office, because the local grocer is subject to the post office quite as much? You might make the County Court registrar subject to some central authority in the same way; I do not see why it should be more expensive?—At present there is no central authority to whom any of these clerks can appeal; they must appeal to the registrar. If you have an army of men, each of whom would have the right of appealing to some central authority, it seems rather obvious, I fancy, that that central authority would have to be something different from what we have at present.

51,891. As to the question of audit, one of the difficulties suggested was that if you have established clerks you would find a difficulty in the audit?—Yes.

51,892. You said any deficiency in the audited balance is always made good by the registrar?—Yes.

51,893. In what way is that deficiency ascertained now?—In this way: in the first place the examiner takes care to see that the cash book agrees with the registrar's cash balance in hand, or at the banks, or in my hands, and then at the end of the year to see also that the whole of the balances in the ledger agree with the cash book. Supposing there should be a difference, we give the registrar one year in which to discover that difference, and at the end of that year, if the difference has not been discovered, he has to make it good, supposing it is on the wrong side; and if it is on the other side, he has to carry the surplus to a suspense account in the ledger, and there it remains for six years, and if the mistakes—the identical mistakes—which have caused that surplus have not been discovered the Treasury take it over as forfeited suitors' money. That is the position at present.

51,894. Then you take no steps to ascertain the correctness of the accounts beyond examining the balances on either side. You do not audit the detailed items at all?—It is an examination. I have handed in a statement showing what the examiners' duties are. It is a very elaborate statement, and you will find that the examiners are very much worked; there is a tremendous amount for them to do. They have no opportunity and no time for examining the millions of postings. I should think there are eight or nine millions of postings from cash books to ledgers. They could not possibly do that work; in fact you would have to have an examiner on the spot. The way in which they ascertain the figures which they report to the Treasury is this. They take care to cast the cash-book, and to cast the pass-book, and to compare one thing with the other in order to ascertain the correctness—I am talking about the suitors' cash only, but there is a great deal besides suitors' cash. Then at the end of the year the whole of the balances are taken out from the ledger on to the balance-sheet, and those balances are carefully examined with the ledger, every item in the ledger is cast up, and the balances are ascertained by the examiner. They have already been ascertained by the clerk in the office, but the examiner does it by way of check. Then he carries those balances into the balance-sheet, sees that they are correctly stated there, and that is really the extent of his audit of the suitors' money.

51,895. I understand your duty, in fact, is confined simply to the passing of balance-sheets, so to speak; you do not go into the details of the expenditure at all?—Only here and there by way of check as regards postings to the ledgers. Suitors' money is not expenditure; the latter is fully audited.

51,896. Supposing a registrar did not appoint his own clerks I do not see what difference it would make in his responsibility?—It would make a very serious difference. A registrar's clerk carries a sum of 10*l.*, we will say—because sometimes they have large payments—from the cash-book to the wrong account in the ledger, and the suitor comes in and another clerk turns up the ledger and finds that there is 10*l.* to the credit of that particular man and he pays the money out. When the right man comes in for his money there is nothing to his credit, and he says: "I understood the defendant had paid 10*l.* in." There is a loss of 10*l.* there, which the registrar has to make good. If he were a Civil servant he would not have to make it good.

51,897. But he would be responsible for the mistake. In the case of public departments, like the Customs or the Post Office, the head of the particular branch is responsible for the accounts, to see that they are correct, in exactly the same way. I cannot see the difference between the position of a registrar and the position of a postmaster?—I should speak with the greatest diffidence after hearing what you have said, but I have never yet heard of a Civil servant having to put his hand in his pocket to make good the deficiencies or mistakes made by his clerk.

51,898. But he is responsible and can be dismissed if it is anything serious, just as the registrar is made pecuniarily responsible. The Civil servant is, strictly speaking, pecuniarily responsible, although I agree with you that it is not very often enforced. I cannot see that it makes any difference whether the registrar appoints his own clerks or not. You say the clerks are responsible now. Who makes them responsible? The registrar does, I suppose?—I say that the registrars are responsible for everything that their clerks do or omit to do.

51,899. But a registrar has to be responsible for his clerks because he has to see that they do their work and do not make mistakes?—He is not only responsible but pecuniarily liable, that is to say, he indemnifies the State for any loss—a different position, I submit, from that of any Civil servant.

51,900. You could have what is called a test audit, not a complete audit, such as they have in the revenue departments?—We could have a test audit, but that would not discover the particular defalcation or mistake. The point is how you are to fix any individual clerk with liability for his own mistake.

51,901. If there is a defalcation, at the present moment the registrar is responsible. If he did not appoint his own clerks nobody would be responsible. Is that what it comes to?—Nobody would be responsible, and if you wanted to fix anybody with responsibility or to find out who was a careless clerk you must audit right up to the hilt, and do everything.

51,902. Then the Post Office and the Revenue Department system would seem to be very weak because that comes to exactly the same thing as the County Court system would be if the registrar did not appoint his own clerks?—I am sorry my knowledge is so limited. I do not know what they do.

51,903. (Mr. Philip Snowden.) With regard to Civil servants making good deficiencies caused through their mistakes, is it not a fact that the established postal servants have to make good all their deficiencies in their accounts and receipts?—If you know that that is so I certainly will accept it from you. I do not know anything about it.

Mr. BENJAMIN JAMES BRIDGEMAN.

51,904. (Chairman.) As regards the liability of postal servants to make good any deficiencies in the cash or values under their charge, is it not necessary to qualify that statement by saying that that obligation is only within certain limits and subject to certain conditions?—I am quite willing to accept that from you. I am afraid I do not know anything about it.

51,905. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) With regard to the Report of the Committee of 1900, and the difficulty of estimating what it came to, is it not the case that the Chairman of the Committee, Sir David Brynmor Jones, in his memorandum on page 28, said: "I ought to add that in my opinion it would be expedient to place all the clerks and officers permanently employed as whole-timers in County Courts upon a pensionable basis." Do you remember that passage?—Is not that in the nature of a rider to the Report?

Mr. A. HEMMONS, Mr. F. W. CROSS, Mr. E. H. WADE, Mr. W. BURGESS, representing the Association of County Court Clerks and Officers, called and examined.

51,908. (Chairman to Mr. Hemmons.) You are employed in the office of the County Court of Bristol?—Yes, in the Registrar's Department.

51,909. What is your position in the office?—I am the third clerk with 41 years' service.

51,910. May I ask what your age is?—I am 58 next June—57 now.

51,911. You appear as representing the County Court Clerks and Officers Association?—Yes.

51,912. What is the present relation of that association to the County Court Officials Association?—They are practically amalgamated now.

51,913. Are we to take your evidence as representing both associations?—There may be some points of difference. We have an official here in the "under 6,000 plaint courts," and he would be better able to answer than I could; but practically the work is the same in both classes of courts.

51,914. What is the County Court Clerks and Officers Association; of whom does it consist?—Bailiffs and clerks originally in the over 6,000 plaint courts; now it includes all.

51,915. What is the number of your members?—Probably between 600 and 700, I should think, without the amalgamation. Now that will be added to. I can hardly tell you what it will be now, because members are joining week by week from the other association, but before that we had between 600 and 700 members.

51,916. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) Paying members?—Yes, paying members.

51,917. (Chairman.) Will there in future be only the one association?—Only the one association.

51,918. And that will be called the County Court Clerks and Officers Association?—That is so.

51,919. Practically the other association will be merged in yours?—Yes, the other will cease to exist.

51,920. Before the amalgamation of the two, you had a membership of 600 and 700?—Yes.

51,921. Can you tell me what the membership of the County Courts Officials Association was?—(Mr. Wade.) Our secretary is at the war, unfortunately, and we could not get the details, but I believe it was between 500 and 600, as near as I remember.

51,922. (To Mr. Hemmons.) What is the total number of officers in the classes you represent?—We are only able to guess that. We should say that the total would be about 2,500, but that is only an estimate. We have no means of gauging the total number of clerks and officers in the whole of the County Courts in England.

51,923. That would be including all persons employed in the High Bailiff's Department as well as in the Registrar's Department?—Yes.

51,924. Would the number not be larger than that; there are a little over 500 courts in all?—About 490 courts.

51,925. We have been told that there are 493 courts, and 68 branch courts, making altogether 561?—That would be an average of five officers to a court if the number was 2,500, which is our estimate.

51,906. It is in the nature of an addendum to the Report, giving his opinion?—I have read that.

51,907. So probably it was not the opinion of his colleagues. On the other hand, although the whole thing is not very clear, the body of the Report itself said on page 23, "If we had to make a distinction in favour of the clerks, &c., in one court as against the other, we should feel bound to draw the line in favour of the Gloucester Court, on the ground suggested by Mr. Chalmers, that where you have an establishment of men all exclusively engaged in public employment prima facie, they should be placed on a Civil Service basis." So, apparently, the majority of the committee considered that that argument was hypothetically valid; the chairman said that it was actually valid in the particular case?—The Commissioners have the Report before them. I suppose they will put their own construction on it. I am afraid I cannot give any opinion about it.

51,926. Do you also represent the subordinate staff of ushers, messengers, and so forth?—No, we have not included ushers and messengers in our association—only bailiffs and clerks.

51,927. For what class of officers do you specially speak?—The clerks.

51,928. For the clerks in courts of all sizes or particularly in the larger courts?—Particularly in the larger courts.

51,929. Will you tell us briefly first what are the points you wish to put before the Commission on behalf of those clerks?—First there is no system of rises possible under the present system and no superannuation. The present system is payment by a lump sum. That does not allow of any rise to a clerk, because the whole of the amount allowed by the Treasury is allocated at once, and the registrar or high bailiff has to see that that amount is paid out to his clerks, and he has to show the receipts for that amount to the Treasury, so that there can be no rise to any clerk until that lump sum is increased. A clerk may be there five or six years without that lump sum being increased, because the number of plaints may remain constant and there would be no increased sum granted to the court until the work of the court justified an increase of "clerk hire."

51,930. Is the registrar required to expend the whole of the sum allowed for the clerks?—I believe he has to hand back any amount he does not expend—so we understand.

51,931. Subject to handing back any amount he does not expend, he is not obliged to spend the whole of it?—He has to show the receipts of the clerks for the whole amount of "clerk hire." The receipts are sent to the Treasury.

51,932. Supposing one of the senior clerks—one of the higher paid clerks—were to retire and a new one was appointed at the bottom of the scale, it does not necessarily follow that the registrar need distribute the whole of the saving resulting from that over the other clerks. Could he not keep some in reserve for subsequent increase of pay?—I have never known that done. May I give an instance of what happened in our court: The chief clerk died about 15 years ago, and an application was sent to the Treasury to appoint a new man in his place. The Treasury replied, that as the number of plaints had fallen off they could not grant it, and they only granted 40% out of 350% to a junior. None of the other clerks had any rise at all. I cannot say they were looking forward to his death, but that was the only means they had of having a rise in their salary, and that was taken away from them in consequence of the falling off of the work.

51,933. The falling off of the work resulted in a reduction?—A reduction of the lump sum for clerk hire.

14 April 1915.] Mr. A. HEMMONS, Mr. F. W. CROSS, Mr. E. H. WADE, and Mr. W. BURGESS.

51,934. Did not the falling off of the work permit of a reduction in the number of clerks?—It would have meant discharging some of the clerks otherwise.

51,935. Or not filling a vacancy?—Reducing the salaries of some of the present clerks and giving it to others, or not filling the vacancy. If we had not filled the vacancy, it would have been only a saving of 40*l.* to be distributed amongst 15 clerks, as they only allowed 40*l.* instead of the 350*l.* previously taken by the chief clerk.

51,936. Had there been a substantial reduction in the amount of business?—Yes, I dare say there was a reduction of 3,000 or 4,000 plaintiffs in a total of 25,000. We ran from 25,000 down to 21,000 perhaps.*

51,937. That is to say, a reduction of about one-eighth?—Yes, about that.

51,938. Would not a reduction of one-eighth in the work permit of some reduction in the numbers of the staff of 15 or 16 clerks?—It would, but not as much as appears on the surface, because 10,000 plaintiffs can be worked by far less than double the number of staff that 5,000 plaintiffs can be. As the work increases you do not require to increase your clerks in proportion. One clerk might have been dispensed with, but ours is a very fluctuating court and the number of plaintiffs might have gone up again the following year.

51,939. Is not the variation in the lump sum which is allowed intended rather to provide for variation in the number of clerks required for dealing with different quantities of work; whereas the point, as you represent it, is that the reduction of the lump sum resulting from reduction of work was applied, not in reducing the number of clerks, but in reducing the remuneration of the fixed number already employed?—Yes; the effect was intentionally to reduce the total remuneration because a smaller staff would be required, but the result was that one clerk was done away with practically and the other clerks had no increase at all. The only opportunity we get of an increase is when a man dies or when the number of plaintiffs goes up.

51,940. If there had been a reduction of two clerks there might have been an opportunity of some increase in the remuneration of those that remained?—Yes. If two clerks had died we might have saved the salary of one.

51,941. And some increase of remuneration would have accrued to the others?—Since that time we have had part of that amount which was taken away returned to us, the number of plaintiffs having gone up.

51,942. The lump sum has now been increased?—Yes, we gradually got the amount back.

51,943. Has the number of the staff increased or remained constant?—That remains fairly constant; but in one year we may be up to 17,000 plaintiffs, the next year go down to 16,000, and another year up to 19,000; we are up and down all the time. The Bristol Court is in an industrial district and I think it is due to that.

51,944. Your point is that there is no increasing scale of pay for the clerks and that the clerks are on fixed pay and have no opportunity of increasing that pay if the total sum allowed for clerk hire remains constant or is reduced?—There is absolutely no increase in pay possible.

51,945. Except so far as that increase is caused by vacancies at the top and the others moving upwards?—Yes, or an increase of the work, and then the registrar would apply for an increased lump sum.

51,946. In the Bristol Court has the registrar private business of his own?—We have two registrars with one salary. One has private work, the other has not.

51,947. Two registrars with one salary?—Yes. The salary of the registrar in over 6,000 plaintiffs courts is 700*l.* a year, and he is also paid by fees. The fees in our court run to between 1,900*l.* and 2,200*l.*, say, roughly, 2,000*l.*; this amount and the 700*l.* constitute the remuneration of the two registrars, less what they hand us over for our share of the fees.

51,948. What proportion of those fees is handed over to the clerks?—Up till last year we had 225*l.* handed over as our proportion. I have the exact figures here.

51,949. Have you got a statement of the salaries of the clerks at Bristol?—Yes, a statement as to salaries, ages, length of service, and their share of fees.

51,950. Will you hand that in?—Yes. (Handing in the statement.) In 1912 the total remuneration of the registrars, including the 700*l.* salary, was 2,254*l.* after they had paid the clerks 225*l.* In 1913 the total remuneration to the registrars was 2,125*l.*, after they had paid the clerks 225*l.*; but in 1914 the total remuneration to the registrars was only 1,797*l.*, after they had paid the clerks 425*l.* The share to the clerks was increased by 200*l.*, because the lump sum for clerk hire had been reduced by the Treasury by 200*l.*, and the registrars had to make it up out of their fees; the clerks were not to suffer, we understand.

51,951. In fact it was made up out of the fees?—Yes, it was made up out of the fees and the clerks have not suffered in that case.

51,952. From what class of business are those fees derived?—Fees from Workmen's Compensation, Bankruptcy, High Court Registry, Equity cases, Admiralty cases, and fees under Schedule "B." Those are the chief sources of the fees.

51,953. You say one of the registrars has private business of his own?—Yes.

51,954. How many clerks does he employ in that business?—He has one boy, and his son, who is also a solicitor.

51,955. Then it is a small business?—Yes.

51,956. He does not employ any considerable body of clerks in it?—Now he has one girl typist in addition. He has no considerable body of clerks.

51,957. Have you any knowledge of the salaries paid by solicitors in Bristol who employ a large staff?—No, I have not. As a rule, solicitors' clerks are not very well paid in Bristol. I do not know whether they are well paid in other places.

51,958. Can you make any comparison between the remuneration by salary and fees which the clerks in the County Courts receive and the remuneration which solicitors' clerks receive?—In the office of a good solicitor who has a large practice, I should say there was a very much better chance for a clerk than there would be in the Bristol County Court.

51,959. What would be the largest salary paid to a managing clerk by a solicitor in Bristol?—In London 400*l.*, 500*l.*, or 600*l.* managing clerks would be entitled to.

51,960. But I am speaking of Bristol?—In Bristol it would be 300*l.* or 400*l.* I do not suppose many men in Bristol would get over 300*l.*, but I submit that our salaries should not be compared with those of solicitors' clerks. Our work is very much more responsible than the work of solicitors' clerks. We are doing a public service; we are attending to the public, and we have no market value outside the County Court. A solicitor's clerk can take his labour from one office to another. We cannot take our labour from one office to another.

51,961. Do you consider that your work is more difficult or requires higher mental qualities than that of a solicitor's managing clerk?—I think it requires a more varied experience than a solicitor's managing clerk.

51,962. Would you say that?—I have hardly enough acquaintance with the work of a solicitor's managing clerk to be able to say, but I know they very often come to me for advice in County Court work, as also do solicitors; but that is, of course, only one department of the law.

51,963. On questions of procedure?—Yes, on questions of procedure.

51,964. Would not the difference be this, that your work is concerned with the procedure and forms of the Court, and that their work is concerned largely with the substance of the cases with which they deal?—That is so, I should think.

51,965. And would not the substance of cases be matter that would involve a good deal wider knowledge and experience, extending over substantial law as well as formal law, as compared with yours?—I think it is necessary, in order that the work of a County Court clerk be carried out efficiently, that he should have quite as much intelligence when he gets on the top rung of the ladder of the County Court as a solicitor's managing clerk. I have here a list of the varied work that a County Court clerk has to do. He starts with the issue of default, ordinary, bill of exchange, ejectment, possession, interpleader, and garnishee summonses, process under Tithe Act, notice to respondent, distraint, and receiver; process under Workmen's Compensation Act, which is quite a study in itself; filing and recording of agreements for declaration of liability, weekly payments and lump sums, in the latter case, assisted by the registrar or the registrar acting with the clerk, deciding as to adequacy of amount and, where workman is an infant or in cases of death, receiving amount into court, issuing notices to respondents upon requests for arbitration, filing answers to same, drawing awards after hearing, taxing costs (the registrars in most courts tax the costs; they do in ours, but in some courts the clerks, I believe, do it), investing amounts in Post Office Savings Bank, paying out quarterly and other sums to dependants; reference to medical referees; transfer of proceedings and investments from one court to another—the amount of investments at end of year in this court (Bristol) were 17,487*l.*, representing 345 accounts; issue of Bankruptcy process—i.e., Bankruptcy notices by creditors, debtors' petitions, creditors' petitions in chambers, public examinations, adjudications and taxing costs, fees paid in stamps, registrars receive 5*l.* each petition, and taxing costs, and a few other fees; also winding-up of companies comes under the Bankruptcy Act; equity claims (fees part to Government and part to registrars), Admiralty claims (fees part to Government and part to registrars); administration requests, notices to creditors, orders to debtors, receiving payments, rescinding cases, declaration of dividends, fees to Treasury, judgment summonses and commitments; entering judgments by default, notice of defence for trial, entering ordinary cases for trial, making up minute book, orders of payment, receiving and paying out money, posting same in ledgers, notices of payments into court, special defences, counter-claims, orders of discovery and interrogatories, orders for substituted service and oral examinations; examining, swearing, and filing affidavits of debt (the clerks swear the affidavits, the registrar allows them afterwards) and deciding causes of actions, affidavits of defence in bills of exchange cases, registering 10*l.* judgments and administration orders; issue of certificates to certified bailiffs and list of same; entry and issue of executions, judgment summonses, and commitments; payment into bank of postal orders, cheques, &c.; keeping clerk's cash-book, balancing ledgers at end of year; making quarterly return of cash accounts for superintendent, ditto registrar and high bailiff's fees; annual returns of workmen's compensation cases, administrations and all process; list of amounts to be forfeited by suitors; filing abstracts of bills of exchange and deeds of arrangement sent from Central Office and taking bonds from trustees. That is very varied work.

51,966. Would a large part of the work that you have enumerated consist in filling up printed forms?—No. For instance, in the case of affidavits for leave to issue out of the jurisdiction, you have to decide yourself whether that claim can be issued in a certain court, and whether there is jurisdiction to issue it.

51,967. Would far the greater bulk of the work which you have enumerated relate to ordinary small debt claims?—Yes. In our court about half the debts are under 2*l.*

51,968. In that case there would be a summons issued, a judgment either by default or after hearing, and an order to pay?—Yes, and the subsequent proceedings afterwards.

51,969. Far the greater part of your work would relate to cases of that kind?—Yes. Those are mostly done by the juniors.

51,970. The work relating to those would consist of filling up the forms, the issuing of the summons, and so on, and the accounting work connected with the receipt of money paid into court, or the instalments paid upon the judgment, and entering those in the cash book and ledger?—Yes; and something depends upon every entry.

51,971. Naturally. I presume you would not make an entry if nothing depended upon it?—I mean that a registrar may be liable for an action if a shilling is left out of a ledger.

51,972. He is liable for the shilling, I suppose?—No; he is liable for an action to be brought against him for issuing execution where one ought not to be issued. So much depends upon the entry of the work.

51,973. You mean an execution may issue if the sum has not been properly put into the account?—If a sum is not posted.

51,974. But that accounting work is, I should gather, of a simple character?—A good deal of it is of a simple character but requires to be done with great care.

51,975. It requires to be done with care, but is any of it of a complicated character?—Of what I have mentioned here a good deal is complicated.

51,976. But is any of the accounting work complicated?—What you have mentioned is mostly of a simple character. Workmen's compensation work would not be simple.

51,977. Is there any complicated accounting there?—Not accounting work.

51,978. I am speaking of the accounting work now. Is any of the accounting work of at all a complicated character?—Yes, there is a lot of complication in the keeping of accounts.

51,979. What is the nature of the complication?—I am not the accountant myself. We have one whose whole time is almost entirely taken up with accounts.

51,980. That does not necessarily imply complication of accounts; it may be simply the volume of accounting?—There would be a complication in the balancing. They find it difficult very often to balance at the end of a quarter; there are so many different accounts.

51,981. Difficulties in balancing would arise from errors in posting, but that is hardly complication?—And there is the difficulty of finding it out when once made.

51,982. It may be difficult to balance, but it does not imply complication in the account?—Complication would arise from various accounts being lumped together and having to be brought together and balanced.

51,983. You mean, when you bring balances together to make a total balance, you may find a discrepancy?—Yes.

51,984. But the fact that there is a discrepancy may be due to an error in a simple operation, and not to the fact that the operations are complicated?—No, it means that it requires a good accountant to put them together and discover any discrepancy made.

51,985. What proportion of the work of the office consists of accounting work?—We do not keep our accounts separate in that way. There are two cashiers.

51,986. Are certain clerks told off to do the book-keeping?—Yes. There is a receiving cashier and a paying-out cashier, and they have about three assistants. One has one, and the other has two assistants.

51,987. That is five clerks out of 15?—Five clerks receiving and paying out practically entirely.

51,988. Do they do the whole of the book-keeping in connection with their work?—Yes, the whole of the posting and book-keeping. There are, perhaps, about 45,000 entries in the year, largely small entries.

51,989. With regard to the remaining 10 clerks, of what does their work mainly consist?—About three clerks would be issuing process, execution, and judgment summonses; three or four more would be taking down summonses, issuing them, and entering them; and another clerk would be making up the minute books for the court, and making out the orders for payment in.

51,990. That accounts for seven or eight out of the remaining 10?—Another clerk would be drawing up orders in equity cases, workmen's compensation cases, Bankruptcy cases and Admiralty cases, and making quarterly returns. There are a large number of returns to be made every quarter. I have to make about five returns myself which take me about a week out of every quarter.

51,991. Taking yourself personally, of what does your work mainly consist?—Of the workmen's compensation process up to the time it goes before the judge. I take down all the agreements, and do most of the workmen's compensation work in the list I read out, including deciding as to the adequacy of the amount and receiving the money into court. Drawing awards after hearing does not come into my work. I issue all the default summonses. We issue about 8,000 or 9,000 in a normal year in Bristol. My figures are all pre-war figures.

51,992. You mean that you fill up the form and hand the summons over to the Bailiffs' Department to execute?—No, I take down the instructions and swear the affidavits, decide as to the causes of action, and whether there is any cause of action.

51,993. You take down from a personal applicant the cause of action?—Yes. A person comes in and says "I want to issue a summons; the defendant lives out of the district," and I have to give him an affidavit form to fill up, and when filled up, I have to decide whether that affidavit will bring it within our jurisdiction. The causes of action are very complicated.

51,994. Are there any other questions you have to examine into, apart from the question of whether it is within the jurisdiction?—There is the question whether he can issue it as a default summons at all. No action for damages or tort can be so issued. You cannot issue a default summons against an administrator or an executor of an estate, and you have to be careful to see that you issue a summons in the proper way.

51,995. Having decided those points you fill up the summons and hand it over?—I only enter the summons; another clerk makes it out.

51,996. You enter the summonses in what?—In the plaint-book. I give them to another clerk to make out, and he makes them out, and I examine them to see that they are carefully made out. A junior clerk makes them out, and that is simple work. Also the Tithe summonses I have to deal with, and any orders for discovery or interrogatories or substituted service.

51,997. A committee sat in 1900 on certain questions connected with the County Courts, of which committee Sir David Brynmor Jones was chairman?—A gentleman in our office, Mr. Price, represented the association on the committee.

51,998. Have you ever seen the report of that committee?—We have never seen the report. We have had a letter from Mr. Liddell telling us what the report of the committee of 1900 was.

51,999. I will read to you a passage from that report which describes the work of the County Court clerk, and ask you if you think that a fair description or not: "We cannot wholly agree with Mr. Grimsdall's characterisation of the work of the clerks, etc., as 'being highly skilled labour in the sense of being work that requires any very great special training, expert knowledge, or ability above the average. Speaking broadly, the work is of a very specialised routine character. Unlike the work of those clerks in solicitors' offices who are not merely keeping books, but doing the necessarily varied work of such an establishment, it resembles rather the work of a bank clerk. No knowledge of law is requisite for most of the work that is performed by the ordinary county court clerk, though of course it is greatly to the advantage of the suitor in person that there should be at any rate one man in the office to whom he can appeal for aid in drawing his particulars of demand, and occasionally in regard to other matters. What, over and above the qualities of a good clerk, the ordinary County Court officer requires is good temper, the capacity of doing dull and monotonous work with patience, and the faculty of being courteous in dealing with illiterate and sometimes rough and irritable persons." That is qualified afterwards by saying that where the registrar does very little of the work personally, then the senior clerk has to do the work that properly belongs to the registrar. What do you say as regards that description of the work?—I should say it is not a fair description. In Bristol two gentlemen of middle age were appointed some time back; they did not start at the bottom as juniors and work up. They were both such failures that the registrar said, "I will never do it again." They never were able to grasp the work.

52,000. Where did they come from?—Both were accountants. One was made a cashier, and it was thought advisable that he should be brought in instead of any other clerks being promoted in the office, and the registrar acknowledged him to be a failure.

52,001. Then you think that that report understates the qualifications required?—Quite understates the case. I think if you ask any solicitor, or solicitor's clerk who practises in the County Court, he will tell you that the work is very complicated, and requires a legal mind to carry it out efficiently when you get up into the higher class of work.

52,002. You mentioned also the question of pension. Will you explain your views on that point, and the ground on which you think the County Court clerks ought to be made pensionable?—In Bristol we have now five clerks and officers who are over the age of 65. You have a statement of the ages of our clerks.

52,003. I see in the statement submitted by your association to us, a list of County Court clerks and bailiffs who have had long service, and in that list there appear in the registrar's department to be only ten who are over 65?—That list you have in our printed statement is as regards length of service, not as regards age. It does not include all those over 65 years of age.

52,004. I was puzzled by there being so few?—It is a statement as regards length of service, and as to those who have served over 40 years.

52,005. Have you a statement of the total number of clerks now serving who are over 65 years of age?—No, not compiled. There are five in the Bristol court. The chief clerk is 75, and he is now lying ill in bed. The last clerk who died was 84, and he worked up till within three weeks of his death.

52,006. Was he efficient up to the time of his death?—No, he had to be put to simple copying work.

52,007. You suggest that difficulty arises from the fact that, there being no pension system, clerks go on when they are past their work?—Yes, the registrars are not hard-hearted enough to discharge them because they become inefficient, so they are allowed to go on with their duties.

52,008. Is it practically always the case that clerks are allowed to go on even when they are past their duties?—There are some cases, I expect, in which they are discharged through old age. I could not give you instances. Mr. Cross will be able, I think, to give you the number over the age of 65. I think most registrars and high bailiffs would not care to discharge their clerks when they become old. The public service suffers and promotion is slow in consequence.

52,009. How is that difficulty met in the case of clerks in the employment of private solicitors?—I do not know what becomes of them. There is no scheme of superannuation in their case, of course; but there are clerks, I believe, who are kept on until a great age through the kindness of solicitors and are paid their salaries.

52,010. Does not the same difficulty arise there?—Yes, the same difficulty arises, but that is a private service.

52,011. Your first point is the difficulty as regards the retirement of clerks who are of an advanced age?—Yes, and the slowness of promotion.

52,012. Your second point is the slowness of promotion?—Yes, and the third point is that extra work falls upon the other clerks who do the work of the clerk who becomes old and inefficient. The public will come to a man and say: "It is no good going to him; I cannot get any clear information out of him; he has got past it"; and another man will have more work thrown upon him in consequence.

52,013. That is all part of the inconvenience arising from men remaining on after they are past their work?—That is so.

52,014. What are the reasons you put forward for saying that that difficulty ought to be remedied by making the clerks pensionable?—Our arguments are these: That there is hardly a bank, or an insurance company, or a railway company, or any public corporation now, that does not make some provision for its aged officials—I know of none.

52,015. Is it not the case that in most of the employments you mention there are contributory pension schemes?—In some cases they are contributory, in others not.

52,016. Taking the case of railways, are not the superannuation schemes, as a rule, contributory?—I believe the railway superannuation schemes are contributory.

52,017. In a great many of the large private concerns, where they have pension schemes working, is it not the case that they are contributory?—A great many are not; a good many are.

52,018. Which have you in mind which are not contributory?—I have a son with the Imperial Tobacco Company, and I know they have a pension scheme, and there is no contribution for pensions in their case.

52,019. Do you know of any others?—I do not think either insurance companies or banks have any contributory schemes. I could not say for certain.

52,020. Have you ever considered the question of a contributory scheme for the County Court staff?—We say that the salaries which are fixed by the Government are considered in the Civil Service to allow for the pensions. The contributions to pensions are supposed to be deducted from salaries; they fix the salary, and at the same time they fix the contribution. It is not for us to say what our salaries should be.

52,021. But your salaries have been fixed on a system which is not pensionable?—Or on an absence of a system.

52,022. They have, therefore, been fixed presumably in consideration of the fact that you have not any pensions?—But we have no fixed scale of salaries. No clerk can say what salary he is going to get in any County Court.

52,023. You can say what salary he is getting?—That is all.

52,024. And that salary has been fixed on the understanding that he does not get a pension?—Yes. We, of course, know that there is no pension when we join the service.

52,025. Your argument, as I understand it, is, that because in the Civil Service there are pensions on a non-contributory basis, therefore in your service there should be pensions on a non-contributory basis?—That is so. My argument is that if the Government were to take us over now as Civil servants, they would start by fixing a scale of salaries, and that scale of salaries would presuppose pensions. We understand that in the Civil Service the salary is paid presupposing a deduction from that salary for pension.

52,026. In the case of pensionable officers, yes?—Yes, the salaries are fixed with a view to pensions. That is how, we say, our salaries should be fixed.

52,027. Are you aware that, as a rule, when an unestablished officer is appointed to an established post, he is appointed at a lower salary than he was receiving as an unestablished officer, in consideration of the fact that he then becomes pensionable?—I was not aware of that. I dare say it is so.

52,028. In any case of salaries that have been fixed on a non-pensionable system, it would not be unreasonable to say that some modification would be required if the system were changed into a pensionable one?—There would be no objection, I think, if salaries were put upon a proper scale, and then a deduction made for pensions. You have a list of the salaries paid to the clerks in the Bristol County Court. There is a junior clerk in the high bailiff's office, who has done nine years' service, and who is 26 years of age, and is getting 14s. a week. Would you suggest that there could be any possible deduction from that for pension?

52,029. Is he a whole-time officer?—Yes.

52,030. (Mr. Philip Snowden.) Is that in Bristol?—In Bristol—14s. a week.

52,031. (Chairman.) What is his work?—He is a junior clerk in the high bailiff's office. My brother is the chief clerk in that office. That junior clerk gets 8l. a year in addition as his share of the fees from the high bailiff, but that only makes it about 17s. a week after nine years' service. He has applied to the Treasury for an increase, and been refused. The high bailiff was the son of the judge at Bristol, and the judge himself wrote up to the Treasury on his behalf, and was refused an increase.

52,032. That is to say, I suppose, that the high bailiff applied for an increase to his allowance?—An increase really of the lump sum for clerk hire in his office, and he was told that the lump sum was sufficient. That is to say, that the lump sum principle again precluded any increase to that clerk, and if he is there another five or ten years it may be the same thing.

52,033. (Mr. Coward.) Because he is doing the work of a boy?—Unfortunately, he is growing up into a man.

52,034. (Chairman.) Is he doing the same work as he was doing as a boy?—Yes, it is work that has to be done, and he is prepared to do it, and his knowledge now is sufficient for him to take the second clerk's place.

52,035. Would you say that although the work remains the same, and is work which can be done by a boy, nevertheless he ought to have an increasing salary?—Yes, his knowledge of the work has gradually increased, and he is fit to take the next post.

52,036. But he is not doing the work of the next post, because the next post is not vacant?—That is so. If he were a clerk in the Civil Service, his salary would have gone on rising, although he was doing a junior clerk's work.

52,037. To go back to the question of pensions, I should like to ask again the question I put before. What reason is there why a contributory system should not be instituted? You replied that you would prefer a system which was non-contributory, and which gave the pensions without a contribution. That I can understand, but supposing that was not available, is there any reason why a contributory system should not be instituted?—We should be pleased to have a contributory system put before us.

52,038. Was not there a deputation to the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Hobhouse, some years ago when that question was discussed?—I have been before Mr. Hobhouse on one occasion, and his suggestion was, I think, a contributory scheme, to which the Government would add something. It was really practically a scheme among ourselves, which the Government would subsidise.

52,039. Was any action taken on that suggestion?—No, nothing at all.

52,040. Why not?—It was his own suggestion and it fell through, and nothing more was done with it or heard of it.

52,041. As the result of an interview with the Secretary to the Treasury, you had a suggestion that a contributory scheme should be formulated and some hope held out, at any rate, that the Government would assist a scheme of that kind. Did not you pursue the matter at all?—One reason why it fell through was that he asked us to obtain the figures from different courts in the country of the ages and wages, and we were unable to do so, and we cannot do so now.

52,042. If the clerks in all the courts knew that you were working towards a pension scheme, would not they be prepared to furnish the particulars necessary for formulating it?—I do not think they would, because some of them have asked their registrars if they may disclose the list of wages in their courts, and they have been refused.

52,043. That would seem to suggest that your association does not fully command the confidence of all the clerks throughout the country. If it did, would not they be prepared to furnish you with the particulars necessary for formulating a statement?—They will not go against their registrars and high bailiffs. The registrars and high bailiffs will stop them from giving the information.

14 April 1915.] Mr. A. HEMMONS, Mr. F. W. CROSS, Mr. E. H. WADE, and Mr. W. BURGESS.

52,044. Would not the registrars and high bailiffs welcome a pension scheme for the clerks?—I think the registrars and high bailiffs are in favour of our becoming Civil servants.

52,045. But supposing there was a question of a contributory pension scheme, would not they be in favour of a scheme which was likely to benefit their staff?—I do not know their opinions upon that point. I have never sounded them, but they may be favourable to it. It would take off some of the responsibility of keeping on an old man in their employ.

52,046. But, in fact, that suggestion for a contributory scheme was not pursued, because you were unable to obtain the necessary particulars about the ages and pay of the clerks?—I think that was the reason it fell through at that time.

52,047. Have you any expectation that it could be pursued with greater success at the present time?—I cannot say that our association is favourably disposed towards a contribution scheme. We say that that is a matter to be left in the hands of the Treasury or the Government; that they should decide the salaries, and at the same time decide the pension.

52,048. I understand you would prefer a non-contributory scheme; but supposing a non-contributory scheme was not available, would you consider a contributory scheme better than nothing?—On the principle that half a loaf is better than no bread; but that does not give us security of tenure, does it?

52,049. Before leaving the question of pensions, in the paper which you have furnished to the Commission I see you mention that the officers in the City of London Court get superannuation?—They do.

52,050. Is that a contributory scheme?—I understand that is a contributory scheme, but it is a contributory scheme out of the classification system that they have there. The third class clerks start at 20s. a week, and know they are going to rise by 5l. a year to 200l. The second class clerks start at 200l. and rise by 10l. to 300l., and the first class clerks get 300l. and rise by 10l. up to 400l., and one principal clerk goes up to 450l.; so there are salaries in the City of London Court out of which pensions can be contributed. If there are salaries in County Courts to stand a contribution, they would have to be classified in the same way, and then I can see no objection to it.

52,051. Do you know what the basis of the scheme in the City of London Court is?—(Mr. Wade.) It is 2½ per cent. of the salary.

52,052. Is a contribution made by the Corporation?—A contribution is made by the Corporation, but the officers contribute 2½ per cent. of their salary.

52,053. But does the Corporation make any corresponding contribution?—They pay the pensions.

52,054. Are the pensions provided entirely out of the proceeds of the 2½ per cent. contribution?—I should not say so. I do not know.

52,055. You do not know if the Corporation has to make it up?—I do not know.

52,056. (To Mr. Hemmons.) Coming to the question of security of tenure, what is your representation on that point?—There is the case of a new master getting a new man. A new registrar or new high bailiff may appoint a new man if he wishes to, and may discharge the old one, and, I believe, it is done.

52,057. What is the usual practice in such a case? Does the new registrar keep on the old staff or not?—As a rule, I should say, the new registrar and the new high bailiff would keep on the old staff, but he may possibly have some one he may wish to put in.

52,058. He would have considerable difficulty if he started with an entirely new staff?—Yes, he would.

52,059. Have you ever known a case in which the old staff was dismissed on a change of registrar?—We have a case in the High Bailiff's Department. (Mr. Cross.) There was a recent case in the High Bailiff's Department in Birkenhead where the registrar, on the death of the high bailiff, became high bailiff, and he dismissed the whole of the staff of the High Bailiff's Office. He gave them all 14 days' notice, and then took back those men he wished.

52,060. Of how many did the staff consist?—Six or seven, I think. The chief man was dismissed altogether after 35 years' service.

52,061. How many did he take back?—Two, I think, joined the Army, and then, I think, he took back three. Of course, the work had gone down at that time on account of the war.

52,062. So the number actually dismissed and who did not join the Army was one or two?—Yes; but they were all dismissed for the time being. He only took them back if he so pleased.

52,063. But, as a matter of fact, he did take most of them back?—Quite so, but not the one with 35 years' service.

52,064. Was he the senior on the staff?—The senior bailiff.

52,065. And he was fully efficient?—Yes.

52,066. What became of him? Did he get other work?—I think he was out of employment for two months, and then he got some employment in the Post Office as a letter carrier, or something of that kind, but not at anything like the wages he had had.

52,067. Have you known any similar case in a registrar's office where the staff were dismissed on a change of registrar?—Not the whole of the staff, but there have been cases of individuals.

52,068. Was that on account of some objection to the individual, or on account of age? Was it a man who was past his work who was dismissed by a new registrar?—Yes. (Mr. Hemmons.) And there have been some cases where the registrar had a friend he wished to put in. (Mr. Cross.) There was one case where the registrar dismissed the chief clerk and brought in the judge's clerk and appointed him chief clerk. He knew nothing at all about the work, and of course precluded the others from any chance of an increase in salary or position.

52,069. Do I gather that those cases are quite exceptional?—Yes, they are.

52,070. (To Mr. Hemmons.) To go back to the question of pension, the staff of courts with more than 6,000 plaintiffs are a whole-time staff?—Yes.

52,071. In courts with less than 6,000 plaintiffs they are not necessarily whole-timers, and in many cases not actually whole-timers?—The greater proportion are whole-timers.

52,072. Have you any figures as to the proportion?—(Mr. Wade.) I am in an under 6,000 plaintiff court and there are 170 courts which issue less than 500 summonses a year. There is no question that the whole of those would be part-timers. Then there are about 250 courts with between 500 and 5,000 plaintiffs, and the majority of the staff of those would be whole-timers, but we cannot say how many; probably about 1,000 would be whole-time officials.

52,073. (To Mr. Hemmons.) How would you propose to deal with the case of those who are not whole-time officials?—You might increase the number of the whole-timers by amalgamating some of the smaller courts.

52,074. It is a question whether that would be possible or not. Assuming that that could be not done?—I suppose there are no half-timers in the Civil Service. I do not know whether there are any.

52,075. I do not think there are any that are pensionable?—But the fact of half-timers not being pensionable should not preclude the whole-timers being pensioned if they deserve it.

52,076. Then your suggestion is that at any rate all those who are whole-timers should be made pensionable?—Yes.

52,077. On the last page of the statement handed in there is the third paragraph which states that "The County Court officials, by an alteration in the words of the last County Court Act, after an assurance by the Treasury that no alteration in their status would be made, were astounded to find that their position as Government servants was interfered with"?—Yes, that was when they started the lump-sum payment for clerk hire. I was appointed before 1889, and by name. All officers were appointed by name by the Treasury at a rising salary from 40l. to 60l. I was.

14 April 1915.] Mr. A. HEMMONS, Mr. F. W. CROSS, Mr. E. H. WADE, and Mr. W. BURGESS.

52,078. We have had it in evidence this morning from Mr. Bridgeman, the Superintendent of County Courts, that that point was raised at a deputation to Mr. Austen Chamberlain when Chancellor of the Exchequer some years ago, and was completely withdrawn?—That the status had been altered?

52,079. The statement was withdrawn that there had been a breach of faith on the part of the Treasury resulting in an alteration of status. Are you aware of that?—(Mr. Cross.) I do not think I have ever heard of it.

52,080. Were any of you gentlemen present at that deputation to Mr. Austen Chamberlain?—No.

52,081. You are not familiar with the proceedings at that deputation?—(Mr. Cross.) No. The answer is that so far as I know our old printed statement, if you refer to that, said that the Treasury stated that a mistake had been made by the officials, but we cannot give any evidence with regard to that at all.

52,082. You have no evidence with regard to that?—No, we have a copy of the letter from Mr. Nicol, the then Superintendent of County Courts.

52,083. A letter to whom?—To our then president.

52,084. On this point?—Yes. It said: "In answer to your letter I beg to inform you that no amendment will be made in the County Courts Consolidation Bill altering the status or position of the clerks employed by the registrars."

52,085. But you contend that an alteration was made by the County Courts Bill?—Yes.

52,086. What alteration?—The lump sum was introduced then. Before that clerks were appointed individually by name. After that Act of 1888 that ceased.

52,087. What words in the Act do you contend made that alteration in your position?—(Mr. Wade.) Section 45 deals with the question of the salaries and the lump sum paid as allowance for clerk hire.

52,088. That Section 45 is the section which states the scale of salary for registrars?—(Mr. Cross.) The original receipt given by the clerks bore these words: The registrar had to declare on his honour that he had not employed any of the clerks or bailiffs "whose salaries are paid by Government." Those are the words of the receipt that we gave before that time, but those receipts have been altered. The words "paid by Government" are no longer in the form of receipt.

52,089. That is not an explanation of the words of the Act?—No, but I think it is based on an alteration of the Act. I am afraid we did not quite anticipate this question.

52,090. It is rather a serious allegation to make, unless you are prepared fully to support it, that there was a breach of faith on the part of the Treasury. You are not prepared to develop that in detail or support it?—If you will allow it to stand over for a few moments I will see. If you go back to 9 and 10 Victoria, chapter 35, and following on that the sections of the Act of 19 and 20 Victoria, it says it shall be lawful for the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury to order that all the officers of the said courts or any of them shall be paid by salaries instead of fees. By Section 14 of the same Act the maximum salary of a clerk was increased to 700*l.* a year. No mention was made in this Act of assistant clerks or bailiffs. In the year 1856, 19 and 20 Victoria came into force. I am reading from an old printed statement of our County Court Association.

52,091. Is it not the case that at that time the term "clerk" was used for what is now called "registrar"?—In the original Act, but there were assistant clerks named.

52,092. At that time a registrar's district consisted of several courts, did it not?—"Assistant clerks" mean the registrar's clerks.

52,093. Did not the assistant clerk mean the assistant registrar who was in charge of one of the additional courts which were in the district of the registrar?—I am afraid I cannot go so far as that. I do not know. (Mr. Hemmons.) I take it it meant his staff in his office—his assistant clerk.

52,094. I think you will find "assistant clerk" there is distinctly used as meaning "assistant registrar"?—(Mr. Cross.) Section 82 of the Act of 19 and 20 Victoria says that all registrars of the larger courts were to be paid salaries, which were to be fixed by the Treasury, not exceeding 700*l.* This section also provided that in the courts issuing 6,000 plaints, the amount of the salaries of the clerks previously termed "assistant clerks," and the number of the clerks should be sanctioned and approved by the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury. That was the position. The number of the clerks was to be sanctioned and approved by the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury. That is the position we originally held which we say is altered by the Act of 1888. (Mr. Hemmons.) Every clerk was appointed by name. (Mr. Burgess.) I may say I was in the habit of getting my salary before 1888 as assistant clerk, but I had to give a receipt for my salary to the registrar.

52,095. You gave a receipt for your salary?—I gave the receipt—"Received of the registrar of the court." Before that I gave it as "Assistant clerk, which appeared in my receipt."

52,096. You gave your receipt to the registrar?—With those words: "Assistant clerk."

52,097. You were appointed by the registrar?—Yes, and sanctioned by the Treasury by name. (Mr. Hemmons.) I was appointed by the Treasury by name. (Mr. Burgess.) And in all the increases of salary I received before 1888 my name was mentioned. (Mr. Hemmons.) I sent up the first receipt in full: "Alfred Augustus Hemmons," and it was sent back, saying: "You were appointed as Alfred Hemmons only." Now the Treasury do not appoint clerks.

52,098. If you wish to develop that point, you had better submit a written statement saying what you mean by the alteration in the status?—Yes.

52,099. (Mr. Boutwood.) In connection with a contributory scheme, do not you see a difficulty in applying a contributory scheme to a staff that already has a good many years' service. For instance, you have had 41 years' service: How would you deal with a contributory scheme in your own case?—I should take it, first of all, that I should be put upon a scale of salary equivalent to a scale of salary in another Government office that already had pensioned officials.

52,100. Yes, but you have had 41 years' service, and you cannot live for ever, and any contributions which you might make in the years of efficient service which are probably before you, would not amount to a very big pension. It is not as if you were starting at 20?—What we hold is that, of course, we ought to have been Government pensioned officials from the first, as we have been doing work in the public service that should have been pensioned work, and, therefore, all back service ought to count.

52,101. And back contributions ought to count at that rate?—We say more than back contributions have been taken away from us by our having inadequate salaries.

52,102. (Mr. Philip Snowden.) What is your present salary?—240*l.* a year, and 55*l.* from the registrar as share of fees.

52,103. And you are not on a scale, I take it?—On no scale. I do not know whether I shall ever get any more.

52,104. Is there any such thing as a sort of unofficial scale as applied to County Court clerks?—I have never heard of one. In no two courts hardly are there the same conditions even where they are of equal size.

52,105. Are you liable to a week or a fortnight or a month's notice?—I should say it would have to be a quarter's notice, as I am paid quarterly.

52,106. Although you say you were appointed by the Treasury, would the registrar have power to dismiss you?—I have been appointed by the Treasury before 1889, and I should hold that he would have no power to dismiss me, as I was a Treasury appointment.

52,107. Have you known men dismissed who were appointed under similar conditions to yourself?—I know of one clerk who was appointed before, and there were defalcations in his accounts, and the registrar wrote up to the Treasury about it. He simply suspended him before that, but did not dismiss him himself.

52,108. In your office is there any recognised rule as to the promotion of clerks?—As a rule it is by seniority unless a man proves himself incapable of being promoted. I have never known one put over the head of another, although, as I said just now, I have known outsiders brought in.

52,109. That leads to another point. Have you known any registrars using their powers in order to appoint family relations?—That, I think, we gave an instance of just now—a registrar putting in a relation or friend.

52,110. Does that practice obtain to any considerable extent, or to such an extent, as to have assumed the form of a scandal?—No, I should not think to a great extent. We only know of isolated cases.

52,111. Does the registrar apply for this lump sum every year?—No. If the number of complaints went down the Treasury would intimate that he must not appoint a fresh clerk without consulting them.

52,112. That is to say, the Treasury do not write down to each registrar every year and say: "We are preparing the Estimates for next year, and would like to know whether you are likely to require the same sum for wages next year as for the past year"?—No.

52,113. Have you known any cases where the registrars have applied to the Treasury for an increase in their lump sum on the ground that the remuneration of their clerks was inadequate?—Yes.

52,114. They do that sometimes?—On the ground that they have been so long without a rise, but not able to give the ground of increase of work.

52,115. Coming back to your own case in regard to that, you say you are the third clerk?—Yes.

52,116. And you began, I understood you to say, at 40*l.* a year?—Yes.

52,117. Have your increments been fairly regular and progressive?—No, it may be 10 years without an increase at all.

52,118. In that case you must have had at times rather a big jump?—The biggest jump I had was 40*l.* once when I was appointed as cashier, but, as a rule, it has been 15*l.* or 20*l.* at the outside.

52,119. What reason had you to say that you thought that the registrars would be in favour of your becoming established Civil servants?—I was thinking in my answer of my own registrar. I spoke to him before I came here, and he appeared to be favourable to it. He is the Vice-President of the Registrars' Association, and Mr. Lowe is the President. I asked him if he thought Mr. Lowe would be favourable towards the staff becoming Civil servants, and he said, "Yes, as far as I know."

52,120. Did you ever hear of clerks to surveyors of taxes?—Yes.

52,121. Has your association ever considered their former position as being in some respects analogous to yours?—They are analogous, I should say. Some of them—the senior clerks, I think—were put upon the establishment, but I think they are all going to be put upon the establishment. (Mr. Wade.) They used to be paid by lump sum. (Mr. Hemmons.) I think all in the near future will be established, if they are not already.

52,122. Perhaps you are not far wrong, but I was wondering whether, in regard to this question of superannuation, you might not be able to find some such way out of the difficulties that appear to have been facing you as to a superannuation scheme, but it appears you have given consideration to that matter.

52,123. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) You have submitted to us a paper by Mr. C. J. Fletcher, of Rugby. It is sent to us by the County Courts Officials Association?—(Mr. Wade.) I believe that was sent by the Smaller Courts Association before the amalgamation.

52,124. Is there anyone here who was concerned in sending that in?—I belonged to that association, but I know nothing whatever about it. I have read it.

52,125. Mr. Fletcher says: "I remember reading the Report of the Commission or Committee appointed a few years ago to inquire into the subject of imprisonment for debt as it is commonly termed. There were two of the judges who gave evidence, who stated that they seldom cared to make orders of com-

"mittal, and they found that one of the results was a large reduction in the entry of complaints, a result to which their registrars soon drew their attention, explaining the effect of it upon their salaries." Do you remember when that Commission or Committee sat?—No, but I know it is the case, that where the judges have refused to commit in certain courts the number of complaints has gone down as a result of it, and the registrar's salary follows suit, and therefore it detrimentally affects the clerks and officers in their employ.

52,126. And you think probably that that result has been represented to the judge?—I could not say.

52,127. In another paper which your association submitted, they said: "The registrar is frequently absent, either in connection with the business of his own private practice, or for other reasons, for days and sometimes weeks together?"—That is so.

52,128. Does that apply to a good many registrars?—It does.

52,129. And meanwhile the office is run by the clerk?—Yes. I can give cases which happened in my own experience. My late registrar has been absent at times for three months together, and at other times for a month. I am not saying it against him, but only as a matter of fact. My present registrar went to Italy last year for a month, appointed no deputy, and left me in charge during the whole time.

52,130. (Chairman.) What happened to the judicial work of the registrar in his absence?—He appointed another solicitor to sit for him on the court day which came while he was away. It is a monthly court.

52,131. Has he power to appoint a deputy?—Yes, but he is not obliged to do so.

52,132. Then he appointed a deputy for the purposes of the court work?—For the purposes of the court work only for one day.

52,133. (Sir John Kempe.) In your memorial you say that: "The total amount of public money passing through the hands of the officials was over 3,000,000*l.*, which had to be paid into a public account at a bank sanctioned by the Treasury, all fees having to be accounted for to the Treasury, the books and accounts being audited by a Treasury auditor." The Treasury auditor is the superintendent of County Courts at the Treasury?—(Mr. Hemmons.) There are a number of auditors under him superintending.

52,134. But it is his department?—Yes.

52,135. Can you tell me what the extent of the audit is. You say, "books and accounts being audited." Does he go into the details?—(Mr. Wade.) Not into all records.

52,136. How does the registrar satisfy himself that there has been no defalcation amongst his own officials?—If he is not satisfied with the examiners' audit he would do it himself, but the examiners do it pretty thoroughly.

52,137. Do they look into the receipts and cheques?—Yes, all receipts and papers. (Mr. Hemmons.) It takes him a fortnight every quarter to examine the one court at Bristol.

52,138. I understood the superintendent that he did not go beyond checking the balance sheets?—He checks all the salaries. (Mr. Wade.) And the fees due to the Treasury, and all such things as that.

52,139. (Chairman.) Does he check the cash book entries with the vouchers—the receipts?—Mr. Hemmons.) He does some. He has not time to do it all in the court, but he does some here and there.

52,140. A test examination?—Yes. (Mr. Wade.) He could not test all the postings in the ledger. He could not do it in the time: there are thousands of entries.

52,141. (Sir John Kempe.) We are told that the postings from the cash book to the ledgers could not be checked, but any deficit is made good by the registrar?—(Mr. Wade.) That is so. The registrar has to give a bond to the Treasury.

52,142. Still the superintendent does satisfy himself by a test audit?—Yes. (Mr. Hemmons.) You asked me just now what reason I had to believe that the registrars and high bailiffs would be agreeable to our being made Civil servants with pensions. The high bailiff in our Bristol Court was appointed when we were at the top of our numbers—25,000 complaints. We have now gone to nearly half that since the war, and his salary has gone down in consequence. I think he would be agreeable to having a fixed salary—you will allow that. The registrars are also suffering in the same way.

52,143. (Chairman.) Have the other gentlemen any special points they wish to add to what Mr. Hemmons has said?—(Mr. Cross.) The number of clerks and bailiffs over 65 years of age is 58.

52,144. Is that among the whole staff of the courts or among your members?—That is in the over 6,000 complaints courts, over the whole, so far as we have been able to find out, in 1913.

52,145. Are there any points you wish to add to what Mr. Hemmons has said?—No, I am in the High Bailiff's Department at the Cardiff County Court.

52,146. Do the arguments and considerations Mr. Hemmons has explained apply generally to the staff of the High Bailiff's Department?—I think, with regard to the indoor staff, if I may be allowed to say so, in the high bailiff's office it is necessary to have some legal experience. When I entered I had passed the preliminary law examination, and it was necessary to do so in order to get the post. Things have changed in the County Courts in the last 20 years.

52,147. In what direction?—That there is a different class of bailiff and clerk altogether. Under the old system a bailiff used to be promoted up to chief bailiff, and there are some now in the courts who are hardly able to spell the King's English, and are not fit for the post. All that is changing. Every clerk now in a high bailiff's office is got from a solicitor's office. I had been for 10 years before in a solicitor's office.

52,148. You had served 10 years in a solicitor's office?—Yes, and I have been in the high bailiff's office 25 years. We tried to promote one of the bailiffs to be next clerk to me, but it was useless. They are a distinct class; they are outdoor men entirely, and the legal training is not so necessary.

52,149. Your point is, that under the present circumstances, some legal training is necessary for the high bailiff's clerks?—Yes.

52,150. And you would apply Mr. Hemmons' argument as regards security of tenure, pension, and establishment as Civil servants, to the high-bailiff's staff as well as to the registrar's staff?—Yes, and I should like to say with regard to the duties of the bailiffs that we have not set out any list of duties, because they are so numerous that it would occupy a good deal of your time.

52,151. I suppose we may say, broadly speaking, they execute the processes of the Court?—Yes, and at great risk of life, which I can prove in many cases.

52,152. Is that risk of life from violence on the part of the persons on whom process is being executed?—Yes, and almost international questions arise in Admiralty matters. I can give a personal instance of a French ship when I tried to arrest her, and the captain and his crew lined up on the deck just outside Cardiff on the East Mud and threw the French flag across the bulwarks of the ship, and, with hammers and different things in their hands, dared anybody to come across. I could not get the tug people to rush it with me; they were not Englishmen enough to do it, and I had to retire. That same night that man sank that boat, a French barque loaded with patent fuel. The high bailiff looked to me to execute that warrant and arrest that ship and detain her, and, of course, the great responsibility was upon my shoulders. I was down there nearly all the night watching this boat, and at last I patched her up and towed her into dock, because I found that the captain had sunk the ship on the mud.

52,153. In order to escape the arrest of the ship?—Yes. He did not escape because I patched her up and towed her in, but he thought, as undoubtedly would have happened in two or three tides, she would have gone to pieces. She was covered with water at high-water. That is one instance. There are dozens of such instances in Admiralty cases because the bailiffs have no uniform. In the High Court the work is done by the Marshal through the Customs House, and the Custom House officers being in uniform they take notice of. They take no notice of a bailiff because he has no uniform.

52,154. (Sir John Kempe.) Are not you entitled to call on the Custom House officers to help you?—No; and there is great difficulty with the police, even with ordinary warrants of arrest.

52,155. (Chairman.) Are you not entitled to call upon the police to help you?—We are entitled to, but there is difficulty because they say the warrant is not addressed to them. If we arrest a prisoner after 9 o'clock when a gaol is closed we have to keep him in our own house all night. I have known that some of our men have gone to bed with a prisoner in the prisoner's house, have slept with him all night, and the next morning taken him to gaol. There again is a risk all the time. It is easy enough for a man, and it is natural enough—I do not blame him—to get annoyed when he is going to be arrested. I suppose any of us would feel the same; so there is a risk all the time.

52,156. You were speaking of the clerical staff of the high-bailiff?—Yes.

52,157. There is also the outdoor staff—the bailiffs?—Yes.

52,158. Do you suggest that they should be made pensionable also?—Yes, I do, because they have nothing to look forward to at all. If they are injured in the course of their duties they are dismissed. There is no compensation of any kind or description, except under the Workmen's Compensation Act, and that is very little. It is the execution of a public duty, because the warrants are addressed to the bailiffs. They themselves have a right apart from the high bailiff to execute warrants. They are officers of the court, and can be dismissed by a County Court judge, which does not apply to a clerk. They are in a very difficult and dangerous position, and I think it is only fair they should have some compensation. The Treasury have been asked for compensation. I have cases where they have been asked for it and where it has been refused.

52,159. Compensation for injury?—Yes.

52,160. That is to say, in addition to the compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act?—Yes. I mean there is no help at all from the Treasury; that is the attitude they take up. With regard to the bailiffs' work outside, there are 15 different kinds of summonses which have to be served at 15 different and varying times for the last day of service so many days before the Court day.

52,161. Is that indicated on the summons?—No.

52,162. The bailiff has to know the particular kind of summons that has to be served so many days before it is due?—Yes. Then again in our district we run 13 miles around Cardiff and anything may happen with regard to a bailiff, and he has to decide on the spot what he is to do. Last week we had a case on a mountain about five miles out of Cardiff. The defendant was not the tenant of the house, and the furniture in the house was said to belong to the defendant. The bailiff had to decide at once on his own whether he dare go into another person's house to seize the goods of the debtor. As a matter of fact they turned out to be not the goods of the debtor. Then you see he was liable to an action for trespass; he had no business there at all, although he had been directed there. But fortunately with his experience he managed to settle all those questions. It requires a good deal of tact and ability in a man to avoid what I think would very often end in a public scandal and a breach of the peace. I have had to prosecute many people for similar things, and even had magistrates refuse to fine a defendant for striking one of the bailiffs on the ground that the goods he had seized were not the goods of the defendant. As I pointed out to the magistrate, it was for the County Court judge to decide whether they were or were not; and then he brought the prisoner back and fined him 5s., but there was no compensation to the bailiff. The Treasury take the whole of the fines and pay the costs of the prosecution, and all that the bailiff gets is the injury—perhaps that is sufficient.

52,163. (Sir John Kempe.) I suppose if you could call in the help of the Custom officers you would not do it probably?—We do inform the Customs that we have arrested a ship.

52,164. Do you inform them on every occasion or only when you have some reason for doing so?—They would not help us at all. We very often get processes for Custom officers ourselves; in fact, we find great difficulty in anyone helping the bailiffs in their work.

52,165. (Chairman.) (To Mr. Wade.) Have you any points you wish to add. Do you speak specially with regard to the smaller courts?—Yes, although the principal part of the work of all the Courts is identical. There was one question which was addressed to Mr. Hemmons earlier as to a comparison of the work of a solicitor's clerk and the work of a County Court clerk, and a comparison of their respective salaries. I have been in both offices. I was in a solicitor's office for 10 years before going into the County Court office, and I have been in the latter for 15 years, and I have not the slightest hesitation in saying that the ordinary work of a solicitor's office does not compare with that of a County Court office. The work of a County Court office is much more complex and intricate, and requires a lot more skill and study than the ordinary work of a solicitor's office. It has been brought home to me very forcibly since the war began, because I have been obliged, owing to the slackness of the County Court work, to assist my registrar in his private work, and so I have gone back to solicitor's work again, and I have been astonished after being out of it for 10 years to find how easy it seems after the complexity of the County Court system. Of course, that is only my opinion, but it is a practical one, because I have been through it myself.

52,166. Why did you leave your private employment to go to the County Court office?—Because I had to do several branches of work. There was not sufficient County Court work to keep me employed the whole time. I had to do partly solicitor's work and partly County Court work, and I preferred to go into employment where I could study one particular branch, and I went into a neighbouring County Court office as a whole-timer.

52,167. Was that solicitor, in whose office you were, a registrar?—Yes.

52,168. And you were doing partly solicitor's work and partly County Court work?—That is so, and I got promotion and a considerable increase when I changed.

52,169. In a different County Court?—Yes, a larger one.

52,170. You got an advance of salary?—That is so. I was only speaking of the comparison between the work of the two offices. I should like to speak with regard to a few of the grievances in the case of the under 6,000 plaintiffs courts. With regard to the main principles, we claim the same as in the case of the over 6,000 plaintiffs courts, that where we are whole-timers we really do the ministerial work of a public branch of the State and are entitled to be paid adequate salaries and to proper promotion and security of tenure, which at present we have not got. You may say to us, "Why do you not bring forward specific instances of hardship?" I should only be too pleased if I could. I have tried all I know, but the clerks who have suffered say: "No, I cannot possibly let you bring these cases before the Commissioners, because if my registrar hears of it I may be immediately discharged." But I can assure you that at the present time there are a lot of very unjust things going on in the County Courts some not so very far from where I live which ought not to go on, and which would not go on if we were established Civil servants. At the present time we get paid our salaries out of the lump sum which the registrar receives on a sliding scale according to the amount of business for the particular year, and he can pay us exactly as much or as little of that amount as he feels disposed. Some registrars are very good indeed, and I have no personal complaint to make against my own registrar, but their ideas vary very much. What one registrar thinks is an adequate salary another does not, and so it comes about that in neighbouring courts of practically the same size there is sometimes a discrepancy in the salaries amounting to about 40 per cent. That naturally leads to a lot of dissatisfaction.

52,171. Do the registrars who pay the lower salaries find much difficulty in recruiting their staff?—I do not think so, because probably somebody has promotion to that court from a smaller court where he was getting a smaller salary.

52,172. And the men whom they get are efficient?—I should say so. (Mr. Hemmons.) Two clerks have left our court at Bristol because there was nothing ahead of them.

52,173. Did they go to another County Court or to private employment?—One went to Canada and one went into trade. (Mr. Wade.) There is no standard of pay or increment, and nothing for a man to look forward to. I do not complain personally against my registrar, but I have had no increase in my salary for six years, although I hope I have been gradually getting more efficient all the time.

52,174. What is your salary at present?—140*l.*

52,176. Is that because there are none, or because the registrar does not allow you anything out of his fees?—Because the salary of the registrar does not justify him in paying me any more. I have no doubt he would do so if he could, but he is paid this sliding sum, and I dare say he does not feel justified in paying out more, especially as at the present time, owing to the war, his own salary is almost gone altogether. Then, although a registrar at present may be fair and pay his clerks adequately, he may die or retire, and the incoming registrar, who may not have seen the inside of a County Court office in his life, has the power to discharge the whole of the staff, decrease their salaries, or reduce the staff and put extra work on those who are left. It is these things that we so strongly object to. We consider we are working on a very unfair system, with no standard of pay, no increment, no promotion, and no pension, whilst in other branches of the public service, such as the High Court, where the work is similar, and the City of London Court, where it is identical, they have the protection of security of tenure and all the privileges of a standard rate of pay, increment, and pension rights. This is bound, as you can understand, to lead to a certain amount of dissatisfaction. We know what our salaries and responsibilities are, and what their salaries and responsibilities are. In the case of a small court, say, with 1,000 or 2,000 plaintiffs, where the registrar is not a whole-time servant, under the present system he is under no obligation to go into that County Court office for a week, two weeks, or a month; He has to attend the sittings of the Court and do certain judicial acts, but he is not obliged to devote any specified part of his time to the duties of the office. Moreover, he is allowed to practise privately and to take public appointments, and most of the registrars are busy men who have plenty to do in their own private practice, and have not time to study County Court practice, and the consequence is the clerks have to make a study of the work to carry it on in the absence of the registrar. We are responsible and are there the whole time, and whatever points crop up we have to deal with. We have to study the law and the rules and orders under the various Acts of Parliament, and carry out the work for the most part unaided.

52,177. You are in the office of the Trowbridge Court?—I am.

52,178. How many plaintiffs has that?—Our average number is about 1,200 a year, but the number dropped last year owing to the war.

52,179. How many clerks are there?—I had a boy with me until the war, but I have done it all myself ever since—all the clerk's work.

52,180. And it takes your whole time?—Yes.

52,181. You do not do any private work for the registrar?—I did not until just recently, but the registrar has lost two clerks who have enlisted, and I have lately worked overtime helping him in his private practice. I should like to add that anything I say is not at all personal against my own registrar, who knows I am coming here to-day, and he told me one thing which always struck him as what he considered more or less an injustice in the present lump-sum sliding scale of salaries, and that is this: that in most small courts there are certain customers who issue a large number of summonses in the year, and they consider that they have therefore a right to demand certain orders of the Court. For instance, the registrar may say, "I do not think the defendant can pay, as you wish it, forthwith; I think, perhaps, I ought to make it 1l. a month, or 14 days," and they press for payment forthwith, and the registrar cannot help being influenced, inasmuch as they are his principal customers, and if he offends them they may take away their summonses and so reduce the number of complaints and the consequent salary.

* As a general rule clerks in "Under 6,000" Courts do not get any part of the fees.—E. H. W.

52,182. Where could they take their summonses to?—Instead of issuing them, as some big firms do, in the court in which they reside, on an affidavit, they can issue them in the court in which the defendant resides without any affidavit.

52,183. Have they the option of issuing them either in their own district or in the district of the debtor?—Yes. (Mr. Hemmons.) They can issue them in their district if the cause of action arises in the district. (Mr. Wade.) On an affidavit disclosing jurisdiction.

52,184. Does that apply to all debtors?—(Mr. Wade.) To all debtors who live out of the jurisdiction.

52,185. Are those all the points which you wish to bring forward?—(Mr. Cross.) May I put in a list of the salaries of the bailiffs in the Cardiff County Court, with the dates of their appointment; also a list of about 10 officers, showing their length of service and pay in different courts; a list of the different kinds of summonses the bailiff has to deal with, and the number of days after service? (Mr. Wade.) This point may crop up later: A question between the whole-timer and the part-timer, where some sort of division can be drawn between what amount of work may and what amount may not justify a whole-time official. From my own experience, which is of small courts, I should say that a court of somewhere between 700 and 800 complaints per annum would be about sufficient for a whole-time clerk and a whole-time bailiff. To corroborate this, I mention the case of a court in my own circuit where the work was rather badly performed, and the judge had to reprimand the clerk in court upon the slackness of his work, and his excuse was that he was unable to devote proper time to the County Court business because he had to do private work for the registrar as well, and the judge of the court directed the registrar to appoint a fresh clerk who should devote the whole of his time to the duties of the office. In that court the complaints were approximately 700 a year. (Mr. Cross.) There is one other thing I should like to put in—the number of complaints and the allowances for clerk hire in a series of courts, showing that there is no system, and that one court with the same number of complaints gets 200*l.* more than another.

52,186. Is that for the high bailiff's allowance?—And for the registrar.

52,187. Is that in courts of over 6,000 complaints?—Yes. Some of them have gone down, but still they are regarded as being over 6,000.

52,188. Does not that inequality arise from the fact that the number of complaints in one court has gone down, and the allowance is not levelled down to correspond?—But you have the corresponding thing: Some courts where the numbers have gone up and the salaries have not increased.

52,189. My point is that when you get a rise in the amount of work you very soon get the allowance increased to correspond, because the registrar makes an application; but when there is a reduction in the work you do not get a reduction in the allowance until there are vacancies. Therefore in the meantime there would be an inequality between the allowances in the two courts?—But even in 6,000 complaints courts the allowance is reduced when the complaints are reduced.

52,190. Is it not the case that the allowance is not reduced except when there are vacancies?—No, it is reduced when the amount of work comes down in courts with over 6,000 complaints.

52,191. But not immediately?—Not immediately, because the number of complaints fluctuates. It is easy for a man to come in and issue 500 summonses himself in one day, which would make it go up. I have known that happen.

52,192. Supposing in one, two, or three years, in a court with over 6,000 complaints, the number of complaints goes down, the allowance is not immediately reduced?—Oh, no.

52,193. It is only reduced when there is a vacancy in the staff?—Yes, or after two years if the complaints keep down and do not go up again.

52,194. Is it ever reduced when there is not a vacancy in the staff?—Yes.

52,195. You are sure of that?—Yes. (Mr. Hemmons.) In my own court a year ago it happened. (Mr. Cross.) The high bailiff at Cardiff has letters saying that he must consider that unless the number of complaints increases his allowance must be cut down.

52,196. Can you give an actual case where the allowance was cut down without there being a vacancy?—(Mr. Hemmons.) One year ago in Bristol 200*l.* was taken off, and at the same time the Treasury said that the registrars must make it up out of their fees.

52,197. I thought at that time you said there was a vacancy?—No, there was no vacancy.

52,198. I thought you said the senior clerk had gone?—That was 14 or 15 years ago. There was no vacancy a year ago. There had been a large reduction in the number of complaints in Bristol previously to the war.

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-SIXTH DAY.

Thursday, 15th April 1915.

PRESENT:

SIR HENRY BABINGTON SMITH, K.C.B., C.S.I. (Chairman).

The Right Hon. LORD MERSEY.
Sir DONALD MACALISTER, K.C.B.
Sir JOHN ARROW KEMPE, K.C.B.
Mr. ARTHUR BOUTWOOD.
Mr. CECIL COWARD.

Mr. PERCY EWING MATHESON.
Mr. ARTHUR EVERETT SHIPLEY, F.R.S.
Mr. GRAHAM WALLAS.
Miss HALDANE.
Mrs. DEANE STREATFEILD.

Mr. E. W. H. MILLAR (Secretary).

Mr. J. F. TOWNSEND, Mr. A. BROCKLESBY, and Mr. R. L. OVERBURY, called and examined.

52,199. (Chairman.) (To Mr. Townsend.) You are a clerk in the first class in the Central Office of the Supreme Court of Judicature?—Yes. I am what used to be called a principal clerk who went up to 700*l.* a year.

52,200. How long have you been in that department?—I have been in the Summons and Order Department since about 1886.

52,201. How long have you been in the offices of the Court?—48 years.

52,202. That is since 1867?—Since 1867.

52,203. What is your present salary?—660*l*.

52,204. (To Mr. Brocklesby.) You are a clerk in the second class?—I am a second class clerk in the Central Office.

52,205. What is your length of service?—34 years.

52,206. For the whole of that time in the Central Office?—Yes.

52,207. You are at present at the maximum of the second class?—Yes.

52,208. (To Mr. Overbury.) You are a clerk in the third class?—In the third class.

52,209. And what is your service?—4½ years.

52,210. (To Mr. Townsend.) Had you any service or experience in a solicitor's office or any other legal office before entering the offices of the Supreme Court?—No; I was 17 years of age when I entered, and I came straight from a public school.

52,211. (To Mr. Brocklesby.) Had you any previous experience?—Yes, two or three years' experience.

52,212. In what capacity?—Well, I did everything.

52,213. In a solicitor's office?—Yes.

52,214. As a junior clerk in a solicitor's office?—I had the management. We were solicitors for Lord St. Vincent, and we managed two fairly large estates, and all the litigation, all the legal work in connection with that fell to my share.

52,215. What had been your legal training or experience before that?—None whatever before that.

52,216. Did you at once step into the charge of all the legal business connected with these estates without any previous learning or experience?—No, gradually, by degrees. I was the only clerk. I went to this gentleman in the Temple with a view to being articled to him, but he died after a few years.

52,217. What age were you then?—I was 19.

52,218. When you began?—When I began I was 16 or 17; 16, I think.

52,219. So that when you were 19 were you in complete charge of all the legal business in connection with these two estates?—Yes, he left it all to me—under supervision. I used to write to him occasionally.

52,220. Under the supervision of your principal?—Yes.

52,221. Why did you leave that important work to enter the offices of the Court?—I thought it was a better prospect for me.

52,222. (To Mr. Overbury.) You will speak on behalf of the third class clerks in the office?—Yes.

52,223. Will you tell us briefly what the case is that you wish to present on their behalf?—I think you have before you the petition which has been sent in by the clerks in the Central Office.

52,224. The Commission have before them a petition to the Lord Chancellor, dated the 16th December 1912. Is that the paper to which you refer?—That is the petition.

52,225. You wish to put forward the representations made in that document?—I do.

52,226. You suggest there that the salary of a third class clerk is not adequate, considering the work which he performs?—That is so.

52,227. On what do you base that suggestion?—We base it on the suggestion that in other departments of the State, where the work is of equal importance, the scale is higher.

52,228. Will you tell us to which departments you refer?—I cannot speak of my own knowledge of many departments, but a list has been prepared of certain departments where the scale or the maximum which may be obtained is higher than in our department or in the Central Office.

52,229. Are those departments in which you represent that the work is similar to the work that you perform?—Yes, it is work we say of equal importance. I do not know that we can compare the actual work of our department with the work of those departments.

52,230. Are those departments entered in a similar manner?—One department is entered in a similar manner, the Privy Council Office.

52,231. Are you speaking of the Judicial Department of the Privy Council?—Yes.

52,232. What is the scale there to which you refer?—I am afraid I have not the scale of the third class, but my point was that they have the opportunity of rising to a higher maximum than we have.

52,233. Which are the clerks to whom you refer?—In the Privy Council Office I think it is the second class clerk who rises to 800*l*., I think.

52,234. How many second class clerks are there in the Privy Council?—That I do not know.

52,235. So far as I see, there is no second class of clerks in the Privy Council Office. There is a second clerk. That is only one single person, not a class at all. There is also one single person who is termed third clerk. That hardly seems to afford a large basis for comparison?—No.

52,236. Will you pass on to one of the other offices with which you wish to compare yourselves?—There is the Principal Probate Registry, that is another department.

52,237. What is the scale of the third class there?—The scale of the third class is the same as the scale in the Central Office.

52,238. Then what is the inference that you draw from that?—My point there again was that they have an opportunity of rising to a higher maximum by promotion.

52,239. I thought you were dealing with the salary of the third class clerks at present. So far as the salary of the third class clerks is concerned, the Probate Registry is on the same footing as you are?—Exactly.

52,240. Will you deal with that point first, the question of salary?—It is rather difficult to deal with one class alone, because we are not on the same footing as the different departments of the Civil Service, and probably there is no class which is exactly similar to our own class. It is rather difficult to compare the scale.

52,241. It was your own suggestion to deal with the three classes separately. Do I gather then that as regards the salary of the third class specially, you have no specific cases to put forward with which you wish to compare yourselves?—I can of my own knowledge compare the work with that of one other department. So far as I know there is no third class in this other department, but speaking of the difficulty or the importance of the work: At the beginning of the war, I was lent for service to the Admiralty Transport Department, and I did certain work there which I believe is done by assistant transport clerks, I think they are called, and their scale I believe is 350*l*. to 500*l*. I can say of my own knowledge that the work there is not certainly of more difficulty than our own; but of course that is not a legal department.

52,242. It is a little difficult to compare the work in their case, is it not; it is so entirely of a different character?—Yes, I have a difficulty in making a comparison with another legal department.

52,243. Was that class of clerks a permanent class, or was it a class temporarily arising out of the war?—No, it was a permanent class.

52,244. We have no evidence, so far as I know, as to that class or as to the exact nature of their work, but do you suggest that there is a direct comparison between it and the third class clerks in the Central Office?—The work was not more difficult or more important than the work of the Central Office.

52,245. Have you compared the salaries and the work assigned to the third class in the Central Office with the salaries and work performed by solicitor's clerks in the outside profession?—I have not compared the work.

52,246. You do not base your claim for a better salary on any comparison of that kind?—I am afraid I do not know very much about the work in a solicitor's office; I do not know what class of solicitors' clerks you are comparing us with.

52,247. I mean Common Law clerks in a solicitor's office?—I should say that our work was more important.

52,248. Have you any knowledge of the salaries paid to such clerks?—I have no definite knowledge.

52,249. You have not gone into that comparison for the purpose of supporting your claim?—No.

52,250. The particular claim that you put forward in your petition is that the salary of the third class should be 120*l.* rising by annual increments of 15*l.* to 250*l.*, instead of the present scale of 100*l.* rising to 200*l.*; is that not so?—That is so.

52,251. Are there any other points you wish to put before us in support of that claim?—The real grievance of the third class clerks in the Central Office is the slowness of promotion.

52,252. What is the service of the man at the head of the third class at present?—8½ years.

52,253. So that he has not yet reached the maximum of his scale?—No.

52,254. Have you compared that with the rate of promotion in other offices of the Supreme Court?—May I explain the probable reason for that?

52,255. Yes?—Some four or five years ago a number of men, four or five, I think, were transferred from the Central Office to the Court of Criminal Appeal, and those men were either junior second class or senior third class clerks; that accounts for the recent rapidity of promotion from the third class to the second.

52,256. At the present moment the position as regards promotion from the third class appears to be not unsatisfactory?—It is not unsatisfactory. I have here tables showing how in future the promotion of the third class clerks will be exceedingly slow, if I might show you these (handing in the same).

52,257. These tables are based on what assumptions?—It is assumed in the black ink writing that the length of service is 45 years.

52,258. That is to say, you assume that all clerks will have served 45 years before retirement?—Yes.

52,259. Irrespective of their original age of entry?—That is so.

52,260. You assume that a man who entered at the age of 30 will serve 45 years?—Yes.

52,261. Is there any allowance for casualties by retirement from ill-health or death?—There is no allowance for casualties.

52,262. In order to get an accurate forecast, surely you ought to make allowance for casualties?—You ought probably, but casualties, I think, are very low. The number of deaths of members of the staff during service is very small.

52,263. But if you take the ordinary actuarial basis which would be taken for insurance purposes, you would probably get a result approximating to the facts, would you not?—I have not done that.

52,264. To get an accurate forecast, there ought to be that additional allowance?—Certainly.

52,265. Especially as you were assuming that persons who enter at the age of 30, or approaching 30, will serve to the age of 75 or thereabouts, when casualties may become rather more frequent?—The red ink figures show the estimated years of retirement and promotion, if retirement be made compulsory after 40 years' service.

52,266. Will you tell us very briefly what your result is on the bases you take? Your two bases are retirement after 45 years' service and retirement after 40 years' service. What is your estimate as regards the number of years' service before promotion?—The estimate based on the assumption that retirement takes place after 45 years' service, is that the length of service in the third class shows an average of 18·8 years.

52,267. The figures that you give, and on which that average is based, show a steadily increasing length of service as you get down the list, do they not?—Yes.

52,268. Does not that steadily increasing length of service suggest that you have overlooked an important item, namely, casualties?—That may be the effect.

52,269. Shall we pass on to the second class? (To Mr. Brocklesby.) You proposed to give evidence with regard to the second class?—If you please.

52,270. Your general representation is, I understand, of the same character as that on behalf of the third class?—Yes.

52,271. Are there any points that you wish to add specially in respect of the second class?—No, I do not know that there are.

52,272. The suggestion made in the petition is that the salary of the second class should be 300*l.*, rising by annual increments of 20*l.* to 450*l.*, instead of the present salary of 250*l.*, rising by 15*l.* to 400*l.*?—Yes.

52,273. Have you any comparisons with other work or other offices that you wish to suggest as regards the second class?—No, except the Chancery Division; there they have 23 first class clerks, whereas we have only 11.

52,274. You suggest that the proportion of higher places in the Chancery Division is larger than that in the Central Office?—Yes, a great deal larger.

52,275. It has been represented to us in evidence that the work in the Chancery Division is of a more difficult and complicated and responsible character than the work in the Central Office. Do you agree with that?—I should not say so. I do not think so—certainly not, judging by my own work.

52,276. It has been represented to us that in the Chancery offices there is a large amount of administrative work dealing with estates and properties, and also that the nature of the Chancery proceedings and orders is more complicated than corresponding work on the Common Law side. Do you agree with that?—(Mr. Townsend.) If I may intervene, a clerk, Mr. Lovell, who was in our department, was transferred to the Chancery Division and made a first class clerk, and I am told that he had a very high character there for his ability and the way in which he did his work. His training had been entirely in judges' chambers; he was originally one of the judge's clerks in the old judges' chambers. He was transferred to the Central Office when it was formed, and we worked in with the old judge's clerks as long as they lived; he was transferred, to get rid of the judge's clerks, to the Chancery Division, and I am told that his character there was very high for the ability with which he did his work.

52,277. (Mr. Coward.) He is not a first class clerk now, is he?—I believe he is dead; I am not sure.

52,278. (Chairman.) But, speaking generally, would you agree with that statement that the Chancery work is of a more complicated character than the Common Law work?—I think one cannot deny that it is more complicated, because a Chancery order has to go into more details than generally happen in Common Law orders. I do not think it necessarily requires more ability, if I may say so. I do not think it requires a higher class of man to do the work there than it does to do the work of orders on the Common Law side.

52,279. (To Mr. Brocklesby.) You suggest that there is a disproportion between the relative numbers in the classes in the Central Office and in the Chancery Office?—I do.

52,280. That, of course, is a comparison that might cut in both directions. It may be that the proportion is too large on the Chancery side?—Quite so.

52,281. What is the length of service of the men at the top of the second class in the Central Office?—Thirty-six years Mr. Baynes and 35 years Mr. Hall.

52,282. And among the most recent promotions what is the length of service? Is Mr. Woodcock the latest promoted into the second class?—Mr. Darwall, I think.

52,283. What is Mr. Darwall's length of service at present?—Something very small, I believe. (Mr. Townsend.) Seven years.

52,284. A little over seven years?—(Mr. Brocklesby.) Yes, but that was brought about by the reason stated by Mr. Overbury, by the clearance in the office caused by the formation of the Court of Criminal Appeal; they were particularly lucky.

52,285. When did that take place?—(Mr. Townsend.) About four or five years ago. I think if you have the list of the official staff before you you will be able to follow it by seeing the number of men appointed in one year. (Mr. Brocklesby.) In 1908.

52,286. In 1908 there appear to have been two promotions to the second class. Which was the year in which there was that special flow of promotion—1908?—(Mr. Townsend.) You will find that there were five men appointed to the office in 1908 and three in January 1909.

52,287. Which were the five in 1908?—(Mr. Brocklesby.) Mr. Griffiths was appointed in April 1908.

52,288. He was appointed to the public service in January 1906 apparently?—(Mr. Townsend.) He was two years in Chancery chambers.

52,289. He was transferred to the Central Office?—Yes.

52,290. So that he preferred the prospects in the Central Office?—Yes, I suppose so.

52,291. You say that there was a special flow of promotions into the second class owing to the transfer of men from the Central Office to the Court of Criminal Appeal. I do not see in which year there was any special flow of promotion?—The men who were transferred from the Central Office to the Court of Criminal Appeal were some of them third class men.

52,292. That would not affect the rate of promotion of the men at the top of the third class?—It would affect the rate of promotion of all men under those men who were transferred. It does not follow that it would affect it immediately, but in the case of any man who had had three or four years' service the man moved from above him would naturally be in a higher position and get his promotion sooner.

52,293. But this does not affect the men at present at the top of the third class?—If it had not been for those men being withdrawn they would have been lower down the class than they are.

52,294. But were the men who were withdrawn senior to the men who are at present at the top of the third class?—Yes, I think I may say all of them were.

52,295. So that it was by taking away men at the top of the third class, and not by taking men out of the second class, that the promotion from the third class was accelerated?—By both.

52,296. How many men were taken out of the second class?—I think there were two taken out of the second class, so far as I remember.

52,297. In which year was that?—In 1908.

52,298. I see in 1908 there were two promotions to the second class?—Yes, and the others must have been vacancies in the third class.

52,299. In 1907 there were three, and in 1909 there were two. I am talking now of promotions to the second class. In 1907 there were three?—Yes.

52,300. In 1908 there were two?—Yes.

52,301. In 1909 there were two?—Yes.

52,302. In 1911 there were two?—Yes.

52,303. In 1912 there were three?—Yes.

52,304. In 1913 there were four?—Yes.

52,305. It would appear, therefore, that so far as promotion to the second class is concerned 1908 was rather below than above the average?—Promotion to the second class.

52,306. So that if that withdrawal of men that you speak of had any effect on promotion, it was the fact of the withdrawal of men at the top of the third class rather than the withdrawal of men already in the second class?—Yes.

52,307. And, in fact, looking at the dates, the flow of promotion appears to have been very fairly steady over the last ten years or so?—It has been going down steadily for the last 15 years, and more than that.

52,308. (To Mr. Brocklesby.) At present there is no rule as regards retirement at the age of 65 in your office?—That is so.

52,309. Are you in favour of the establishment of such a rule?—I used to be very keen upon it at one time, but as one gets older one is not so keen.

52,310. (To Mr. Townsend.) What do you say?—I have been in favour of retirement at 65, as Mr. Brocklesby says, up to late years. I am now 65 myself, and I feel as capable of going on as I did a few years ago.

52,311. You begin to feel doubts about the equity of the rule as you get older?—I think it is a good principle, but I think there ought to be exceptions to it. I do not think I ought to travel outside this petition.

52,312. The petition mentions the question of retirement at 65, if I am not mistaken?—I think if you refer to Lord Coleridge's Committee you will find that they recommended retirement at 65 for the first class and retirement at 60 for the second class, with, in the case of the first class, an extension of time of five years if the heads of departments thought it was advisable.

52,313. You are acquainted with the ordinary Civil Service rule?—Yes.

52,314. Which is that a man may retire at 60, and he must retire at 65, unless in very special cases, in which a minute has to be laid on the table of the House of Commons, his retention is sanctioned beyond that limit?—I am aware of that.

52,315. Do you consider that rule would be suitable for the Central Office?—No, I do not think it would. I think the experience that a man gets in a certain position in the Law Courts when he comes to be at the top is one of very great usefulness, and it is knowledge that one can only get by experience.

52,316. (Mr. Coward.) What sort of knowledge would you say can only be got by experience?—It is knowledge of practice and procedure. I do not like going into details of this sort of thing, because it is somewhat awkward; but I have to sit in judges' chambers with the judge there, and I hear everything that is done in one case and another, and I can tell one judge what another judge has done under certain circumstances, what the practice as regards the details of the office is, which the judge perhaps does not understand—how his order will be carried through, and so on. It is difficult to say what I do. I believe Lord Mersey will know something about what was done in judges' chambers in days past.

52,317. (Chairman.) Your point is that the long experience of the practice of different judges enables clerks of long service to give useful information to the judges and masters under whom they are working?—Yes, there are things that perhaps may not turn up for two or three years' interval; for instance, in judges' chambers the judges have to deal with Inland Revenue matters, writs of extent and things of that sort; they are very rare, and a man who sits in chambers ought to be cognisant of the practice of all that sort of thing. Then some Crown Office applications come to chambers too, and it is necessary that the clerk who sits in chambers should also know the details of practice of those matters, and that knowledge is a thing that you cannot get except by experience.

52,318. Is it not primarily the master's duty to advise the judge on questions of practice of that kind?—No, the master never advises the judge unless the judge happens to send for him on a question on some case on appeal that has been before the master. I am not saying that I advise the judge, because it would be impertinent for me to say so, but I do give the judge information occasionally which he does not happen to possess. I call his attention to cases that I know of bearing on the subject, if sometimes counsel have missed them, and so forth.

52,319. Your suggestion is that the long experience is very valuable in matters of that kind?—I think so.

52,320. What may we take to be your recommendation to the Commission on the question of an age limit for retirement?—I think it would make a difference in the promotion of the juniors and, of course, speediness of promotion is really an increase of salary for a man because his prospects are increased and, therefore, it would be a good thing for the office to have a steady flow of promotion. No doubt it would do away with a great deal of discontent. But I think there are cases, where a man has had a good deal of experience and is known to be a good man, in which it would be an advantage that his time should be extended beyond 65 years of age.

52,321. (Lord Mersey.) Do you think that would be the opinion of men waiting for appointments?—No, I do not.

52,322. (Chairman.) (To Mr. Brocklesby.) Do you concur in what Mr. Townsend has said?—I must say that I think retirement at a fixed age would be a desirable thing for the office.

52,323. (To Mr. Overbury.) And do you agree?—I think so, too.

52,324. (To Mr. Townsend.) You speak specially on behalf of the first class?—Yes.

52,325. Have you any further points to put forward affecting the first class specially?—Yes, I want to say this, that though I believe Sir Kenneth Mackenzie gave evidence that none of the old staff remained, and that the old scale was practically worked out, I do not think that is so, because, if I may put it in this way, when I was a third class clerk I was receiving a salary up to 300*l.* a year, because, under the old scale, I should have been entitled to go up to that salary. When I was a second class clerk, the maximum of which was 400*l.*, I was receiving a scale, after 27 years' service in the Law Courts, from 400*l.* to 500*l.* I did not stop at the maximum of 400*l.*; I went on to 500*l.*

52,326. When were you promoted to the second class?—I was promoted to the second class after 21 years' service.

52,327. In what year?—That would be in 1888.

52,328. Did you receive, in the second class, the specially raised scale that was given as compensation to officers appointed before 1880?—Yes.

52,329. That is to say, a scale going up to 500*l.* instead of 400*l.*?—Yes.

52,330. Now that you are in the first class, do you receive the special scale?—When I first entered the first class I went up to 500*l.* to 600*l.*; then when a vacancy occurred among the principal clerkships, which, I think, was only three years ago, I was going up then by 20*l.* to 700*l.*, and I have got up to 660*l.*

52,331. Then, what is your point?—My point is this, that when it comes down to Mr. Brocklesby, for instance, and Mr. Baynes, the first two on this list, I believe, they do not go up to that 500*l.*

52,332. Because they were appointed after 1880?—Yes, if they have to wait for promotion until 30 years' service, to 400*l.*, that would be a very bad look-out for them, and, I think, myself, that the second class ought to be raised with a view to men who are higher up like that getting a better salary. You see, if you compare us with the Chancery chambers or with some of these other offices, the chances of promotion are so much greater with them than they are with us. For instance, in our case, we have 28 second class and 30 third class clerks to go up into 11 places; all of them cannot possibly get there, or anything like all of them. Thirty-seven years is an enormous number of years to serve before you get anything, and especially when the age of appointment to the office is from 20 to 30 years. I think, myself, that time ought to be altered to from 17 to 25 in order to give a man a chance of getting an income upon which he can marry and bring up a small family at a reasonable age; that he should not have to wait until he is 45 before he can marry; he ought to be able to marry between 27 and 35, and if you have a man for a long time on a low salary he cannot do it.

52,333. I gather from that, you are of opinion that men should be appointed without necessarily having had previous experience in a solicitor's office?—Certainly.

52,334. You do not think it is necessary?—No. I have had men in my department who have had experience in a solicitor's office, and I have nothing to say against them at all, because they are more useful when they first come in; but I think that any man, with a proper liberal education, can pick up the work in the offices themselves, and from a point of view that a man from outside would not. I think the class of man you want is the public school man.

52,335. Have you made any comparison of the salaries in the Central Office with the salaries in solicitors' offices?—No, I do not think the cases are comparable. I think that the class of man in a solicitor's office is quite a different class from the sort of man you want to have in the Law Courts. If you are talking of articulated clerks that is a different thing, but if you are talking of the ordinary solicitor's clerk he is not the same stamp of man, he has not the same education as the man we want in our office.

52,336. I am talking of men who rise to be managing clerks in solicitors' offices?—There again, some have been articulated clerks, and some are even solicitors themselves.

52,337. Some are and some are not?—Yes, some are of other classes of solicitors' clerks.

52,338. The public, with whom you have to deal in your work in the offices are mainly solicitors' clerks, are they not—the people with whom you come in contact?—Yes.

52,339. So that you have a considerable knowledge of solicitors' clerks?—Yes; some of them are very good and smart men.

52,340. How would you compare the work of a managing clerk in a large firm of solicitors, as regards importance and difficulty, with the work of first and second class clerks in the Central Office?—It is difficult to say, but I should rather compare it with the difference between a specialist and a general practitioner.

52,341. Meaning?—Meaning that the solicitor's clerk is the general practitioner who has to know a great deal more than we have to know in various fields, but in the particular field in which we are engaged we are more or less specialists.

52,342. The field of the solicitor's clerk would be considerably wider, I suppose?—I may say that every day of my life I have solicitors themselves, as well as solicitors' clerks, coming and asking me points of practice in my particular department, because, naturally I must know more about that than they do.

52,343. You are a specialist in your particular department?—Yes.

52,344. Which is your particular department?—The Summons and Order Department.

52,345. You do not consider that a comparison in point of salary between the Central Office and solicitors' clerks would be a fair comparison?—I do not think so. I think they are a different class of men.

52,346. (Mr. Matheson.) How are third class clerks appointed at present to your office?—By nomination.

52,347. From what you said just now with regard to the qualifications of the clerks, it looks rather as though it would be better to appoint them like Civil servants generally, by examination. What do you say about that?—I think the examination might very properly be raised. I think the present examination is rather a farce.

52,348. It is very elementary, is it not?—Yes.

52,349. Should you be in favour of having an examination something like that of the ordinary Civil Service, say an improved second division competitive examination?—I am afraid I am not familiar with what the examination is.

52,350. I will not go into the question of examination in detail, but would you be in favour of filling the posts by an examination in general education of a competitive kind—not nomination at all?—I see no objection to it at all.

52,351. (Sir John Kempe.) With regard to what you said about retirement by age, I gather that your principal reason against it is that age gives experience. Have you any knowledge at all of the experience gained in the Civil Service generally outside the legal departments?—No, I cannot say that I have any experience outside the legal departments.

52,352. Still, you would not be surprised if you found that problems in the Civil Service quite as difficult as any that you can find in the legal departments require mastery by experience, in fact that experience is quite as useful in the Civil Service as in the legal departments; you would be prepared to admit that?—I cannot say anything about what experience is in the Civil Service. I only happen to have come across one case that I know at all, where I think the gentleman was in the Foreign Office, and his experience was considered valuable, and they extended his time up to the age of 70. I have no doubt that in all Government offices the same remark would apply, that experience is valuable as long as a man keeps his faculties; but it may be for the general good of the Service to put aside that benefit altogether, and it may be that for the general good of the Service and the promotion of juniors that a fixed time of retirement ought to be enforced.

52,353. I think your argument would apply equally to the whole Civil Service generally?—I do not say that it does not.

52,354. You would not say that the experience in the legal departments is so different from that in the rest of the Civil Service that it ought to be treated specially?—No, I would not say that.

52,355. I see, in your memorial, you make a remark as regards the first class: "It is respectfully submitted

"that these principal clerkships," to which you have referred before, "ought to be permanently retained, as the Supreme Court has no position bearing special titles and carrying a salary of 700*l.* or 800*l.*, or even more, such as in several other public departments are open to clerks on the establishment."—Yes; perhaps I ought to have said something about that. I do not think, according to the petition, that it ought to be the four senior clerks, who, I think it is said there, should have 700*l.* a year. I think there ought to be four places of 700*l.* a year, and they ought to be in particular positions, such as the head of what we call the Central Office, that is the Writ, Appearance, and Judgments Office, the head of the Summons and Order Office, the head of the Crown Office, and the head of the Associates Office. I think they ought to have a salary of 700*l.* a year; they are important posts, and the promotion into those places should not be by seniority, but should be entirely by selection. And may I say this: That I think the promotion into the first class should be much more by selection than by seniority. The Coleridge Committee, if I remember rightly, said that it should be entirely by merit. I think that is right, but I do not think the control masters have that intimate knowledge of the work of the clerks throughout the office, which would enable them to fairly decide who is the best man below them, the consequence being that they give undue weight to promotion by seniority. What I suggest as regards that is, that the control masters should call into their counsel two or three of the senior clerks, leaving the selection to them, who should advise them about the names of men who are before them for promotion to the first class. I am sure that the masters try to do their best, and to act quite free from any favouritism of any sort, but they have not the necessary knowledge of the clerks to enable them to do so.

52,356. (Mr. Coward.) Do they ever see them?—In some departments I might say that they do not know the look of a clerk; but in my particular department I think most of my men are known to the masters, because if any point arises on an order, instead of my taking it myself to the master, I think it is very often much better to send the clerk who is actually drawing the order to see the master; the master then gets acquainted with him, and is able to judge about his merits. But in some of the offices the clerks never go near the masters at all. I have had a man tell me that he did not know them by sight even.

52,357. (Sir John Kempe.) Your answer to a very great extent meets my point, because the argument in the memorial is to the effect that there happen to be no positions open to the first class—no opportunity of promotion open; but what you mean is not that there is no opportunity for promotion, but that there are places existing that ought to be paid a higher salary than other places?—Yes.

52,358. It is not that you think that every office ought to have an office above it to go into?—No.

52,359. You mean that there are certain select places which you think ought to be paid more highly?—Yes.

52,360. Is the work of those particular places as important as it is in other offices where there are principal clerkships?—I should say it is, certainly.

52,361. And which can be separated and made into a class; are there sufficient important duties to justify principal clerkships?—Yes, I think so. I think that those offices which I have mentioned to you are offices of great importance, and the holders of those offices are in continual touch with the masters and the judges.

52,362. I gather from your answer to Mr. Matheson that you are rather in favour of open competition; you would accept open competition. It does not matter to yourself, of course, now?—No.

52,363. You entered by nomination?—Yes, I entered by nomination.

52,364. But, of course, we are glad to have your opinion as to competition. I gather that you think that the work could be picked up by competent men coming in from a public school?—Yes, I think so. I think the important thing is to get a man of character (character is a very important thing in the matter), and who has had a liberal education, has been accustomed to mix with such men as he will find he has to mix with in the office, barristers, solicitors, and people of that sort, and to hold his own, and that he would be recognised by the ordinary solicitor's clerk as being a little bit above him.

52,365. By open competition you would on the whole get a higher class of man for the office than you get now—a more highly-educated class of man?—I do not think we should get a higher class of man than we get now.

52,366. Not on the average? Do you think that your worst man is as good as an open competition man in the second division?—I cannot give any opinion about what our worst man is equal to, because that would be getting rather personal. There must be in every public office a great difference, and I should go so far as to say that there are some men in my office who ought never to have been in the second class at all, and men who have got into the first class who never should have been in the first class. I am not talking of anybody here now, but men I have known in the past. I will give you an instance. I had a man working under me for several years, who received 700*l.* a year as a principal clerk, and he was issuing summonses in the Summons and Order Department, when I, a junior clerk, having under 300*l.* a year, was drawing up orders and doing the work that he could not do. That shows the evil of promotion simply by seniority, and the impossibility of getting rid of a man who is useless.

52,367. (Miss Haldane.) If a young man is coming in practically from a public school, and without necessarily having had experience in a solicitor's office, would he not come in younger than at the present time?—I should hope that he would come in at 17 or 18.

52,368. You spoke of nomination in answer to Mr. Matheson. May I ask you how you obtained a nomination?—I was given a nomination by Sir Frederick Pollock—not the Chief Baron, but his son, and the reason I was given it was that my father was a college friend of his. It was pure patronage, I am quite aware of it. I see nothing to be ashamed of in it.

52,369. Not in the least; I merely wanted to know whether the vacancies were made known, or whether it was by accident that you heard of one?—I will tell you how I got to know. There was a gentleman in the office at the time who was connected with a friend of my father's, and my father asked him to dinner and talked to him after dinner; he heard about the old Court of Exchequer Master's Office, and made inquiries and found that Sir Frederick Pollock had got a nomination, so he wrote to Sir Frederick Pollock, and Sir Frederick Pollock gave him a nomination.

52,370. What I wanted to ask you was, whether you thought it would be better on the whole that there should be some intimation of vacancies?—I do not see much use in that. It is generally known, I think, when there is a vacancy. I assure you people often write to me and say, "How do you get into the Law Courts?" and I write back and say, "Dear sir,—If you happen to know the Lord Chief Justice, or the Master of the Rolls, or the Lord Chancellor or his secretary, you must apply to them."

52,371. (Sir Donald MacAlister.) Or if they know any relative of these persons?—Yes, if they have any influence, in fact.

52,372. I gather from your long experience in the office, looking back to the men you have had under you, and with whom you have worked, that you see no difficulty in its being recruited at the age of leaving a good secondary school?—I would not say that. I do not know whether I am right, but I draw a great distinction between a secondary school and a public school.

52,373. Say a good public school, a school at which a good secondary education has been completed?—Yes. I mean that it is not only education, it is the character that a man gets in being at a public school.

52,374. But I mean the age of leaving a public school, somewhere about 18 or 19?—I think that the time after a man leaves school before he gets into business has been wasted, and I think the effect of having your age of entry from 20 to 30 is that you get a lot of men who have failed in some other position and come in late in life.

52,375. You may not know that we have recommended, as a Commission, that in other parts of the Civil Service it is desirable that the entry to the several grades of the Civil Service should correspond to the time of completing a definite stage of education?—I think that is very desirable.

52,376. So that what you contemplate—what you think is permissible at least—is that the age corresponding to leaving a good public school would be the proper age for recruiting your third class?—Yes, about the age that a man goes to college.

52,377. And that apart from any preferences for nomination that you may have, competition would be as good a way of securing the right men as any other?—I should say so. It did occur to me the other day that instead of these nominations being given alternatively, each of the nominators should nominate one man, and those three might compete together.

52,378. Your point is that no professional education is really required for entering your third class?—I think that is so, but I would not say that a professional examination should not be instituted between the third class and the second. I think it might very usefully be done.

52,379. I was coming to that; I was speaking simply of recruiting for the third class?—No. I do not think you need have anything for that.

52,380. So that, so far as I gather from what you say, you favour a plan similar to that which we have suggested for the whole Civil Service, namely, recruitment at the age of 18 or 19, after a good public school education, and by competition to find out the best of the candidates?—I would even say 17 or 18.

52,381. Whatever is the age at which the education is completed?—Yes, a man of 17 is generally in the top form of his school.

52,382. Then, of course, the important point of promotion comes in too. You would suggest that for promotion from the third class to the second merit should be considered rather than seniority?—For promotion from the third class to the second I would make it necessary to pass an examination in the work of the office; from the second class to the first I would say that merit ought largely to over-weigh seniority.

52,383. Shall we take from the third class to the second? You would have an examination which would have to be passed by all third class clerks who wanted to be promoted into the second class?—Yes.

52,384. A qualifying examination?—Yes.

52,385. Not competitive?—No, qualifying.

52,386. At what sort of age would you propose to hold that examination, supposing that a man entered before he was 20, into the third class?—It would probably take him, in most cases, something like 10 years, or rather more, to get into the second class, and I should think at any time after the first six years he ought to be eligible to go in for the examination if he feels inclined.

52,387. So that you would have an optional examination, to be taken in less than 10 years after entry, in the subject matter which he would require to know if he was going to be a good second class clerk?—He would require to know the ordinary practice of the courts, and for that purpose, of course, he must be moved about from one department to another.

52,388. What sort of examination have you in your mind? It is interesting to the Commission, as we have not had one quite like yours suggested before?—Well, an examination as regards writs and appearances and the general rules as regards judgments, as regards the general nature of an action (when I was young I was given a book to read called "Smith's Action at Law"), and a general view of the steps in an action. I think it should be a very simple examination; I do not mean anything very deep, but just to see that the man had mastered what were the essential things; and he should have a knowledge of what the documents are he has to deal with.

52,389. Would that examination, in your view, be better held inside the office or by the Civil Service Commissioners or by the Law Society, or by some outside body?—I should think by the Civil Service Commissioners.

52,390. A professional qualifying examination for those who have entered without any professional knowledge?—Yes. I think the masters, or some capable body connected with the Law Courts, ought to make a syllabus of the sort of thing which they want to ask questions about, so that a man may know what examination he is going in for.

52,391. And you would practically make it impossible for a third class clerk who had not passed that examination to be promoted into the second class?—I would say that.

52,392. With regard to promotion from the second class to the first, you do not propose any further examination?—No.

52,393. But you do propose that a committee for promotion should be appointed, including those in the office who know most of the individual members of the staff?—I propose that the Committee of Control should call in officially two or three of the senior clerks, or, at any rate, clerks whose opinion they care for, to advise them, entirely privately, of course, as regards what is known in the office of the men down below, of their character and their qualities, and their claims for promotion. Promotion is a most difficult thing.

52,394. Do you know that in some departments of the Civil Service committees of the kind which you propose already exist?—I did not know that.

52,395. It is suggested that they should be rather more generally established. You were not aware of that?—No. Our masters do sometimes consult the senior in a somewhat casual sort of way. I want it to be official.

52,396. You would organise it and make it regular?—Yes.

52,397. Your several grades of clerkships are all pensionable, are they not?—Yes.

52,398. And yet there is no limit of age?—There is no limit of age.

52,399. Can you tell me, for my own information, if a man's pension increases steadily with the length of his service; the longer he stays the larger his pension?—On the contrary; I have just reached the age of 65, and I come under that new Treasury pension scheme. Having had 40 years of service, of course, I cannot get any more as regards pension, but there is a lump sum which is to be handed to me, I believe, when I retire, and that lump sum is decreased. I think it is by one-twentieth for every year I stay on from the present time.

52,400. There is a certain inducement to retire?—There is a great deal larger inducement to stay on. I get 700*l.* a year if I stay on. Mind you, I am not at my maximum yet, so that I should not get my full pension. If I stay on till I get 700*l.* a year I shall be getting my full salary for the next three years, and I should certainly be losing a very small amount—one-fifth of what I should get.

52,401. The inducement to retire is not strong?—No.

52,402. (Mr. Coward.) I should like to know whose duty it is to attend to the work of your office, that is to say, to determine how many men should be employed in it. Is there anybody whose duty it is to make himself master of the office and determine how many men should be employed in it, and so on?—I do not think it is anybody's duty, so far as I am aware. And that rather brings me to what Master Macdonell recommended, namely, that we should have a sort of chief of the staff whose duty it should be to organise the several offices and to see that they do not have too many clerks, or that they have enough clerks, or that the right men are put into the right places, and so forth.

52,403. That is exactly what I was at. There are between 70 and 80 people in your office?—Yes.

52,404. I was only inquiring whether there was anybody who determined the necessity for so many, and there is not, I understand?—I understand your question to be whether there is anybody whose duty it is to superintend the number of clerks?

52,405. Certainly.—There is nobody, so far as I know.

52,406. And to superintend the organisation, generally, of the office?—The control masters would say that they do that, but I think it would be a very good thing to have—I do not know what you would call him—a business manager, or something of that sort, who would see that offices were not over-manned, that men did not waste their time at all, that there was not an excessive time for lunch, or anything of that kind.

52,407. (Lord Mersey.) Will you tell me how he is to do it? Is he to walk into the offices?—He would have to be in the nature of a shopwalker; he would have to be in the nature of somebody who went round and actually saw what was going on in the different offices. It would be his duty to do that.

52,408. (Mr. Coward.) I do not know that there would be any difficulty about it any more than in any commercial or solicitor's office. Somebody of that kind ought to know about the manning?—I fancy that it would be a very disagreeable position; I am afraid so.

52,409. Never mind about that, if it must be done. I gather that you are distinctly in favour of promotion by merit as distinguished from seniority, throughout?—I am. I always have been.

52,410. That, I should suppose, would stop all this objection to inability to get up, because a man who is worth it would get on?—Oh no, it would not; it would not increase the number of places that people have to rise to.

52,411. But it would avert the very thing you were saying just now. You said there were some men ahead of you whose work you were doing?—That was in very old times; that is very ancient history.

52,412. Possibly it would prevail to-day?—I do not think it could prevail to-day, because they would never put a principal clerk to do a junior's work in any department; they would get rid of him.

52,413. It would be very interesting to know what it is that these various classes do in your office, that is to say, in the Central Office. Take a third class clerk: Do you mind telling me what he does, what his duties are?—It entirely depends on what department he is in.

52,414. Take any department you like?—In some departments the head clerk does not make much distinction between what a third class man does and what a second class man does. In my own department I do.

52,415. Yours is the Summons and Order Department?—Yes. I try to keep the third class men on the summonses as being the simplest form of work, and work in which they become familiar with the summonses on which subsequently they will have to draw orders.

52,416. One moment—take that: A solicitor or his clerk will come in with a summons that he wants to issue?—Yes.

52,417. And he would issue it?—Yes.

52,418. He would hand it in, pay the stamp and get it stamped. Is that right?—That is right so far as it goes.

52,419. What else?—The clerk would have to read the summons and see that the summons was in order.

52,420. There is not much to read to see that it is in order?—Not as a rule, but it has to be done.

52,421. Is there anything to see?—He has to see also that an affidavit is necessary.

52,422. I should like to have an answer to my question. Is there anything to see? If I send up a clerk to issue a summons I do not expect to have that summons sent back to me with corrections and alterations on it?—No, and in 99 cases out of 100 you would not.

52,423. I have never seen it in about 50 years service?—Well, perhaps you have been fortunate.

52,424. I do not know about that. I want to know what it is that a third class clerk does. Does he do anything more than a man of ordinary intelligence could learn in a very few hours if he had been in a solicitor's office, say for two years?—Yes, I think he does. My experience is that if I get a man from outside it is generally a month or six weeks before I can let him issue summonses, because a man must be familiar with the documents he is working with. When a man comes into my department from the outside, I put him first of all to index the summonses upon which orders have been drawn up, and I tell him he had better read those summonses. He indexes them and sees the meaning of them, and gets to know what a summons usually is and what a summons under Order XIV is, and then when he has been doing that for about a month and has got to know what a summons is, when a summons is handed to him over the counter he recognises the thing; he knows what it is and what is requisite on it.

52,425. What I want to know is, how does it concern him to know anything about it?—It concerns every man to see the work of his office properly carried out.

52,426. He has to issue a summons?—Yes, he has to issue a summons, but supposing it comes out wrong and he is told he never should have issued a thing like that?

52,427. I cannot follow it?—I do not think probably you have been down to the Law Courts for a good many years.

52,428. I know something about it I am bound to say to you. I should like to know what is it in your office that requires great acumen and great knowledge in doing the work. We were told some time ago that judgments were the most troublesome thing. You have nothing to do with judgments?—I have nothing to do with judgments except that I draw orders on which occasionally judgments are signed, but ours are the simplest ones.

52,429. The orders are drawn in accordance with the summonses as amended by the judge, if amended at all. There is nothing to do about that; there is no trouble about it?—It is all very well to say that there is nothing to do about it, but you have to see that these things are correct.

52,430. I know?—I can tell you that frequently in the courts to-day we have to go, or the men who are drawing orders (I do not draw orders myself) have to go back to the master for information as regards what he means to be carried out in the order; it may be enlarged.

52,431. I do not know whether Mr. Brocklesby understands about judgments?—(Mr. Brocklesby.) Yes, I do. I was in the judgment room for 12 years.

52,432. You do not suggest that there is any difficulty about judgments, do you?—It depends upon the judgment. In some cases there is a certain amount of difficulty; you must know what you are doing.

52,433. Now look here, I do not know whether it is worth while troubling about, but if you take an ordinary judgment—here is a case I hold in my hand that was tried by Mr. Justice Bailhache—it is all printed, and filled up by one of my clerks; it is taken up and sealed and stamped there, and that is all that anybody has to do with it?—It may be against a married woman and there may be no limitation clause.

52,434. Here are a good many; I have a bundle here and they are all the same?—I do think this: that a man signing judgments must know something about what he is doing. It does not mean that a copy is handed to him and he just puts a seal upon it.

52,435. Of course, everybody who has anything to do of a specialised kind must know how to do it, must he not?—Yes.

52,436. But surely you do not suggest to me that there is anything very difficult in the work that has to be done in completing a judgment?—I say that in many cases there is very little.

52,437. Nothing?—There is very little in it. For instance, judgments in default of appearance are a very simple matter; and judgments under Order XIV. or in pursuance of an order; but there are judgments which are somewhat difficult, and you want to go into the matter fully.

52,438. There is not much, I can answer for that?—That is my experience.

52,439. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) (To Mr. Overbury.) You are here in support of a petition which says that the scale of salaries which you suggest for the third class would more nearly correspond to the salaries paid for analogous duties in other departments of State than the present scale of salaries?—Yes.

52,440. You were asked to give an instance, and you gave an instance drawn from the Transport Department of the Admiralty in which you did temporary work?—That is so.

52,441. Will you repeat what you then said?—I said that in the Transport Department of the Admiralty we did work which was not more difficult than the work of our own department.

52,442. But you said what the scale of salary was?—I said that the scale of salary was, I think, 350*l.* to 500*l.*

52,443. What do you mean by saying that the scale of salary in the Transport Department is 350*l.* to 500*l.*?—I mean the scale of salary of the clerks whose work we were doing, or helping to do.

52,444. I have here the printed facts before me. Would you agree that that scale of salary is only paid to a staff clerk?—I think assistant transport officer is his description.

52,445. A staff clerk is a gentleman in charge of a considerable department of work?—That may be so; I do not know.

52,446. Do you know at what scale of salary a staff clerk enters?—I am afraid not.

52,447. You do not know that he enters as a second division clerk at 70*l.* a year?—I do not know that.

52,448. What age were these gentlemen who were in receipt of that salary?—Very little over 30, I suppose—they may have been 33 or 34. I really do not know.

52,449. Taking it that the second division clerks, from whom the staff clerks are appointed, enter at 70*l.* a year, you propose, in order to be analogous with that, that your third division clerks should enter at 120*l.* a year?—May I say that although I signed this petition I had no hand in drawing it nor in preparing these figures in support, and, to my mind, our chief grievance is really the slowness of promotion that will happen.

52,450. (To Mr. Townsend.) We have a statement of salaries here. Are there any cases here in which payments are made for work done during official time in addition to the scale of salaries, and in addition to the special and personal salaries of 800*l.* a year paid to Mr. Short and Mr. Stringer. Do you know if there are any other payments made in the office for work done in the office time in addition to salaries?—No, I am not aware of any.

Mr. ROBERT STANLEY OLIVER MAIS (District Registrar and District Probate Registrar, Manchester), called and examined.

52,460. (Chairman.) You are the District Probate Registrar at Manchester?—Yes.

52,461. You are also district registrar of the High Court there?—I am joint district registrar with Mr. Crosse.

52,462. How long have you held those offices?—I was appointed on the 25th June 1905, nearly 10 years ago.

52,463. You were appointed simultaneously to both offices?—Yes, I was appointed district probate registrar by Lord Gorell (Sir Gorell Barnes as he was then) and, after being so appointed, by Order in Council I became joint registrar of the High Court.

52,464. What had been your experience before your appointment there?—I had been 17 years in the Principal Probate Registry, 10 years of which were spent as clerk to the registrars, and the last year I had been senior clerk to the senior registrar.

52,465. In which class were you at the time you were appointed to these posts?—In the second class.

52,466. Had you any experience of the legal profession outside before you went into the probate registry?—None whatever.

52,467. At what age did you enter the probate registry?—23.

52,468. You wish to call the attention of the Commission to the staff of the probate registry and of the district registry?—Yes.

52,469. We will deal with the staff of the probate registry first. Of how many clerks does that consist?—The probate registry has seven clerks (six clerks and a chief clerk) and two copyists.

52,451. For instance, are there any payments made with regard to letters of request to foreign countries? Have you any experience of that?—I believe there is some extra pay given by the Treasury to those two clerks who are connected with that work. 15*l.* each a year I think they get.

52,452. Who are those two clerks?—Mr. F. Stringer and Mr. Willson.

52,454. Do you remember who is the head of the Writ Office?—His father, Mr. Stringer.

52,455. (Mr. Boutwood.) On the first page of the Representation of the Third Class Clerks, in paragraph No. 2, it says: "Third class clerks in the Central Office have to take their share in the general work of the office," and then it enumerates certain things—among them, "attending the King's Bench Courts and Court of Appeal in the capacity of registrar or associate." Does that mean instead of the registrar or associate?—Yes.

52,456. The third class clerks?—I know that the third class clerks do sit in court to take the position of associates, but I am not sufficiently acquainted with the matter to say whether they sit in the Court of Appeal or whether they sit in the Divisional Court.

52,457. That is as associate. What about the capacity of registrar? Does a third class clerk sit in that capacity?—They do the same work as a Chancery registrar would do; they take a note of the findings and the verdict, and so forth, and they draw the orders on them.

52,458. Then you go on to say that it is "a duty which, in times of pressure, when the number of courts sitting exceeds the number of clerks, is provided for by the engagement of barristers at a fee of 2*l.* 2*s.* per diem"?—That is so. I believe there are a certain number of barristers who are called upon (when there are more courts sitting than there are clerks to sit in them) to sit, and I suppose that is their fee. I have no knowledge of it beyond that.

52,459. And they do no more nor less than a third class clerk does if there happens to be a third class clerk available. They are really in place of a third class clerk?—Yes.

52,470. Those clerks are appointed by yourself with the approval of the President of the Probate Division?—Yes.

52,471. Have many of the existing staff been appointed by you personally?—The last two, Mr. Duckworth and Mr. Hart.

52,472. And they are not pensionable?—As far as I am told none of them are pensionable.

52,473. What is the representation which you wish to make to the Commission on their behalf?—All these clerks are employed in Government work, and do nothing else. The salaries that they are paid are not sufficient to enable them to make provision for their old age, and the consequence is they remain on there practically until they die without being able to retire, owing to their not having sufficient money to retire upon. That does not apply to the chief clerk. I think any man getting 500*l.* a year (as Mr. Wright has got it for many years, having been appointed chief clerk 11 years ago) possibly has sufficient money.

52,474. He would be able to make some provision for retirement?—I think he would. In his particular case I know he has private means, but that is neither here nor there. The other clerks would not be able to provide for retirement. The second clerk, Mr. Lawson, is a man of 71, and he certainly has never had a large salary; he was appointed second clerk in January 1907, at a salary of 230*l.*, and that is the highest salary he has had.

52,475. You propose that they should be made pensionable. Do you also propose that a fixed age should be laid down for retirement?—I think it would be better for the clerks that a fixed age should be laid down for retirement, in order to give them chances of promotion.

Mr. ROBERT STANLEY OLIVER MAIS.

52,476. What age do you consider would be suitable to lay down?—65 as a limit.

52,477. The ordinary Civil Service rule is that a man may retire at 60 and must retire at 65?—Quite so. The same rule would apply equally in the district registries with advantage.

52,478. Do you consider that the present system of appointment of the clerks is satisfactory?—No, I do not think it is, because it seems to me we do not know where we are quite. Assuming for a moment that the President declined to sanction our appointment of a clerk, I do not know where we should be; we might refuse to appoint, and then there would be nobody there.

52,479. Has any practical difficulty arisen in your experience?—None whatever, because the President invariably sanctions the appointment. District registrars, of course, make enquiries and report to the President what enquiries they have made prior to appointment.

52,480. What do you think would be the best system of appointment?—I should think public examination.

52,481. Open competition?—Yes, open competition—something similar to the Customs and Excise or the Second Class Civil Service Examination.

52,482. You see no objection to that?—None whatever.

52,483. Could a man coming from outside by open competition without having necessarily had any previous legal experience, learn the work of the office easily?—As a junior clerk he could learn it, because they all learn as juniors now.

52,484. Had any of the clerks in your office served in a solicitor's office before entering?—All of them, I think, had served in a solicitor's office. Mr. Duckworth was an articled clerk in a solicitor's office when he was appointed, and had to give up his articles because his father died. Mr. Hart was a junior clerk in the High Court registry when I appointed him. Mr. Openshaw and Mr. Calrow had both had some experience in the Manchester High Court Registry before they came to the Manchester Probate Registry. I cannot tell you the experience of the other one.

52,485. You do not consider such experience necessary?—No. At the present time they do come from solicitors' offices, and nearly all the applications I have had have been from solicitors' clerks.

52,486. Do you consider that the present salaries are adequate and are arranged on a satisfactory system?—I think they are adequate, except that the system of payment would be more satisfactory if increments were given instead of fixed salaries. The junior clerk, I think, might start as low as 65*l.* if he is as young as he generally is—somewhere about 18.

52,487. You think a system of scales of increment would be preferable to the present system of fixed salaries, even if the total expenditure was not increased?—I do.

52,488. Given that the total expenditure was to be a certain amount, you would prefer to have it applied in scales with increments rather than fixed salaries?—Yes, I find it much more satisfactory, and from my experience in the High Court they like these small increments every year in preference to a fixed salary. There is another advantage in regard to this class of man, that if you raise his salary suddenly by promoting him to a large salary, he is rather apt to consider himself better off than he is. I have had experience of that. One man was raised suddenly by about 40*l.* a year, and he thought himself much better off and got into bad ways pretty soon.

52,489. (Lord Mersey.) Did he buy a motor car?—I do not think he went as far as that, but he went to equally expensive habits in other ways.

52,490. (Chairman.) Turning now to the district registry of the High Court, of how many clerks does your staff there consist?—Six altogether.

52,491. The Manchester registry is the largest in the kingdom?—Yes, it is the largest High Court registry in the kingdom.

52,492. How are the salaries of the clerks in the district High Court registries fixed?—They are fixed by the registrar himself, and they are submitted to the Lord Chancellor and the Treasury, but they never interfere with them, and we either raise them or lower them as we feel disposed.

52,493. Is there a fixed lump sum out of which they have to be paid?—Yes, of 1,170*l.*

52,494. How is that sum fixed?—It is fixed by request of the registrar. I cannot tell you on what basis, because I do not know. That is a sum allowed to cover clerical assistance, petty cash, copying, and all the expenses of the registry for letters, cabs, or delivery of goods, or anything else—whatever small expenses there are.

52,495. How are those clerks appointed?—By the senior registrar personally. There is no written appointment at all. The clerks are interviewed by myself, at present the senior registrar. After an advertisement has been put in the paper I see all the candidates and select them and see them again, and then appoint the particular man I have chosen.

52,496. In this case also they are not pensionable?—That is so.

52,497. Can they be dismissed by the registrar?—As far as I know they can be dismissed on a month's notice, because we pay them once a month.

52,498. But in practice are they permanent?—In practice they are permanent. I have known no case of dismissal since I have been in the High Court registry.

52,499. Do the observations you have made with regard to pensions for the clerks in the Probate registry apply equally to the clerks in the High Court registry?—Yes, identically.

52,500. These clerks are all whole-timers?—Yes.

52,501. They devote their whole time to the work of the office?—Yes, entirely. They do nothing else.

52,502. If they were given the status of Civil servants and made pensionable, would you suggest an alteration in the method of appointment similar to that which you have suggested in the case of the Probate registry?—Yes, I should say the same examination would cover both High Court and Probate registries.

52,503. In this case also you do not attach importance to previous legal experience?—Here we prefer having a man who has been an office boy, or something of that sort, in a solicitor's office. You cannot say he has had experience there of any sort; he cannot learn from the work he does in a solicitor's office the work he does in our registry.

52,504. What has he acquired as an office boy in a solicitor's office which would be of value in your office?—I cannot tell you, but I am told by the chief clerk that he finds that an office boy who has been a good office boy in a solicitor's office makes the best junior clerk. What particular qualifications he has acquired I cannot tell you.

52,505. Have any men been appointed who have not had that previous qualification?—I think not. I think they have all had it. The ones appointed during my time, the last two, Mr. Holloway and Mr. Webster, both have been solicitor's clerks. Mr. Holloway was a clerk and Mr. Webster was an office boy. Mr. Holloway was appointed because we wanted a man with some experience at that time as we had two vacancies and had to get a man a little older and with more experience.

52,506. It would seem then that the chief clerk's opinion was not based on the experience of both methods?—Apparently not.

52,507. It has been suggested by one witness that, if the clerks in district offices of this kind were not appointed by the registrar and could not be dismissed by him, it would interfere with the registrar's complete control over the clerks and the discipline of his office. Do you attach any importance to that argument?—I think very little. I have heard that stated before. I have known no difficulty myself. I have experience of both sides there, one where there was a fixed allowance and one where the salaries were fixed and the appointment made by somebody else, and I have never found any difficulty on either side.

52,508. It has also been suggested that the result of having local staffs of this kind with a Civil Service status would be to encourage appeals to a central authority on questions of discipline, and, in fact, would tend to centralise control instead of leaving it, as at present, localised. Do you attach any importance to that?—None whatever.

Mr. ROBERT STANLEY OLIVER MAIS.

52,509. If your staff had the status of Civilservants do you expect that it would encourage them to appeal to some central authority against your decisions in matters of discipline?—I do not think it would at all.

52,510. You do not anticipate any difficulty?—I do not think there would be any difficulty whatever.

52,511. Are you yourself pensionable?—Yes.

52,512. In both capacities?—Yes; and my co-registrar is also pensionable.

52,513. To how many registrars does that apply?—As far as I am aware, only to two at Liverpool and two at Manchester, as regards the High Court. I do not know anything about the Probate Court registrars now.

52,514. When you suggest that your staff should be made pensionable, how far does that suggestion apply? Does it apply to the staff of all the Probate registries, and all the High Court registries?—Only to the High Court registries in Manchester and Liverpool; not to the smaller High Court registries.

52,515. What is the line that you would draw?—I cannot draw a line except this: that the smaller registrars are not occupied the whole time on Government work; they are not whole-timers in any degree.

52,516. You would make whole-timers pensionable and the others not?—I think that should be so.

52,517. In the case of the clerks in the District Probate registries, are they in all cases whole-timers?—I should say not. I do not see how they can be. In registries passing 200, or even 300 grants a year, I cannot conceive how you can say that three men can be occupied the whole day in passing 300 grants in a year. I think it is impossible.

52,518. Would it be the case that in some registries some of the staff would be whole-timers and some part-timers?—That I could not say. At the larger registries they are all whole-timers; at the smaller registries I should say that none were whole-timers.

52,519. It suggests itself to me that there may be some difficulty in drawing a clear line?—I think there would be a difficulty.

52,520. But in principle you would apply your suggestion to whole-timers and not to part-timers?—Yes; but if you had only big district Probate registries it would apply to everybody.

52,521. Your point is that these men are whole-timers employed on Government work, and difficulty is caused at present by the fact that without a pension system it is impossible or impracticable to retire men when they are getting past their work?—That is so.

52,522. And for that reason you suggest they should be made pensionable?—Yes.

52,523. Are there any other considerations which you wish to mention as bearing on that point?—I do not know of any at all. These men complain to me: "It seems to them hard lines that, say, Jones, who is working next door to us, in the Customs and Excise Department, who does not work any longer than we do, and is doing no better work than we are, should get a pension and we do not get a pension. We are working in the same building doing Government work, employed for equally lengthy hours, and we do not get that privilege."

52,524. On the other hand, Robinson, a solicitor's clerk, employed in the same building, works longer hours still and does not get a pension?—He does not work in the same building quite. He has a chance of moving on to something better if he wishes it; whereas a man in a Government office would not be able to move on, because he would not be fitted. A solicitor's clerk might move on to a bigger office, and might get a better salary.

52,525. You were mentioning that in some of the smaller registries the amount of work is very small?—Yes.

52,526. Do you consider that any change would be desirable in the way of abolishing small registries or amalgamating small registries to make larger ones?—From the point of view of the public, do you mean, or from the point of view of the registries themselves?

52,527. From the point of view of the public first?—From the point of view of the public I cannot see that any harm would be done to anybody by the abolition of all small district probate registries. My reason for saying that is that poor people, that is to say, people with small estates under 500*l.* gross, have the privilege, at the present time, of proving their wills or taking out letters of administration through the local Customs and Excise offices, and people with estates of more than 500*l.* can afford to go a little way off to a district probate registry, or they can send their wills to London or employ a solicitor.

52,528. At the present time the situation of the smaller probate registries does not in any way correspond to the centres of population?—No, not in the slightest degree.

52,529. It is a survival, in fact, from the old ecclesiastical conditions, which no longer govern the convenience of the public?—Entirely so. In most cases they are the old registries in the various dioceses throughout England. Those people who were diocesan registrars were generally appointed probate registrars when the court was first constituted, and the registries were in the place where the wills were at that time.

52,530. Are you acquainted with the report of the Legal Departments Commission of 1874?—I cannot say I have never read it, because I probably have, but I cannot identify it at the moment.

52,531. Do you remember that that Commission recommended that something should be done in the way of concentration of smaller registries?—I believe so, but I am not quite sure if I have read that particular report or not. I think I have.

52,532. Can you say what has prevented that recommendation from being carried out?—I think local sentiment. I was on a Commission with a gentleman from the Treasury, Mr. Causton, inquiring into the work of the district probate registries some three or four years ago, and, as far as we could gather, in the case of the small registries the view was purely sentimental, that the local people would not like their wills proved anywhere but in the locality. I do not think there is much in that myself.

52,533. Was that a sentiment on the part of the public generally or on the part of the registrar?—That sentiment was given me by the registrar.

52,534. He might, perhaps, have some prejudice in the matter?—Possibly.

52,535. Had you any indication of a sentiment of that kind on the part of the legal profession?—I did not interview any of the legal profession on that Commission. It was confined entirely to the registrars and their clerks.

52,536. You had no indication of what the views of the legal profession would be?—I cannot tell you at all. The only indication I have had recently is this: I did ask the Secretary of the Manchester Law Society, the day before yesterday, whether he thought the abolition of a fixed place of abode of the deceased and giving each district registry unlimited jurisdiction would be for the advantage of the solicitors and the public, and he said he thought it would be. I recollect he said that in Manchester the larger number of the wealthy residents live in Cheshire, and they would like their wills proved in Manchester; but that may be a mere local opinion—I do not know.

52,537. Under the present system where have they to be proved?—In Chester. At the present time it is a great hardship really on the personal applicants, because in the case of Stockport only, which contains 110,000, all those people who want to prove their wills in person have to go to Chester, which takes four hours, whereas they could go to Manchester in 10 minutes by train. There are numerous other populous districts round there. The same thing applies to Birkenhead and other places.

52,538. Has a Manchester solicitor dealing with a will of a Manchester merchant who lives in Cheshire to prove it in Chester?—Either in Chester or in London. I have a resolution of the Manchester Law Society here, if you like to have it, saying that they think it would be advantageous to extend the jurisdiction.

MR. ROBERT STANLEY OLIVER MAIS.

52,539. (Mr. Coward.) Extend the jurisdiction in what way?—In probate matters.

52,540. (Chairman.) To abolish the obligation to prove the will at the registry in the district which contained the deceased's place of residence?—Where the deceased had a fixed place of abode. Here is the resolution (handing in the same). It was passed by the Committee of the Manchester Law Society on Tuesday last.

52,541. To what sort of number do you think the registries could be reduced?—I have not really gone into that question at all, but it seems to me that you would have to make a special inquiry into it, because you would have to fix upon centres where the population is big in the first case, or else centres where railway or other facilities for arriving at them were good. Bristol, which is a junction, might satisfy Taunton, Gloucester, and Wells districts; Exeter might satisfy Salisbury and the West of England. So it would not be quite right to say that you would only want the centres of population, because those places are not big centres of population.

52,542. Probably your suggestion would contemplate a considerable reduction in the number of registries?—I should think at least half.

52,543. Would such a reduction facilitate the question of staff?—I think it would facilitate the question of staff if they were going to make these clerks permanent Civil servants, because you would have to have a large access of staff in the bigger centres, and you might give some of those men in the smaller registries sufficiently large clerkships in the bigger ones to satisfy them.

52,544. The question would arise in that case as to the custody of the wills, which are at the present time kept by the smaller registries?—The custody of the old wills, yes.

52,545. What would be the proper solution of that?—I think those might be transferred to London, with great advantage to everybody. I am told that the literary searchers and pedigree hunters, as a rule, congregate in London, and they would find it much easier to search in one place than have to go to numerous places to find out where a particular deceased's will was proved. They are very much mixed up now. For instance, some of the Lancashire wills are at Chester, some at Lichfield, and some of them at Lancaster. All Manchester men's wills are either at Lancaster or Chester, and none are in Manchester at all. I am speaking now of wills before 1857. Some of them, I believe, are even in Yorkshire.

52,546. (Mr. Coward.) Or in London?—Yes, part in London, part of the archdeaconry of Richmond wills are in London, and part in Lancaster—part of the records and documents.

52,547. (Chairman.) That must make a considerable difficulty in searching?—Considerable difficulty, because you have to search in several places.

52,548. In case a man had several places of residence, it would be necessary to search in several places?—Yes; and at a large number of district registries, where there are ancient documents, they are not properly taken care of, have not been indexed, and are practically useless in their present condition. I know that is so in one or two registries; nobody knows what documents are there.

52,549. A suggestion has also been made that another kind of amalgamation might take place—that in a larger number of instances than at present, the district probate registry might be combined with the High Court registry or the County Court registry, or both. What is your opinion as to that suggestion?—As a rule, I think the High Court registrars and the County Court registrars are always solicitors, and they are the only people qualified for the position. I think if you amalgamate the probate registries with those offices, you would not get sufficient attention paid to probate work. Besides, these men do not know the probate work in the slightest degree. The ordinary solicitor does, perhaps, about 20 cases in a year, and he does not know the probate work. There is not one solicitor in a hundred who knows the probate practice.

That being so, the work really devolves on the chief clerk, and the registrar is in the hands of the chief clerk entirely for his practice. I think that is very bad for the registry.

52,550. You suggest that a man who has had experience in the Central Probate Registry is more suitable for appointment as district probate registrar than a local solicitor?—I think he is more suitable, and I think, as a rule, gives greater satisfaction to the profession in the country. The Secretary of the Manchester Law Society tells me exactly the same thing. As regards that, I asked him yesterday, and he agreed with me that the average solicitor does not, and cannot, know the probate practice. That being so, you want as registrar somebody who does know the practice, and the only men I know of who know the practice are those men who have had experience in the Principal Probate Registry, and they can help the local solicitors very considerably. For instance, take the questions on the Finance Acts: a solicitor will not know anything about those, as a rule, and he can get great assistance from the local probate registry on that point.

52,551. (Mr. Coward.) Solicitors have to know a great deal about the Finance Acts?—They ought to know, but they do not know, as a matter of fact. You would be surprised to know the number of gentlemen who ask me questions on the Finance Acts every week. You must remember that there is nobody in country places who knows anything about the Finance Acts, because the Customs and Excise officers in the country know nothing about estate duty at all, and so they have to rely entirely upon the probate registrar for guidance on the Acts as regards probate and estate duties.

52,552. (Chairman.) You were appointed simultaneously to the registrarship of the High Court and the district probate registrarship?—The Probate registrar becomes automatically the High Court registrar in Manchester under the Act of Parliament. It says: "The district registrar of the Probate Court is hereby appointed to be joint registrar of the High Court." It is a kind of automatic appointment.

52,553. Your previous experience had been entirely in the Principal Probate Registry?—Yes, in the Probate and Divorce registries.

52,554. How did you deal with the work of the High Court registry? Did you find any difficulty without previous experience of the matters concerned?—I had experience in so far as a clerk who is working with the registrar has. I had been for 10 or 12 years assisting the registrar, both in chambers at the principal registry and also in judges' chambers where summonses are heard, and in court, so I had all the experience of the general run of actions. Therefore I knew practically what all the chamber work was in the King's Bench, and I knew about taxation.

52,555. Did that experience give you knowledge of Chancery practice?—No, it did not; and as a matter of fact for the first 8½ years that I was in Manchester I did only King's Bench work. The senior registrar at that time, Mr. Watts, was doing Chancery work when I went there, and continued to do it after my appointment, and I did the whole of the King's Bench work.

52,556. (Mr. Coward.) Without difficulty?—Well, I cannot say without difficulty, because it entailed a certain amount of reading as well; but the practice I had had and the experience I had had with the registrars in London facilitated matters considerably, because I knew, for instance, what was a summons for particulars, and what taxation meant, and so on. I knew the principles and I had only to apply them.

52,557. (Chairman.) You had at once then to do the work that a master does in London?—That is so.

52,558. We have been told that long experience at the Bar is essential for the due performance of a master's work?—Not at the Bar, surely? Do you mean the masters in London?

52,559. The masters of the King's Bench in London?—Of course I cannot speak of the work of the masters in London, because I have not done it.

15 April 1915.]

Mr. ROBERT STANLEY OLIVER MAIS.

52,560. (Mr. Coward.) You have exactly the same work to do at the Manchester High Court registry?—I think I have. I have come to that conclusion.

52,561. I do not see what difference there is?—Perhaps you have more experience of the master's work in London than I have. I do not know, because I have not been in chambers there.

52,562. The work goes on in the district registry precisely as it does in London in the cases that are commenced locally?—I am told it is identical.

52,563. (Chairman.) And you found that you could deal with that work?—I have dealt with it; and, so far as I know, no complaints have been made. There were grave complaints made when I was first appointed, but I have heard of none since then. I have here a statement of the statistics showing what the work in Manchester is, if you would like to see it. (Handing same to Mr. Coward.) It is a yearly return.

52,564. (Mr. Boutwood.) Mr. Goodier is one of the clerks in the Manchester district registry of the High Court?—Yes.

52,565. Does his position in respect of pension differ from that of his colleagues in any way?—It is identical. They are none of them entitled to pensions.

52,566. There is nothing peculiar in Mr. Goodier's position?—Nothing peculiar. He is the third clerk.

52,567. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) Do you think that where a provincial registry of any kind is fully occupied, the clerks and officials there being fully occupied with professional work, it would be desirable that they should become Civil servants?—Always. I think they ought to be.

52,568. You think the office ought to be staffed from top to bottom by Civil servants?—Yes.

52,569. The main difficulty in the way of that is that there are a certain number of registries where the work takes only part of the time of the registrar and his clerks?—Yes.

52,570. You suggest that that difficulty might be got over, as I understand, by diminishing the number of such registries, and increasing their area and their work?—That is as regards the Probate registries. I have not referred in that to the High Court registries at all.

52,571. You secure a greater amount of work, and therefore there is greater steadiness in the work if you can combine in one office several different kinds of work?—You do not get the same efficiency in the Probate Department, which is important to some extent, if you combine the three offices, as you do if you keep one man doing one job properly.

52,572. But in your case you are doing both Probate work and High Court work?—I am.

52,573. Is it not conceivable that we might with care find other people who, with proper practice, might be able to combine the work as you have combined it?—Yes, it is quite possible.

52,574. If that difficulty could be got over, you would see certain advantages?—Clearly.

52,575. If the country were so divided that there could be a single provincial administrative legal office, in which the work of the Probate registry, the County Court registry, and the High Court registry could be concentrated?—I do not think you could find anybody in a big centre who could possibly combine those three offices together properly.

52,576. But in a department in a legal office they could be combined?—In a small one it is possible they could be combined, but not in a big one. It would be impossible at Manchester to have a Probate Court, High Court, and County Court man to do one job—absolutely impossible.

52,577. In the Board of Trade, for instance, it is quite impossible to get somebody to do both the shipping work and the census of production work, or various other kinds of work, but it is possible to organise an office so that all these things could be done in one place and under one general system?—No, I think the work which has to be done by a registrar, to be done properly in either the High Court, County Court, or Probate Court, must be done by the registrar in person—the greater part of it.

52,578. And you do not think it possible to have one area served by the different kinds of registrars and perhaps one office in which they should sit, as they do in London?—The County Court is not the same in London.

52,579. But there might be one registrar for several different County Courts?—That is the same class of work, and it would be only the question of the quantity of work. That is all right; but if you get a large registry combining the High Court, County Court, and Probate Court work, it is impossible to get all the work done efficiently. You must sacrifice either the Probate Court part, the High Court part, or the County Court part, in order to get it efficiently done by one man.

52,580. But would it not be possible to have three men there, as you have in the Law Courts in London, or two men sitting in one place and using the same clerks, messengers, and so on?—That may be more possible, but at the same time it is difficult also. Take the Chancery work, the whole of the Chancery work must be done by one man either in the country or in London. He must follow it out from the beginning to the end, and have cognisance of it all the way through. As regards the High Court work it is better—I will not say it is necessary there—to have the same man, because frequently one finds that a certain matter is adjourned, and perhaps the other registrar is engaged at the time it is adjourned to, and his colleague could not deal with it.

52,581. But there is no objection to their sitting in different rooms off the same passage?—As long as their work is defined; but then you come back to exactly the same position as now, if you are going to keep them as separate courts all in one office, except, possibly, as regards the staff. The staff, to my mind, could not possibly work with one another. The Probate staff could not work with the High Court staff. I do not know anything about the County Court, but I should imagine that it would be impossible for the High Court to work with the County Court; they are diverse.

52,582. In spite of the fact that it has been so successful in Manchester?—We have separate staffs entirely; the staffs have nothing to do with one another.

52,583. But you are Probate registrar and also registrar of the High Court?—Yes.

52,584. Does not that involve in your case an amalgamation of the two?—It does involve an amalgamation of the two, and I think it works in our particular case because the two registrars get on very well together; but if they did not get on very well together it would not work, and it has not worked in the past owing to disagreements. I think in our case it is extremely hard. Here am I appointed joint registrar of the High Court Registry and I am district Probate registrar. We cannot divide the work evenly. If I take my half share of the High Court work I am doing more than I am paid to do. As a matter of fact, I do more than half, because I do the whole of the Chancery work and very often assist in the King's Bench; but, if one looks at the salary and the way in which the Treasury have allocated it, they give me 800*l.* for the Probate Court work and 200*l.* for the High Court work. I am paid 200*l.* a year for doing what my colleague is paid 1,000*l.* a year for. Either one or the other is wrong.

52,585. Putting aside the question of the combination of personnel, you might have the same areas for the High Court work and for the Probate work?—Subject to what I said before, that the High Court registrar, as a rule, is not a man who can deal with Probate work efficiently.

52,586. A combination of areas, but not the same personnel?—There would be a larger number of High Court registries in England than there would be Probate registries under my scheme. I suggest that there should be only, perhaps, 15 or 20 Probate registries pure and simple, staffed and used only for Probate work.

52,587. Would you have three areas or two; a larger area for the Probate registry and a smaller area for the High Court registry? Would that smaller area correspond to the County Court registry?—There is no limit of jurisdiction in the High Court registries at all. You can come to my registry and issue a writ for any part of the country you like; it makes no difference. The only difference arises when you come to enter the appearance afterwards. You can use any High Court registry at the present time. My suggestion is that you should be able to use any Probate registry.

Mr. ROBERT STANLEY OLIVER MAIS.

52,588. (Chairman.) How many district registries of the High Court are there?—I cannot speak right offhand, but I should say 60, 70, or 80. Nearly every small town has a High Court registry. They do not do very much work, but they can issue writs, and after that the matter can be transferred to London or somewhere else. They have that advantage.

52,589. (Mr. Coward.) It may or may not be transferred?—Quite so.

52,590. If the solicitor for the defendant enters an appearance in London then it is transferred, otherwise it would continue in the district registry?—Yes, otherwise it would continue in the country. The majority of the High Court registries do not have very much jurisdiction. Liverpool and Manchester have full jurisdiction, the same as London; they can issue originating summonses, do all the taxation, and everything else. The other High Court registries are practically limited to the issue of writs, the hearing of summonses under Order 14, and a few interlocutory summonses, but very few, and taxation is practically nil.

52,591. You do not think any diminution or alteration in the number of registries or of the places is desirable except in the case of Probate registries, which you want to be reduced in number and put in convenient centres of population?—There is no reason for reducing the number of High Court registries. I am told they do not cost the country anything, because the registrars are paid by fees in the smaller registries, and if they do not get the fees they do not get their salaries. As regards Probate registries the country is put to expense, and I think it would be saved expense by the reorganisation of all of them.

52,592. (Sir Donald MacAlister.) You recognise that if your whole-time staff were made pensionable and put on the establishment, the present system of appointment and recruitment of the staff could hardly remain?—No; my suggestion is that there should be entrance by open competition.

52,593. What age of entry have you in mind when you suggest open competition?—Not younger than 18 and not older than 24. I should think that would be a very fair age—the younger the better.

52,594. So that the open competition might be in subjects of general education, pure and simple?—Yes, about the same standard as you get in the second division of the Civil Service. The clerks are generally about the status of a solicitor's clerk in the country—a very good sort of man. Otherwise you might make it a branch of the principal registry and appoint them under the same system as they do now, or the same as the Bank of England do in their branches.

52,595. (Sir John Kempe.) If you had open competition do you think you could introduce the system they have in the Post Office? I understand that in these registries a great number are not fully occupied with Government work?—In the small district probate registries.

52,596. In a country post office a local tradesman is made postmaster, and when his work gets heavier he gets supplied with a trained clerk from the head office?—Yes.

52,597. Would there be any objection to that system?—At present, I think, they have more staff than they need in the small registries. You must have two men there—a chief clerk and one other clerk—and that is the minimum number in the small registries.

52,598. Those two men would be occupied partly in solicitors' work?—They ought not to be, but they are, I believe. They are not supposed to be utilised by the solicitor for his work at all.

52,599. I thought the registrar employed his own clerks for the work of the registry?—As a matter of fact they do, out of hours, get other work from solicitors or somebody else.

52,600. Is there no case where a registrar who is a solicitor employs his own clerk now and then to do the Government work?—The Probate registry clerks are there at present when the local solicitor is appointed registrar, and he cannot very well dismiss them. They are probate clerks, and possibly, if there was a vacancy, he would put one of his own clerks in. When he is appointed he takes on the old clerks.

52,601. I did not understand that?—In some cases, I do not know whether it is so now, the registries were in the office of the solicitor who was registrar and owned by the late registrar, and of course that necessitated the new registrar being practically the successor in the office of the old one.

52,602. Does the Government lump sum provide buildings, offices, coals, lighting and so on?—Yes, it provides everything.

52,603. Besides the clerks it provides all the stationery?—It provides coal, stationery, and so on, and in fact in the Probate registries there is no petty cash of any sort. We are not allowed anything for letters. If I write a letter to anybody I have to pay for it myself.

52,604. (Mr. Matheson.) Do not you think that 18 to 24 is rather too wide a range of years for an examination of that kind. Would not 18 to 20 be better?—Yes; as a matter of personal opinion I put 24 as the limit.

52,605. You would not object to making it 18 to 20?—I would have no objection whatever; I think the younger the better.

52,605A. (Mr. Coward.) The business done in your registry is very extensive?—Yes, very extensive.

52,606. I see the total number of summonses issued in one year on the King's Bench side was 3,748, and the amounts recovered by judgments came to 128,619l.?—Yes.

52,607. That shows that there is a great deal of work?—It is a very big registry. There is no doubt whatever about that.

52,608. (Chairman.) I see that the salaries of the district probate registrars appear not to correspond at all to the amount of work?—That is so.

52,609. There are very large inequalities?—Yes.

52,610. Taking an instance and comparing Exeter with Durham, the salary at Exeter is 1,000l., and the number of grants is between 1,100 and 1,200; whereas the salary at Durham is 500l., and the number of grants is over 1,700?—Yes.

52,611. That is to say, there are half as many more grants at Durham, but the salary at Durham is only half the salary at Exeter?—Yes.

52,612. What is the explanation of those inequalities?—I really could not tell you. These salaries were fixed about 1865 or 1867, and have never been altered since, except so far as they have been reduced in one or two cases. They have never been increased. In spite of the fact that some of the larger registries, of course, were only just in their youth then, the salary was fixed at that time and has never been altered. The districts in various industrial parts have increased, and that is why the registries at Durham and Manchester, I should think, and possibly Birmingham, have increased so much.

52,613. It would seem that some readjustment is required?—Clearly. Llandaff is, I think, a case in point, where the salary is only 350l.

52,614. And where the number of grants is greater than that at Exeter?—Much greater. Exeter has stood still; it passes the same number of grants now as it did 40 years ago. One finds that in all districts where they are not industrial the number of grants is absolutely stationary.

52,615. (Sir John Kempe.) The sum allowed for clerks in Durham is much larger than that allowed in Exeter because the work is greater?—The Treasury allow an increased clerical staff, but do not increase the salary of the registrar.

52,616. (Chairman.) Do the registrars derive any income from what is called "agency business"?—Yes, in some cases.

15 April 1915.]

MR. ROBERT STANLEY OLIVER MAIS.

52,617. What is the nature of that business?—That is a survival of the old practice which was in vogue before the Probate Act of 1857 came into force, where local proctors were allowed to settle, and always did settle, all the papers to lead to grants of probate. Then they also received by post papers from the solicitors living outside the town, and received papers locally sometimes from the solicitors who did not know how to draw them and wanted them drawn up by somebody who did know, thereby saving the clients the trouble of attending the solicitors on two or three occasions to have the papers corrected after they had been sworn. That practice has survived, and the Probate Registrars have always been allowed to receive, in respect of papers which they receive by post, or which are lodged locally, fees for settling the papers, and for sending them back by post after paying the duty in London, and so on, and also for correspondence of any sort that they have to conduct, partly on the ground that the Treasury make no allowance for correspondence.

52,618. Do those fees amount to any considerable sum in some cases?—I am afraid I cannot give you very much information on that point. In Manchester those fees come to somewhere about 120*l.* a year, but I am told that in other registries they are considerably in excess of that. In fact, I should say that they would probably be 300*l.* or 400*l.* in some cases, but I do not know. I cannot tell you because they are private accounts and are not within my knowledge.

52,619. Are the fees according to a fixed scale?—No, they are fixed by the registrar personally in each case. There is a scale which has been adopted by the association, but it is not binding on anybody.

52,620. Do you consider that there are any objections to that system?—I think very grave objections. I think it ought not to be allowed at all.

MR. CHARLES HENRY MORTON, Honorary Secretary of the Associated Provincial Law Societies, called and examined.

52,623. (Chairman.) You are a solicitor practising in Liverpool?—I am.

52,624. Are you President of the Incorporated Law Society of Liverpool?—I have been President of the Incorporated Law Society of Liverpool, and I am a member of the Council of the Law Society in London.

52,625. What is your relation to the Associated Provincial Law Societies?—I have been for some 25 years the honorary secretary of the Associated Provincial Law Societies, and am still.

52,626. Will you tell us what the Associated Provincial Law Societies is?—It is based very much on the same lines as the Associated Chambers of Commerce. The societies number about 56. Almost all the country law societies are members of the association, and they meet from time to time to consider matters which more especially affect the provinces as distinguished from the metropolis, though on any subject which interests the profession as a whole they usually confer with, and lend their aid and influence, such as it is, to the head society.

52,627. Your evidence is given on behalf of that association?—I give my evidence at the request of the association, and on their behalf.

52,628. Are you also a member of the Rule Committee of the Supreme Court?—Yes, one of the two solicitor members.

52,629. Were you also a member of the Royal Commission on Delay in the King's Bench Division?—Yes.

52,630. On that Commission you had to examine in some detail the question of the procedure of the courts?—Yes, along with other members.

52,631. The first point on which you have evidence to offer to the Commission relates to the offices of the district probate registrar and the district registrar of the High Court?—Yes, I have been asked to point out the undesirability of the promotion of a clerk from the probate registry in London to the position of district probate registrar, and from that office to that of the registrarship of the King's Bench, Chancery and Admiralty Divisions. At the present moment under the 52,621. What suggests itself to me is that an unscrupulous registrar—if such a person exists—might create difficulties and cause correspondence for the purpose of getting fees?—The danger also is this: All the work, I may say, is not done in Government hours, but is done outside the registry. The papers are received at the registry but taken home and settled there, so that the work is done outside Government hours altogether, or should be—that is the principle; anyway, in Manchester they are always taken home. The chief clerk might make demands that the registrar knows nothing about. Besides, I think it is a very invidious position for the registrar to be in; but at the same time it is a very great convenience, I am told, for solicitors to have their papers settled if they want them. It is purely voluntary work.

52,622. Is any work of that kind done at the central registry?—None whatever. The only papers settled at the central registry are with regard to special points, and there is a special fee for that in the list of fees. There is no fee for settling and no paper is settled; in fact, they will not look at any paper that is not sworn, so the solicitor has to take them in duly sworn, and if they are wrong, take them back again and correct them. Whereas in the country, if a solicitor has something special, he brings it to the registrar and pays a fee to have it settled. Frequently in the morning I see people who come in and ask me if an affidavit is in form, and I tell them whether it is or is not. I do not settle it for them. I look through it casually and see if I think it is right. I think it is bad for this system to go on, but at the same time I am told by the profession that a lot of them like it, and as it is voluntary they do not see any reason why it should be abolished. That may account possibly for some of these other registries making a difference in the way of salary by reason of the agency—so I am told.

Act of 1858, a clerk from the Principal Probate Registry in London is eligible for the office of district probate registrar; when the Judicature Acts were passed the staff and work of the old Probate Court was transferred to the Probate Division of the High Court. The Judicature Act provided that the district probate registrar should be eligible for the position of district registrar of the King's Bench Division and other divisions of the High Court. The work of the staff of the probate registry in London is principally what lawyers call "common form." Very seldom any legal question of moment comes before the clerical staff, and if there be such a question the parties are generally referred to the judge to dispose of it. The district registrars of the King's Bench, Chancery, and Admiralty Divisions of the High Court occupy in their respective districts the position of masters of the High Court in London; they act as masters, registrars, and taxing-masters of the King's Bench and Chancery Divisions, and they exercise (with some exceptions on the Chancery side), all the powers of a judge in chambers which are exercisable by a master; they also act as registrars in Admiralty and as registrars in Companies Winding-up.

52,632. I observe that you do not mention Bankruptcy. Have they any powers in Bankruptcy?—The Bankruptcy business generally goes to the County Court in the country. Companies Winding-up business, which is, of course, somewhat similar in principle, falls to the district registrars, but almost all the private bankruptcies are dealt with through the County Court. The powers of some of the district registries are not so full as those of the Liverpool and Manchester District registries, but matters of the gravest importance come before all the district registrars involving the determination, not only of questions of fact, but intricate questions of law and practice. The association which I represent submit that such exceedingly responsible positions should be filled by a skilled lawyer, not only well versed in legal and equitable principles, but thoroughly experienced in legal practice. The experience of a clerk in the Probate Division is a limited one; the greater part of his work may be termed "common form." It is rarely that he is called upon to adjudicate upon any legal point. These clerks, although capable as Probate Division clerks, are, we submit, wholly unfitted for the position of a district registrar of the other divisions of the High Court. The latter officer must be a good lawyer, conversant with the law of evidence, and able to deal with important questions arising on originating summonses, interlocutory and other proceedings in actions, in winding up companies, working out accounts and inquiries, dealing with wards of court, and administration of estates, and taxing costs. On the Admiralty side the district registrar conducts inter alia references for the assessment of damages in collision cases between ships, frequently involving questions of demurrage and other difficult items. It can be no more expected that a clerk in the Probate Division could, without proper legal education, wide experience, and long training, satisfactorily fulfil the above duties, than he could conduct research and formulate conclusions in a cancer institute. The district registries are branches of the High Court, and a district registrar corresponds to the master in London, but Probate Division clerks are not eligible for the office of master in London.

52,633. The question to which you refer arises, I suppose, in cases where the High Court district registry and the district probate registry are held by the same person?—That is so. Take, for instance, the case of the City of Manchester: A gentleman from the registry in London was made for a day or so district probate registrar in Manchester; that promotion was correct, and I do not know that any objection can be taken to it had he not been forthwith translated to the then vacant office of district registrar of the other divisions.

52,634. Is it the case that by statute at Manchester those two offices must be held by the same person?—No, not necessarily. They have twice been held by the same person since the Judicature Act. In Liverpool they are held by the same person, but that is done, I believe, at the instance of the Treasury, who desire to save salaries.

52,635. We were told this morning, if I am not mistaken, that at Manchester the combination of the two offices is statutory?—It is authorised by statute, but it is not necessarily so.

52,636. It is authorised, but not obligatory?—For instance, Birmingham has a separate probate registrar, so has Bristol, and in both those cities there are district registrars of the other divisions who are independent.

52,637. You say the statutory position is that combination is permissible but not obligatory?—Yes, not obligatory.

52,638. Are there any other cases in which the offices have been combined?—I do not know of any. No doubt there are one or two. It is the principle that I am asked to object to here, because it might be applied to every town. There is no reason why it should not occur, and recur, in every town whenever a vacancy happens in the district registrarships of the King's Bench Division.

52,639. The point of my question was this, I wished to ascertain whether the combination had been made in more than one case, and if so, whether practical inconvenience had arisen from it. In the one case to which you refer, that of Manchester, has practical inconvenience arisen?—It would be difficult for me to give that evidence. I have no doubt certain litigants would tell you, if the district probate registrar decided against them, that it was a very serious inconvenience.

52,640. You mentioned that Admiralty work was a special kind of work with which a district High Court registrar might be called upon to deal?—Yes, it is rather special.

52,641. Is there any Admiralty work in Manchester?—Some, but not so much as at Liverpool.

52,642. On referring to the official statistics I find in the year to which they relate, 1913, there was no Probate, Divorce, or Admiralty work at Manchester?—There might be Admiralty business in chambers, which might not appear in the judicial statistics.

52,643. And there might be some in other years?—There might be work going on in chambers and an action might easily be settled or compromised; I do not think that would appear in the judicial statistics.

52,644. These are the statistics of proceedings commenced?—Not of matters tried.

52,645. There were no proceedings whatever commenced on the Probate, Divorce, or Admiralty side?—I am not surprised that the Manchester solicitors prefer to institute proceedings in Admiralty in London or in Liverpool. If there is an accident in the Ship Canal or in the Salford Docks, it could come before the Manchester district registry if the parties wished, but they would not necessarily wish.

52,646. The point you wish to put is the point of principle. You think the previous experience of a clerk in the Central Probate Registry does not qualify him for the work of a district registrar of the High Court?—No, it does not qualify him at all.

52,647. What is the statutory qualification, apart from having occupied the position of district probate registrar?—A solicitor of five years' standing. At the time of the Judicature Act there were certain provisions made by which the registrars of some of the inferior courts were eligible, and the registrar of a County Court is eligible, but they must be solicitors, so it comes to the same thing.

52,648. Five years' standing as a solicitor would not necessarily imply any very extensive experience of the law?—Not necessarily; but, in fact, district registrars are generally chosen from leading solicitors, and in most of the towns they are allowed to have private practice, so that a very good class of man generally occupies the position.

52,649. You have also some observations to make as regards the masterships of the High Court?—The Chancery masters must be solicitors; the King's Bench masters may be solicitors or barristers. In practice they are always barristers, and we do not quite see why a solicitor should not be appointed to vacancies on the King's Bench side, inasmuch as his training and qualifications equally fit him for a mastership of the King's Bench as for a mastership on the Chancery side.

52,650. There is nothing at present to prevent the appointing authority selecting a solicitor, if he thought him a suitable person?—No; but for some reason they never do, and we think it unfair that on no occasion is a solicitor appointed. I believe once there was a solicitor master, but I do not remember it myself. I do not think it reasonable that those offices should always go to the other branch of the profession, if equally capable men can be found in the solicitors' branch of the profession.

52,651. On the other hand, you would confine the Chancery masterships, as they are confined at present, entirely to solicitors?—The Legislature has done that for good reason. The technical training of a solicitor fits him for the particular work of a Chancery master; whereas the training of a barrister does not fit him, certainly for a great deal of the work.

52,652. Would you also confine the taxing masterships entirely to solicitors?—I think you must. It is one of the most difficult things to tax costs fairly; and it is only a man who has spent a great deal of time in learning the practice and procedure of an action that can do it, and judge what costs should be allowed and what disallowed (which is the more difficult). It wants a man who is trained to it; it is quite an expert's work, and requires great experience.

52,653. There have, I believe, been instances of taxing masters who were barristers?—I believe now they are all solicitors; but I am not quite sure on that point. Some solicitor-witness from London would know better than I do. In the district registries the registrar is always the taxing master, and he is always a solicitor, except as I have already mentioned.

52,654. Have you any observations to make on the subject of the position of the clerks in the district registries?—It is one of the little troubles in the provincial towns, that the clerks remain, not only in the Probate registry, but in the other registries of the High Court, and in the County Court, too long. They have no retiring allowance or pension, and their pay is a moderate pay; and it is very difficult for them out of their moderate pay to live respectably, and to save a competency for their old age. The result is that they remain on long after their full period of usefulness; they become crabbed and slow, dilatory and forgetful.

52,655. You have known instances in which that has happened?—Yes, I have. Still, no one would like to initiate any movement for their removal, least of all their principal, the district registrar, because they have been good and efficient servants in their day, and their only offence is their failure from physical or mental infirmity; so, to use a vulgarism, they “hang on.”

52,656. Does that apply to the County Court?—Yes, it applies to all registries. If there was a retiring allowance or pension, there is no doubt that the district registrars, or registrars of County Courts, would take steps to remove, or ask for the resignation of, some elderly clerks, in order that their places might be supplied by younger and more efficient men.

52,657. If there was a system of pension it would be easier to fix a limit of age for retirement?—There might be a limit of age; I do not think a very low limit—perhaps 65; but I think that that should be the outside. It might be better to put it at 60.

52,658. What happens in similar cases in solicitors' private offices?—I think we gradually supersede a clerk by employing other clerks and making the old clerk believe he still does his work, but we take care he does nothing important.

52,659. He continues to draw his pay?—Yes, but he must not do anything, because the more he does the more he annoys you and disturbs your clients.

52,660. In your experience, do solicitors ever pension their own clerks?—Yes. When health breaks down completely and when physical infirmities become great, then it is a common practice with all the good firms, I think, to an old servant, at all events, to give a pension, but it is not necessarily his full wage.

52,661. But there is no regular system of pensions?—No system; I think some very large offices have a scale of pensions.

52,662. Is there any provident or pension society that the solicitors' clerks belong to?—There is in some of the large towns. There is one in Liverpool.

52,663. Do most of your clerks belong to it?—Yes; I ask them to do so, and, I think, all do; at all events those above 25 years of age, but probably not some of the junior ones.

52,664. Do you see any reason why there should not be similar societies among County Court clerks and the clerks of district registries?—They certainly ought to have one, but it would be better that the State should do it, even if by annual assessment of their pay. That is the most effectual way. You have always a certain number of clerks who live up to their incomes, and who are not thrifty and will not save, but who are admirable workers although careless about their own affairs.

52,665. From the point of view of efficiency of the office you think it important to provide means for enabling clerks who are past their work to retire?—I remember in the Chancery of Lancashire that one of the registries suffered greatly by the tiresomeness of the old clerks who could not do their work and got so “crusty,” that the solicitors' clerks would not go near the place. Eventually the matter was brought to the notice of the Chancellor of the Duchy, and they were removed, on pensions I believe.

52,666. Do you find that, generally speaking, the work of the district registries is done in a satisfactory and business-like manner?—They are most efficient and exceedingly prompt. I cannot speak as to the whole of the district registries, but I speak of those I know.

52,667. Do you apply that both to the Probate registries and the High Court registries?—The work of the Probate registrar is quite simple; he simply looks at the papers, sees they are in order, posts them to London; they come back in about a week, and you call for the probate; he sees that the affidavits are correctly sworn and in proper order, and so on.

52,668. The Commission had some evidence upon a point on which I should like to ask your opinion. There are at the present time a considerable number of probate registries, some very small in size and in the amount of business done. It has been suggested that it would be for the convenience of the public, and would probably result in economy, if the smaller registries were abolished or amalgamated, and a smaller number of registries were maintained coinciding more than they do at present with the large centres of population. A change of this kind was originally recommended by the Legal Departments Commission of 1874, but nothing has been done since. What is your opinion on that suggestion?—If I may give my personal opinion—I should not like to pledge the association, of which I am the secretary, because it is not a subject which I have discussed with them, and I could not bind them—my personal opinion would perhaps incline to the merger of the Probate registrarship with that of the district registrarship of the other divisions, in order that the district registrars of the other divisions should relinquish private practice. I think if the salaries of the two registrars were merged into one office, then you might be able to find a gentleman to take the position who would be willing to relinquish his private practice; it is not very desirable that an officer of the court should continue in private practice.

52,669. You would prefer that a larger number of registrars should be whole-time officers not doing any private practice?—Yes. The principle that the district registrar should be also practising is a bad one; he cannot help coming in contact with his brother solicitors in litigious and controversial matters, and at times it reacts in the registry. Suppose you had a bitterly-fought action with A B, and A B comes before you to-morrow in your position as judicial officer, it is a very difficult position in which to keep an even balance; you have just had friction with A B, and there is a sub-consciousness that you do not like that man. I think it would be in the interests of suitors if the district registrar of the King's Bench surrendered his private practice. The Treasury might object to that, because the present salary would not be sufficient, but if the salaries of the Probate registrar and the King's Bench registrar were merged, then it would be possible to do what I have suggested.

52,670. Your suggestion is that the district Probate registry should in all cases where one exists be attached to a district High Court registry?—As they fall vacant, certainly I think they should. I think that that proposal would be universally commended by all the law societies, but I think some of the country law societies would vehemently protest against the extinction of their local probate registries unless they got some advantage of that kind.

52,671. Does the existence of a probate registry in the smaller places really confer any advantage on the public or the profession?—A little, particularly on some of the public—the small estates of 200*l.* or 300*l.* The people come themselves, and the registrar gives them certain assistance; he is permitted to do so, and no solicitor intervenes at all, so it is an advantage in that way.

52,672. You are aware that the local officers of Excise are authorised to give assistance, and to send up papers for personal applicants?—That is for the purposes of collecting duty, yes.

52,673. They also give assistance for the purposes of probate?—I know they can do it. I do not know whether they do it to any extent.

52,674. You may take it from me that they do it to a considerable extent, as there are a considerable number of grants of that kind?—I know they have power to do it.

52,675. Would not the extension of a system of that kind take the place of such convenience as may be afforded by the small local registries?—Certainly, if the local Excise officer can do it.

52,676. At present the number of High Court registries is considerably larger than the number of Probate registries?—Yes, I should think it would be.

52,677. But you would not suggest that the number of Probate registries should be increased?—No.

52,678. But rather that where they are maintained they should be attached to the district High Court registry?—Yes.

15 April 1915.]

Mr. CHARLES HENRY MORTON.

52,679. The High Court registry is, in many cases, combined with the County Court registry?—In most cases.

52,680. You would not see any objection to their being combined?—Not at all; on the contrary, I think it would be a public convenience to have them all under one roof.

52,681. It has been suggested to us that, in at any rate the larger places, it would be impossible for one registrar to do the work of the three?—Yes, I should like to make that clear. It would be impossible in a place like Birmingham, for instance, and Manchester, and Liverpool. I do not think it could be done there, the County Court business being so large.

52,682. How would you treat a case like Birmingham or Manchester?—It could be done by making joint registrars.

52,683. You would have two or more joint registrars?—Yes, in the large places, as is done in Liverpool and Manchester.

52,684. Leaving them to distribute the work among themselves as they like?—Yes, it works most conveniently, especially in vacations, absence from illness, and the like.

52,685. You do not see any inconvenience in it, and the person who under your suggestion would be appointed to these joint registrarships would, necessarily, be a solicitor?—He would.

52,686. He would not have had previous experience of probate registry work?—He might not, but it is so simple that a clerk could do it.

52,687. You do not anticipate any difficulty?—Not the slightest.

52,688. You regard the Probate part of the work as very much simpler than the High Court part of the work?—It is what is called "common form." It is so simple that a month or so's tuition would be sufficient. If there is any doubt at all, the district registrar sends the papers to London for the principal registrar's opinion.

52,689. At the largest places—Manchester and Liverpool, for instance—the County Court registry is separate?—It is.

52,690. Would you maintain that separation or not?—That involves the rather large question of the merger of the County Court and the High Court, which is a very old subject. I have always held the opinion that the County Court should be an inferior branch of the High Court, and, of course, if that were done it would solve many of these minor questions. To-day, in practice, the two registries are kept separate; although the same man may hold both offices his books, accounts, &c., are separate. The registries, however, are usually under one roof.

52,691. And the staff of clerks whom he employs with two kinds of work are quite separate?—I would not like to say they are entirely separate, because there is, no doubt, some very clever clerk who would do both classes of work, but broadly speaking they would be separate.

52,692. Does inconvenience arise at present from the limit of territorial jurisdiction of the probate registries?—I think it is absurd. I do not know the extent of the inconvenience, but, as an illustration, take my part of the kingdom—Liverpool and Birkenhead for practical purposes are one city; if I die in Birkenhead my executors may prove the will in Chester, but not in Liverpool, whereas all my interests are in Liverpool, and my executors and solicitors are in Liverpool; it is indefensible that the probate should not be taken out in the most convenient place. I do not care where it is. I might die in Liverpool, and it might be more convenient to prove my will in Hereford if my executors and my solicitor were there. There is no virtue in proving a will on the spot where I die. I would make every probate registry capable of accepting for probate the will of any person wherever he died or lived. You may be quite sure that the parties would go to the most convenient point if they are allowed to.

52,693. In that case a registry that was in an inconvenient position would die a natural death?—Yes, it would, and what harm? If there is no work it ought to die.

52,694. You are a member of the Rule Committee of the Supreme Court?—Yes.

52,695. A suggestion was made to us by one witness that there would be advantages as regards the organisation and the working of the offices of the court if the Rule Committee was assisted by masters or other representatives of those offices which are familiar with the detailed working of the rules. He suggested even a sub-committee composed of persons of that kind for the detailed working out of the rules?—I think there ought to be a King's Bench master and a Chancery master, at least, on the Rule Committee. Some people think there should be a taxing master on the Committee, but questions of cost on the Rule Committee are comparatively rare, and perhaps the taxing master might be dispensed with. There might be a registrar of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division, though those questions are comparatively rare. But, for some reason, the Rule Committee have not favoured the addition of masters. I believe the idea is that they would always be wanting to propose changes in the procedure of the courts.

52,696. In fact they know where the shoe pinches?—They know where the shoe pinches, and some of them, perhaps, aim at a policy of perfection, which is unattainable. I know it is the feeling of some of the members of the Rule Committee that it is a lesser evil to exclude them. I am not quite so sure. The evil of allowing imperfections in practice and procedure to remain—and we practitioners feel that evil very much—is far greater to my mind than the evil of trying to amend the practice and procedure. Proposed amendments of the rules lie over in the Rule Committee for a long time, and every practitioner and suitor has to put up with the delay. It may be that the amendment proposed is desirable or undesirable, but at least it should be considered, and I think if we had the masters on the committee with their great experience, and the evidence which they could bring from their experience, something perhaps might be done towards improving the procedure. The Rule Committee does not meet on fixed dates. If a new Act of Parliament is passed, under which rules are required, the Government department asks for the rules and then the Committee will meet, because the matter is urgent. Excepting for some such reason, there is no reason why it should meet until the Lord Chancellor thinks fit to convene it.

52,697. (Mr. Coward.) Did they pass the rules relating to the Trading with the Enemy Act?—I think the Lord Chancellor was empowered to make urgency rules.

52,698. They did not pass them?—There happened to be a meeting, and some were put before us, and we were asked to confirm them. The Legislature recognised the difficulty of getting rules promptly from the Rule Committee, and therefore they empowered the Lord Chancellor to make the rules. Many rules have been made with imperfect knowledge, and some of those rules have had to be amended, because in practice it was found that further rules were wanted. My idea is that the Rule Committee should meet twice in each term. There would always be business for it to do, but, whether urgent business or not, it should be summoned.

52,699. How often do they meet?—I should say they meet on an average once in each term, but it ought to be at least twice. Then if they met twice in each term and allocated sufficient time to the work, I think there would be no need for the practice rules that the masters make, and which at times cause a certain amount of annoyance amongst the solicitors. Practice rules I suppose are the work of the masters themselves, and I do not know under what authority, but they tell you that they have to make practice rules, because the Rule Committee has not made a rule which is workable, and they must do it. But if there were regular meetings of the Committee at frequent intervals the masters could say: "This rule does not work on a certain point," and the Rule Committee could consider what amendment was desirable. The Lord Chancellor is president of the Committee and you cannot expect the Lord Chancellor, who has all the affairs of State and matters of the greatest moment to consider, to bother about some little imperfection in Order So-and-so, the proposed amendment of which is (say) only three lines. Before he can understand it, he has to look into it and take time to understand it. It is too much to expect of the Lord Chancellor. Although he should remain President of the Rule Committee, there should be an acting chairman, whose duty should it be to preside over the meetings and take up the work and advance it. In addition, there should be an assistant secretary. The present secretary is Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie; he is a very busy man with most onerous duties, and you cannot expect him to undertake these small details. The imperfections in the rules of procedure are small in themselves, but unless the judicial machine works smoothly in all its parts, there is friction.

Mr. CHARLES HENRY MORTON.

52,700. (Mr. Boutwood.) Who constitutes the Rule Committee?—The Rule Committee is presided over by the Lord Chancellor, and also consists of the President of each division, that is to say, the Lord Chief Justice, the Master of the Rolls, and the President of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division. Then there are certain judges who, I think, are not limited to any particular number. There are judges of the Court of Appeal, Chancery judges, and King's Bench judges. Then there is a member of the Chancery Bar and of the King's Bench side, and two solicitors, one of whom is nominated by the Council of the Law Society, and who is generally a metropolitan member, and another who is nominated by the Lord Chancellor, who is a country solicitor, supposed to be familiar with the work of the Provinces, and particularly with the practice the district registries. I am at the moment the nominee of the Lord Chancellor as representing the provincial solicitors. The secretary is Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie.

52,701. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) Do you think it would be possible to concentrate in certain convenient centres of population all the subordinate legal duties both of the Probate registry, the High Court registry, and the County Court registry?—It is possible. This subject was one of those that were discussed before the Royal Commission on Legal Delay, but the idea that they should centralise was opposed by most of the country societies vehemently.

52,702. Putting aside the question of personnel and whether those posts should be held by one or by different persons, or what the qualification should be, do you think it would be for the convenience of the public if, at certain easily ascertained centres of population, they could go to a place where they could get the work done?—I do not agree with that view. They could do it, but the extra cost to the local litigant would be so great that he would not agree. Your proposal would be that you would extinguish certain assize towns. Is that what you mean?

52,703. No. You told us that it would be an advantage that there should be fewer Probate registries?—I did not say there would be any advantage.

52,704. That the Probate registry should be put in convenient centres of population?—No, I did not say that. I say instead of having in a town, say, like Hereford, a Probate registry, a County Court registry, and a High Court registry, you should put all the three in one hand; you do not extinguish them.

52,705. About what number of those combined registries would there be?—I could not answer that off-hand. I really do not know how many Probate registries there are.

52,706. (Chairman.) There are 40?—There are more district registries of the High Court than of the Probate, so there would be at least 40.

52,707. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) Would you make more than 40, so as to make a Probate registry wherever there is a district registry, or would you make 40 and thereby extinguish a certain number of High Court district registries?—I would not extinguish any High Court district registry, because there are not too many.

52,708. Then you would have at least as many Probate registries as there are High Court registries?—Yes.

52,709. (Chairman.) I understood the suggestion to be that there would not necessarily be a Probate registry at every High Court registry?—Not necessarily.

52,710. But where there was one you would combine it with the High Court registry?—Yes.

52,711. There are 89 district registries of the High Court?—I do not know the number.

52,712. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) How many County Court registries are there?—A very large number.

52,713. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) You would not combine those, but only where there is a Probate registry and a High Court registry would you combine them?—I think it probable that there are enough Probate registries, and it would not be necessary to create any more, either singly or in combination.

52,714. Then, in different towns, a single officer would be in one town with only a County Court; in another town there would be a County Court and a High Court registrar, and in another town there would be, perhaps, all three.

52,715. (Sir Donald MacAlister.) We understand that the district Probate registrar, certainly in small districts, has a certain amount of "agency" work in the nature of solicitors' work?—Yes, that is permitted.

52,716. How is that regarded by the legal profession?—I do not think they like it, but I think they recognise that the country towns or villages surrounding the centre are entitled to have the benefit of the registry; the cheapest way they can get the benefit is by post and by communicating with the Probate registrar, who does the work on a very modest basis of fees.

52,717. A more modest basis of fees than a solicitor would charge?—Yes, I hardly believe it would pay a solicitor to do that work for that fee.

52,718. Is it solicitor's work that he does?—Yes, it is in a way, but it is so simple that anybody could do it; you do not want any particular training to do it. For instance, a very large number of law stationers—Waterlows, and firms of that class—do similar work in London.

52,719. It does not require any legal training?—Very little. It is what we call "common form." You have to know a few things, but you do not require any special erudition.

52,720. Is this so-called "agency" work all of that kind?—Yes, all quite simple.

52,721. Still we hear that the fees aggregate in some places to a considerable amount?—Yes, they do, but very seldom would those fees exceed 30s., and very often not more than 15s.

52,722. The aggregate in one place was 150l., and in another 400l.?—Yes, at Wakefield, I know, it amounts to a large sum, but it is an important centre of a considerable area with no facilities.

52,723. The training which would make a man a useful adviser in these matters in the district probate registry would make him equally capable of learning the High Court work?—Would he know how from stern or port from starboard in an Admiralty collision case, as an instance? I do not think he would. It would be most dangerous to have to litigate matters where intricate questions of law, as well as questions of fact, have to be decided before a clerk who has had no education in equitable or legal principles. It only means more cost. Whichever side lost before that registrar, as a matter of course, would appeal, and it would considerably add to the cost of litigation.

52,724. I gather from your whole argument that you think experience of five or 10 years as a solicitor is the best qualification for a judicial office?—My own private opinion is that it should be 10 years, but you may get exceptional men sufficiently skilled in five years. They would have had training under articles, and probably had considerable experience as managing clerks, and may have had a university education, and taken a legal degree. Five years from taking out the certificate to practise in one man's case might be long enough, but might not be long enough in the case of another man. It would depend on what had taken place before his appointment.

Mr. CHARLES HENRY MORTON.

52,725. Solely from the point of view that these registrars, and so on, have to exercise judicial functions?—Yes, they sit as judges in chambers, for instance.

52,726. And the experience which they require for that they would not get as barristers?—Barristers would get some of the experience. I would much rather have a barrister than a layman, because he is well grounded in legal principles, and would, no doubt, give an excellent judgment on a point of law; but where a barrister would fail in chambers is, that he does not know as much as a solicitor about accounts or book-keeping, and does not understand family matters, the treatment of wards of court, in the same way that a solicitor does who is brought up to do all this kind of thing. All that class of work, which a solicitor learns in his private practice, becomes exceedingly useful when, as a registrar, he has to deal with it.

52,727. A judge of the High Court has to be familiar with those things as well as the registrar?—Yes, he has, but not to the same extent. Further, that kind of business is generally assigned to one or two judges specially, because it is desirable that those cases should always be before a judge who is familiar with this kind of work.

52,728. Then your argument points to the fact that 10 years' practice as a solicitor should be a qualification for the office of judge as well?—Not necessarily; but I see no objection to it.

52,729. (Sir John Kempe.) I suppose you would not exclude an officer of the Probate Court? You would prefer a solicitor's qualification, but an exceptional man who has been a probate clerk you would admit; you would not exclude him wholly?—I would exclude him if he had not had a legal education or training.

52,730. However good he is?—He cannot be fit for the office of district registrar unless he has been trained.

52,731. But there are many of the men now who are very good?—I do not know, I would not like to say; but I am sure, if you had to go and seek advice in your own private affairs, you would go to the man who was specially trained rather than to the man who had not been so trained.

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-SEVENTH DAY.

Wednesday, 21st April 1915.

PRESENT:

SIR HENRY BABINGTON SMITH, K.C.B., C.S.I. (Chairman).

Sir JOHN ARROW KEMPE, K.C.B.
Mr. ARTHUR BOUTWOOD.
Mr. CECIL COWARD.

Mr. ARTHUR EVERETT SHIPLEY, F.R.S.
Mr. PHILIP SNOWDEN, M.P.
Mr. GRAHAM WALLAS.

Mr. E. W. H. MILLAR (Secretary).

Mr. EDWARD ALMS (District Probate Registrar, Taunton), Mr. W. H. L. SHADWELL (District Probate Registrar, Bodmin), Mr. GORDON SIMPSON (District Probate Registrar, York), representing the District Probate Registrars Association, called and examined.

52,732. (Chairman.) (To Mr. Alms.) You are District Probate Registrar at Taunton?—Yes.

52,733. How long have you held that post?—Since the year 1894.

52,734. What had been your experience before you were appointed there?—I was admitted a solicitor in the year 1881, and on my appointment I was in general practice in partnership with another solicitor, a Mr. Pinchard, of many years' experience in the same town, and we had in our office a considerable amount of Probate Court work.

52,735. Your practice was at Taunton?—Yes.

52,736. Since you were appointed district registrar have the duties of that office occupied your whole time, or do you also practise as a solicitor?—I also practise. It does not occupy my whole time.

52,737. But you do not practise as a solicitor in your own registry?—I do not. That was made a condition precedent to my accepting the appointment when I was appointed by Sir Francis Jeune.

52,738. (To Mr. Shadwell.) You are District Probate Registrar at Bodmin?—Yes.

52,739. How long have you held that post?—Since 1892.

52,740. Before that were you a clerk in the Principal Probate Registry?—I was.

52,741. Since what date?—1872.

52,742. Does the post at Bodmin occupy your whole time?—I have no other employment there.

52,743. Is it a condition of your appointment that you should not take any other employment?—No.

52,744. (To Mr. Simpson.) You are District Probate Registrar at York?—Yes.

52,745. Since what date have you held that appointment?—I was appointed to the Principal Probate Registry in 1890, and transferred to the Lincoln district in 1906.

52,746. And then transferred from Lincoln to York?—Last year.

52,747. Does the work at York occupy your whole time?—I have no other occupation. I cannot say that the work itself occupies me the whole time; but I feel bound to be there almost all the time.

52,748. Out of the total number of district registrars, which I think is 40, how many have previously served at the Principal Probate Registry?—(Mr. Shadwell.) Of the existing district probate registrars 26 have served in the Principal Registry.

52,749. What was the occupation of the remainder?—10 are solicitors and four are barristers. One solicitor died last week.

52,750. That is to say there is one post vacant?—Yes, one post is vacant.

52,751. Can you tell me whether in any cases it is a condition of the appointment that no other occupation should be followed?—It has been. In cases where solicitors have been appointed it has been a condition from the very earliest times.

52,752. In certain registries?—In certain registries.

52,753. Can you tell me how many?—I am afraid I could not say how many? (Mr. Simpson.) I had a letter from a Mr. Wilde of Derby, who was appointed in 1869, and he says that it was made a condition before he was appointed—"I received my appointment on 'promising not at any time to practise as a solicitor.'" That shows that it has been a custom from the very beginning.

52,754. Do I understand from you that at the smaller registries a solicitor who is appointed is not precluded from practising, except from practising as a solicitor before his own registry?—I think that is so.

52,755. What is the position as regards holding other official posts. A district registrar in certain cases is also the registrar of the High Court?—(Mr. Shadwell.) In three cases.

21 April 1915.] Mr. EDWARD ALMS, Mr. W. H. L. SHADWELL, and Mr. GORDON SIMPSON.

52,756. Which are those?—Liverpool, Manchester, and Ipswich.

52,757. Is he in certain cases also the registrar of the County Court?—I believe not in any case.

52,758. In no case?—In none.

52,759. Do the probate registrars hold any other official posts either under a local government body or otherwise?—(Mr. Simpson.) They certainly have done so in the past. I succeeded a man in Lincoln who held office as diocesan registrar, for instance. (Mr. Alms.) I myself hold an appointment as clerk to the bench of county magistrates. I also hold the position of clerk to the Income Tax Commissioners in the division of Taunton.

52,760. Is it frequent for registrars to hold posts of that character in addition to their probate registrarships?—(Mr. Simpson.) None of the Civil servants would be likely to hold any such posts. That gets rid of 26.

52,761. You can say with confidence that none of the 26 hold any such post?—Except Mr. Mais, of Manchester, who is district registrar of the High Court.

52,762. In the case of the other two probate registrars who are registrars of the High Court, that is to say, at Liverpool and Ipswich, were they solicitors?—(Mr. Shadwell.) Yes. (Mr. Simpson.) The registrar at Ipswich is a solicitor.

52,763. Which are the places where the registrarship is held by a barrister?—(Mr. Alms.) Lincoln, Mr. John Strachan; Llandaff, Mr. Raymond Allen; Peterborough, Mr. Charles Smith Magee; and Winchester, Mr. George Granville Phillimore.

52,764. Had those barristers any local connection before they were appointed?—(Mr. Alms.) I cannot say. (Mr. Shadwell.) Mr. Magee was the son of Dr. Magee, at one time Bishop of Peterborough.

52,765. You are not aware if they had any professional connection?—(Mr. Simpson.) I think Mr. Allen had some local appointment, but I do not know any more than that.

52,766. Before going further, I should like to ask about the District Probate Registrars Association, of which Mr. Alms is Chairman. Does that association include the whole of the district probate registrars?—(Mr. Alms.) Yes, it does. I think they are all members of it.

52,767. Dealing first with the position of the registrars, we understand from you that the 26 registrars who were in the Principal Registry before they were appointed to a district registry have not any other occupation besides their registrarships?—(Mr. Simpson.) Yes.

52,768. In the case of the solicitors and barristers—the remaining 14—there is nothing to prevent them having other occupations, and in some cases they have other occupations?—Except the promise extracted from some of them that they should not practise as solicitors.

52,769. Would that undertaking prevent them from holding such posts as have been mentioned—clerks to the justices or clerk to the Income Tax Commissioners?—I cannot say. (Mr. Alms.) No. (Mr. Shadwell.) No. (Mr. Alms.) The term “practising as a solicitor” would embrace the holding of such posts.

52,770. The undertaking not to practise as a solicitor applies generally, and not merely to practising before their own registries?—Yes, it applies generally.

52,771. In the smaller registries the work, I suppose, does not occupy anything like the whole time of the registrars?—No, it does not.

52,772. How many grants are there at York?—(Mr. Simpson.) About 1,100 seems to be the average now. There have been two vacancies lately.

52,773. At Bodmin is the number about 800?—(Mr. Shadwell.) Yes, somewhere about that.

52,774. And at Taunton the number is about 280?—(Mr. Alms.) Yes, 280 to 300.

52,775. At Taunton that would amount to something under one grant per working day?—Allotting one grant to each day of the year, yes; but in practice we find that at certain periods of the year, particularly the first two quarters of the year, the work exceeds considerably the work in the second two quarters of the year. I should say that quite double or three times the amount of work comes in the first two quarters.

52,776. But even at the busiest time of the year the work cannot occupy anything like the whole time of the registrar?—No, not of the registrar himself.

52,777. The appointment of district registrars is made by the President of the Division?—Yes, the President of the Division for the time being.

52,778. From the point of view of registrars, do you consider that system satisfactory?—(Mr. Shadwell.) Yes, quite as satisfactory as any other system is at all likely to be.

52,779. The suggestion has been made to the Commission that legal appointments of this character should be made either by a committee or by a high legal officer, such as the Lord Chancellor or the President of the Division, on the advice of a committee, that committee to consist, it was suggested, of the permanent secretary to the Lord Chancellor, a representative of the Civil Service Commissioners, a representative of the Treasury, a representative of the department concerned, and a solicitor of eminence. What would be your opinion of a system of that kind as compared with the present system?—(Mr. Alms.) I can see no advantage in it over the present system.

52,780. You prefer the present system?—(Mr. Shadwell.) I think the present system works quite as well as any other system would work, and I am speaking entirely without bias, because I have applied for many appointments and not received them. (Mr. Simpson.) I cannot speak without bias, because I have got a very good appointment in this way.

52,781. I was asking the question from the point of view, of course, not of personal interests but of the efficiency of the Service and the public advantage?—(Mr. Shadwell.) And it was in that spirit I was answering it. (Mr. Simpson.) I think I agree with the change of principle which you suggest.

52,782. You would prefer the suggested system?—I think so. (Mr. Alms.) Yes. It is the first time that the question has been considered by me. I think the proposal which you say has been made, does commend itself to me, because the appointments would not be more or less of a personal character, but would probably be the selection of the best man. One tries to regard it in the light of obviating questions of personal selection and to endeavour to get the best man appointed. So long as political qualifications are kept apart from it the selection of the best men is the thing wanted.

52,783. What is the position of the registrars as regards pension?—(Mr. Shadwell.) By virtue of the Judicature Act, 1879, they are entitled to pension provided that they receive a Civil Service certificate on their first admission to the Service. (Mr. Alms.) With reference to the members of my profession who are not members of the Civil Service, they are not entitled to pension except upon special application to the Lord Chancellor under Section 17 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Officers) Act, 1879.

52,784. (To Mr. Shadwell.) When you say that the registrars are pensionable, are you speaking now of all the registrars, or of those who had been in the Principal Registry before appointment as district registrars?—It applies only to those who have been appointed through the Principal Registry, because they alone hold the Civil Service certificate.

52,785. On what terms are they pensionable?—On the ordinary terms of the Civil Service; after 40 years' service and on reaching the age of 60, they are entitled to two-thirds of their salary.

52,786. On the salary at the time of retirement or on the salary when they were appointed as registrars?—On the salary at the time of retirement.

52,787. Is that the view held by the Treasury?—It is.

52,788. In the case of all the district probate registrars?—There have only been two district registrars who retired, and are now living, and their pensions are granted them on that scale. When they retired it was not understood what their rights were under the Judicature Act, and they were awarded a pension only on the salary which they had received in the Principal Registry when they were appointed to the district registries.

52,789. Was that on the assumption that they came under Section 12 of the Superannuation Act, 1859?—So I understand; and on a representation made afterwards to the Lord Chancellor the matter was reconsidered by the Treasury, and they agreed that the pension should be calculated on the salary of the district registrar as district registrar.

52,790. And on his whole service from his original entry into the Probate Registry?—On his whole service. That involved an increase of pension and the payment of the arrears of pension as if it had been originally granted at that rate (Mr. Simpson.) May I point out that that contradicts Mr. Musgrave's evidence at question 46,270 beginning "Are the district registrars pensionable," and the following questions.

52,791. In the following answer Mr. Musgrave says: "The clerks to the Principal Registry who have been appointed district registrars are entitled under the Superannuation Act 1859 to claim a pension on their old salary?"—Yes.

52,792. Do you state that that does not correctly represent the position?—(Mr. Shadwell.) No, it does not.

52,793. The two registrars who have retired were originally pensioned on that basis, but on representation the award was revised and they were pensioned on their salary on retirement, and on the whole of their service up to retirement?—That is so.

52,794. Do you understand that that applies to all registrars who are in a similar position, that is to say, who have a Civil Service certificate, and have previously served in the Civil Service?—Certainly.

52,795. There is no controversy on that point?—None that I know of.

52,796. The Treasury have accepted the position that they will be pensionable on that basis?—So I understand. (Mr. Simpson.) I have the copy letter whereby the registrar of Wells got a pension. He was a test case. I have the copy letter from the Treasury.

52,797. What was the date of that?—20th June 1913.

52,798. Perhaps you will hand that in?—Yes (handing in the letter.)

52,799. What is the position of those registrars who had not previously served in the Principal Probate Registry?—(Mr. Alms.) The position of those officers is, that the Lord Chancellor is empowered to grant pensions, upon application, to such officers under the Supreme Court of Judicature (Officers) Act, 1879, Section 17.

52,800. That is the section which gives the Lord Chancellor power to declare that an office is a professional office requiring special qualifications, and thereupon it becomes lawful for the Treasury to make an addition of years to the service?—That is so.

52,801. Is it clear that that section empowers the Lord Chancellor to make an office pensionable when it is not pensionable, or merely that he has the power of putting the Treasury in a position to add years?—Apparently it puts the Treasury in the position to add years. That is the only means by which members of any profession who are district registrars can obtain anything in the nature either of pension or retirement allowance.

52,802. In any case the Lord Chancellor has not made any declaration under that section at present?—Not to my knowledge. (Mr. Simpson.) No, he has not.

52,803. Do you wish to make any representation to the Commission on that point?—(Mr. Alms.) We do. We submit that the district probate registrar, by virtue of the important and responsible duty that he has to fulfil, should be granted a pension as a matter of course, without making special application, after a certain prescribed service.

52,804. Do you apply that to the smaller registries where a solicitor carries on private practice at the same time and holds other posts?—I should say it would apply more particularly to those positions which are held by district registrars who are precluded from practising. They give their whole time, and are precluded from obtaining emoluments through practising as solicitors, and they hold responsible Civil Service posts.

52,805. You are aware that it is not the practice to make part-time posts pensionable?—I am not aware of the practice.

52,806. You do not suggest that part-time posts should be made pensionable?—It might be pro rata. There is a responsible duty, and the fulfilment of a responsible duty performed faithfully and loyally for so many years, and I submit that, pro rata, they are entitled to the same pension. (Mr. Shadwell.) Might I add to that that the 20th section of the Act of 1879 gives power to the Lord Chancellor to declare that the Civil Service certificate shall not be necessary in certain specified offices. May I also say that the holding of certain local offices by a solicitor does entitle him to pension. For instance, he may be clerk to a board of guardians, and on retirement from that, which is not a whole-time office, he receives a pension according to the Local Government Act; so the principle of a part-time office, not entitling to pension, prevails only in the Crown service.

52,807. The pension you speak of is a pension from the Board of Guardians?—Yes, it would be charged on the rates.

52,808. Turning now to the clerks to the district registrars, how are they appointed?—That raises a difficult question. By the construction which is put upon the Judicature Act from our point of view, they are appointed by the President. Through some misunderstanding they are in form appointed by the district registrar and approved by the President.

52,809. The appointment is made in form under Section 110 of the Act of 1857, dealing with the Probate Court?—Yes.

52,810. That section is still in force, is it not?—It is contended to be still in force, but not admitted by the registrars.

52,811. On what grounds do you say it is not in force?—That it is repealed by the Judicature Act, 1873.

52,812. Was it scheduled as repealed?—None of the provisions of the Probate Act, or of any other Act, were scheduled as repealed by the Act of 1873.

52,813. Certain sections of the Act of 1857 were repealed by one of the subsequent Acts?—Some of the sections were repealed by the Act of 1879 as being inoperative—having become inoperative, not made inoperative by the repeal which did not alter the state of the law at that time.

52,814. Section 110 was not specified in the repeals made by the Act of 1879?—It was not.

52,815. The President acts upon the opinion that Section 110 is still in force?—He does at the present time, but after the Act of 1873 came into force, in 1875, the appointments were, in form, made by the President reciting the power given to him by the Probate Act of 1857, which, of course, gave no power to the President. The only power the President had was under the Act of 1873. The fact that the appointment rested in the President was recognised, but the authority which gave him the power was mis-recited. The practice of appointing by the President and not by the registrar, who had no official voice in the appointment, was followed until 1888, and then the practice was changed, and the registrar was called upon to make the appointment and submit it for approval to the President; and that practice has been followed.

52,816. Your suggestion is that formerly the President made the appointment by the right method but recited the wrong authority, and that now he makes the appointment by the wrong method and cites the wrong authority?—That is so.

52,817. Do you say that the attention of the Treasury and the successive presidents has been directed to this irregularity?—It has.

52,818. What has the Treasury to do with it?—The appointment has to be made in conjunction with the Treasury. It has to be submitted to the Treasury. The Treasury will not act in the payment of any salary until the appointment has been made, and they have had notice of intention to make the appointment for a month or less.

52,819. The appointment when made is reported to the authority which pays the salary?—Yes. It is rather more than that, because when a vacancy occurs the Treasury is at once communicated with by the President and informed of the fact, and then the President communicates his intention to make an appointment, and the Treasury, so to speak, sanctions it.

52,820. The object of that previous communication is to give the Treasury and the Lord Chancellor the opportunity of considering whether it is necessary to fill the vacancy at all?—That is so.

52,821. And not to deal with the actual appointment in any way. The Treasury has no voice in the actual appointment in any way?—That I am not prepared to say.

52,822. By whom have representations been made to the Treasury?—By the registrars—not to the Treasury direct, of course. They can move only through the President.

52,823. You said that the attention of the Treasury had been directed to this irregularity. I want to know by whom the attention of the Treasury has been directed to it?—That I cannot say. (Mr. Simpson.) It is under the Act of 1881. I dare say you are aware that notice is given.

52,824. Yes; but that notice has no particular bearing on the present point, has it?—(Mr. Shadwell.) In saying the attention of the Treasury has been drawn to it, I have in mind the application made for the pensions which turned on the same point—the method of the appointment.

52,825. Do you suggest that the difficulty of arriving at a decision on points of this kind makes it expedient to have some tribunal for settling points which arise in which members of the Service do not agree with the view taken by the Treasury?—I do.

52,826. In your précis of evidence you suggest that the Commission have made a recommendation in that sense?—I do.

52,827. To what recommendation do you refer?—I think it is stated in one of the letters of your secretary. If not, I think we had some official notice that you had done so; but if I am wrong there, then I should say it has appeared in the report already published.

52,828. The reports of the Commission are public property. Can you refer me to any recommendation of the Commission in that sense?—I do not know that I can. I did not myself look it up.

52,829. Have you referred to the paragraph of the Commission's report on that subject?—I have not had an opportunity of doing so.

52,830. The recommendation of the Commission in regard to that matter was, that a special department should be formed within the Treasury for dealing with certain questions affecting Departments of State. It did not in any way contemplate an independent or outside tribunal for settling questions arising between the Treasury and other departments?—I am sorry we should have been misinformed. (Mr. Simpson.) The ground of putting that in at all was the opinion of the law officers that certain clerks in the district registries were pensionable, upon which certain pensions were granted. That was in 1912, and then in 1914 the law officers reconsidered that opinion, and, consequently, these clerks who had anticipated pensions were deprived of them. You will hear from the clerks more about it, but I think that is what we had in mind when we thought an independent tribunal would be an advantage.

52,831. The point that was at issue there was a point of law—a point of construction of statutes?—Yes. Of course it has been a bitter disappointment to many clerks.

52,832. Was the point at issue there a point of law—a question of construction of statutes?—Yes.

52,833. The question that you are speaking about was the question whether the clerks in the district registries are pensionable under the terms of certain statutes as they exist at present, was it not?—I was merely trying to explain what was at the back of our minds.

52,834. Was the question at issue then a question whether the clerks at district registries are pensionable under the terms of certain statutes?—Yes.

52,835. On that point the Treasury acted finally on an opinion of the law officers?—Yes.

52,836. You suggest that there should be some independent tribunal to settle a point of that kind?—Yes.

52,837. Do not the courts of law constitute such an independent tribunal. Is it not open to any body of persons in the Service if they think they have a legal right to certain things to bring a petition of right?—I thought that the Treasury decision was final. (Mr. Shadwell.) Upon the matter of granting pensions the Courts have held that the decision of the Treasury is final, and no question can be raised with regard to it. That was held some years ago by Vice Chancellor Malins. A point came up quite recently in an application of one of the railway inspectors under the Board of Trade, and his application was dismissed at once by the Court on the ground that the Treasury's decision on matters of pension is final.

52,838. If that is so, can it be the case that there is a legal claim?—That, of course, is the question at issue. They contend that they have a legal claim. They claim that the statutes have been misunderstood. I do not know whether that could be raised on a petition of right or not. It would certainly be more satisfactory if it could be settled in another way without the expense of a petition of right.

52,839. Yes, but is not the point this, that, if there is a legal claim, it can be enforced in a legal manner. If there is not a legal claim, then the technical legal point falls to the ground?—(Mr. Alms.) And precludes the raising of the question.

52,840. The point I ask you to consider is this: Is not this really a case to be considered on its merits and not on the technical legal points?—Unquestionably so, and that is the opinion of several of our district registrars. They are in favour of an impartial tribunal who should determine all these questions of pensions, pay, and so forth that may arise—that an impartial tribunal should not be a tribunal of the Treasury, who would obviously have as a first consideration the duty of keeping down expenditure. That is a very strong point made by several of our registrars. They think that an impartial tribunal would be of great benefit to the public service generally. A petition of right is a very expensive matter and, apart from that, proceedings in the courts of law against the Treasury would be represented by eminent law officers, and they would have to be met on the other side by men of equal calibre, who are very expensive and altogether prohibitive of course.

52,841. Taking the question from the point of view of the position of the clerks and considerations of equity, what is your opinion as regards their claim to be made pensionable?—In my opinion unquestionably they are entitled to pension apart from the legal points involved and the technical points on those innumerable statutes which have induced even the high authorities—the late law officers of the Crown and others—who advised the Treasury upon it to say that they were so technical that it was very difficult indeed to put a construction upon them. In my opinion the clerks are unquestionably entitled to the consideration of their salaries and also of pensions. I think it is very unreasonable and very unjust, if I may say so, in regard to men who have devoted their time to the service of the country. My chief clerk has so devoted 40 years of his time. He is a most competent man and capable, and has performed most excellent service to his country in the office that he holds; and I think it is unreasonable by the mere fact of his not having passed some Civil Service examination that he should be deprived of a pension on his retirement after that faithful service that he has given to his country.

52,842. How many clerks have you in your registry?—Three.

52,843. Is their whole time employed on the work?—That question raises a point as to the duties of clerks in district registries. The only evidence that I can see upon that—I have not had time to read the evidence which has been handed to me this morning—is the evidence of Mr. Musgrave. The work performed by the clerical staff in a district registry—in my registry, by three clerks—is an amalgamation of the entire duties which devolve upon several departments in the Principal

Registry. In the Principal Registry they have their various departments which do certain particular work. Now, in the district registry the whole of that work has to be fulfilled by the limited staff in that registry, consequently the work of the individual clerks is very considerably increased. I have a list of the duties fulfilled by the clerks in my own registry which I can show the Commission.

52,844. (Mr. Coward.) They have to perform the work that has to be done—that is all?—Yes, they have, and that work done in the Principal Registry is done in departments?

52,845. Yes, it is?—The clerk there does only one particular work and does not do any more. In district registries the limited number of clerks carry out the entire duties of the several departments in the Principal Registry.

52,846. (Chairman.) On any points of difficulty I suppose your clerks would refer to you?—They do.

52,847. You have not yet answered my original question, namely, whether the work occupies the whole of their time?—I should say that, generally speaking, it does. Of course, there are days upon which, in a small registry like mine, the work is very light.

52,848. (Mr. Coward.) Nothing, sometimes?—I would not say “nothing,” because although there may not be the actual issue on every day in the year of a grant in the registry solicitors constantly come in and ask questions upon points of practice, and there are papers sent to the registry for consideration and advice upon them. The making of copies of wills regarding these applications from outside, and applications for searches. All that work goes on although there may not be actually a grant on a specific day.

52,849. (Chairman.) Is there anything like enough work to occupy three clerks, in addition to such time as you yourself give to it?—On a great number of days throughout the year there is.

52,850. Is there work other than copying sufficient in amount to occupy any substantial part of their time?—Perhaps that would be best answered by giving the duties performed by the several clerks.

52,851. I do not think that would answer the question. We know generally what the duties to be performed in connection with dealing with an application for a grant are, and we may take it that those duties have to be performed by your clerks subject to reference to you on a point of difficulty, and also, I suppose, subject to reference to the Principal Registry on any point of special and exceptional difficulty?—The district registrars are responsible for the work in their district registries. It is a practice which has grown up for them to refer to the principal registrar, whose reply invariably is not a directory one, but “I think so and so.” It may be confirmatory or otherwise of the opinion of the district registrar, but the responsibility of the district registrar is fixed upon him subject to application to the judge.

52,852. But as regards the actual amount of work at a normal time when there is no special pressure or special lightness of work, have your clerks anything like a full day's work on the registry work?—Not at all times.

52,853. Do they do any other work as well?—They do, outside their office hours.

52,854. Is that work in your office or other work?—One of the clerks does some of the work in my own office. One of the other clerks is engaged as secretary to the archdeacon. Others do general clerical employment that can be obtained outside out of office hours.

52,855. Could the work of your office in the probate registry be done by less than three clerks?—At times it would be a very great strain to do it with only two clerks. The clerks constantly now work on the duties of the registry beyond the official hours, particularly on market days when the people, both solicitors and applicants making personal applications, attend the markets; the market day is a day on which there is greater pressure of work.

52,856. (Mr. Coward.) That is one day in the week, is it not?—Yes.

52,857. (Chairman.) (To Mr. Shadwell.) At Bodmin you have four clerks?—I have.

52,858. Does the work there occupy anything like their whole time?—On an average certainly, yes. I had three clerks when I was first appointed, and the work increased so much that it became necessary to provide for it by an extra clerk. I will not say that the existing staff could not do more work than they do now, but at times the pressure is quite severe.

52,859. You have an average of about three grants per working day?—Yes, not quite that.

52,860. Between two and three?—I should not ask for any increase of staff until I exceeded that average; there is a margin, of course.

52,861. I find it somewhat difficult to understand how it can be that the work connected with that number of grants, and such other work as there is—searches, advice to the public, and so forth—can occupy anything like the whole time of the registrar and four clerks. Can you explain to me how it does?—There is a great deal to do in connection with all those operations which requires a great deal of care. It cannot be done in a slovenly manner. There are constant interruptions, and during the busy months of the year it is difficult to keep the work free from arrears as regards the registering of and copying wills into books and so on.

52,862. Is it the copying of wills which occupies so much time?—That is part of it.

52,863. The whole of the copying is done by the clerks?—Yes. There is an additional copying clerk employed by piece-work, and paid when he attends, and not when he does not. He comes when he is wanted.

52,864. Is your copying done in hand-writing or typing?—Entirely in writing.

52,865. Including the copy which is sent up to the Principal Registry?—Including that.

52,866. Have you ever considered the use of type-writing?—I have, and I mentioned the subject at the Principal Registry, and I was told that formal application would not be entertained.

52,867. Did you understand on what grounds?—I did not.

52,868. Are you aware that the registered copies of wills proved at the Principal Probate Registry are type-written?—I am fully aware of that, and it was on that ground that I made the suggestion, which I thought at that time would have lightened the work when we were working with a staff of three clerks.

52,869. (To Mr. Simpson.) At York the staff consists of seven clerks?—Six clerks and one copying clerk.

52,870. Do you find your staff is fully employed?—May I speak of Lincoln, where I had three clerks and an average of nearly 600 grants. There I found that the clerks were thoroughly well occupied the whole day. Now at York my two senior clerks (the oldest of whom is 78 and very deaf, and the second one has lost the sight of one eye and is a very nervous man) do not pull their weight in the boat, and I think that if I could pension those two men off I could do with a clerk less. I have only been there a year, and that is my impression at present. But at the same time I find at York that the men are working overtime very often. I sometimes stay myself, perhaps until 5 o'clock, and I find one or two men are almost always there finishing up their work.

52,871. (Mr. Coward.) Do they get paid for that overtime?—No, they do not get paid overtime.

52,872. (Chairman.) Looking back to your experience at the Principal Registry, do you consider that your clerks have, on the average, as full a day's work as a clerk in the Principal Probate Registry?—Yes, I do.

52,873. The answer you gave just now suggests another question. Should you say that the absence of any system of pensions creates inconvenience owing to the difficulty of retiring men who are, through age or infirmity, becoming past their work?—A very great inconvenience at York in my experience, because I have to keep those two men nominally responsible for important work, and I really employ a junior clerk—a fourth clerk—to nurse them through their work as it were. If a solicitor comes in and speaks to a man who is stone deaf, I have to have the other clerk there to help him through, and I do not think it is right for the senior man or the junior man.

52,874. (Mr. Coward.) Could not you put him to some other employment in which it would not be necessary for him to have to talk to others?—But he would still have to receive his pay of 275*l.* a year.

52,875. (Chairman.) (To Mr. Alms.) Have you a staff of clerks in your private office?—I have.

52,876. How do you deal with the similar difficulty which must sometimes arise there. Have you any system of pension for your clerks?—I have not.

52,877. What do you do in your own office when a clerk grows old and is somewhat past his work?—I am afraid I have not experienced that yet.

52,878. The case has not arisen?—The case has not arisen.

52,879. What do your professional colleagues do? I understand that amongst solicitors' clerks generally there is no general system of pensions?—That is so.

52,880. How do solicitors deal with the question, which must arise frequently, when one of their clerks grows old and somewhat past his work?—They pay him a pension then. I know the case of a friend of mine who had a clerk for very many years, and when he got old and past his work he pensioned him.

52,881. In your experience does it frequently occur that solicitors pension their old clerks?—I think with an old servant who has served faithfully and well for many years it is the practice of members of my profession to look after him in his old age. There is a Provident Clerks Association which I always endeavour to get my clerks to become members of, and a Benevolent Association, but there is no system or source of providing them with pensions.

52,882. Do you know whether any provident fund or contributory system of pensions has ever been considered for the clerks of district probate registries?—I am not aware of any.

52,883. In the case of Local Government bodies, do such systems exist—take the clerks in the Poor Law administration, for instance?—I have not gone into that.

52,884. You are not familiar with that?—I am not.

52,885. But the contributory system exists in many private organisations, such as large railways?—It does.

52,886. What would you say to a suggestion that a contributory system might be instituted for the probate registry clerks?—I think their salaries would have to be raised to do that. Of course, it is inculcating habits of thrift, but to require them to pay what would be a considerable sum annually towards the benefit fund out of their comparatively small income at the present time would, I think, be a great hardship upon them.

52,887. The salaries at the present time have been fixed on the basis of a non-pensionable service?—Yes, they have.

52,888. So that, prima facie, it would not appear unreasonable that, if a pensionable system was added, there should be some adjustment of salaries either by a contribution or otherwise?—It may be so.

52,889. Do you suggest that the salaries are fixed at so low a level that it would not be equitable to require a contribution in respect of the pensions?—I certainly do think so with regard to the salaries paid to the clerks in my own office.

52,890. How do those salaries compare with the salaries of clerks in your own employment or in the employment of other solicitors?—They are lower—considerably lower.

52,891. Would you say that they are lower for corresponding work?—Yes, unquestionably.

52,892. Do you apply that to the salaries generally in the district probate registries?—(Mr. Simpson.) Shall I answer, as I have rather a higher scale of salaries? I was asking one of my clerks who was in a solicitor's office about this, anticipating some sort of question like this, and he said when he came in he made a sacrifice. He was getting, I think, 35*s.* a week, and he sacrificed it for 30*s.* because he thought that the higher salaries later on in life would compensate him for it. The highest salary in my registry is 275*l.* a year.

52,893. That is to say, he accepted a lower salary at the moment because of the prospect of the higher salary later?—Yes; and afterwards, as a matter of fact, he got a better offer still, but he stuck on—I suppose he liked the work. That was how he explained it.

52,894. From what class are the clerks in the district probate registries recruited generally?—Chiefly from the solicitor's clerk class.

52,895. That would seem to show, would it not, that they think the prospect in the probate registry is better than in the office where they are, if they accept appointments in the probate registry?—Yes. (Mr. Shadwell.) They are less likely to lose their employment. (Mr. Alms.) The point is, that the junior clerks are usually, I believe, appointed at an early age, and in some cases the salaries offered by the district probate registrars exceeds the salary which that junior is getting in a solicitor's office, and that is an inducement to him—perhaps not a very far-sighted one, except so far as Mr. Simpson has stated with regard to the ultimate salaries; but it is an inducement to him to get a rise, which is naturally in his mind.

52,896. The case which Mr. Simpson stated was rather the converse of that—the case of a man accepting an immediate fall in salary with a prospect of an ulterior rise?—Yes. That clerk was getting 35*s.* a week. (Mr. Simpson.) My clerk accepted a lower salary because he thought he would do better later on in life. (Mr. Alms.) At what age was he appointed? With 35*s.* a week, unless he was a very competent clerk, it could not have been the instance of a very junior clerk. He was probably over 25 years of age when appointed. (Mr. Simpson.) 24.

52,897. What is the total number of grants made through district registries?—(Mr. Simpson.) In 1913 it was 34,489.

52,898. Is that an increasing amount?—It is very steady in number, I think; one year it is a little up, and another year a little down.

52,899. That is not very far different in amount from the total number of grants made through the Principal Registry?—It is about half and half, I think.

52,900. Is the number in the Principal Registry increasing?—The number is increasing in the Principal Registry.

52,901. Is the increase more rapid in the Principal Registry than in the district registries?—The figure for the district registries has risen from 1859, when it was 26,000, to 34,000 in 1913; but I have not the figures for the Principal Registry. I have only the figures for 1912–1913 for the Principal Registry.

52,902. Have you any observations to make on the subject of the fees charged in the district registries and in the Principal Registry?—In the district registries it is more expensive to take out a grant than it is in the Principal Registry, which is prejudicial to the number of grants passed in district registries.

52,903. You represent that that encourages the public, or the profession, to take out grants in the Principal Registry rather than in the district registries?—Yes. I have had it said to me by a solicitor, a personal friend, who used to send all his work to London: "I cannot advise my clients to send their grants to you because you charge me more than they do in London." (Mr. Alms.) That is a very general ground of objection in my district. Solicitors whom I have asked to send their papers through the district registry, give precisely the same answer. They have said: "If I practise in the district registry I have to pay more fees than I do if I send my papers to London." That is considered by our association as being undesirable. We say that there ought to be a uniform scale of fees in the district registries and in the Principal Registry.

52,904. It would be outside the scope of our reference to go in detail into the question of fees, but we will take note of your representation that that militates against the business of the district registries as compared with the Principal Registry. Has that scale been in force for long?—(Mr. Shadwell.) Since the beginning, 1857 or 1858.

52,905. Would it be correct to say that the additional charge represents certain additional work which has to be done when a grant passes through a district registry?—It represents the communication with the Principal Registry and the supplying of copies.

52,906. And the additional copy of the will which has to be recorded in the Principal Registry?—Yes, and of the record.

52,907. (Mr. Coward.) The difference in fees must be a very small matter?—(Mr. Simpson.) I sent to the Commission 25 copies of the Report we made, which gives the fees. (Mr. Shadwell.) Our submission is that these are all fees charged in the general public interest. It is for the advantage of the country, as a whole, that there should be copies of every will, and record of every grant made, filed in the Principal Registry. It is of no individual advantage to the applicant at a district registry, and, therefore, it is unjust that he should bear the cost of doing what is to him of no benefit.

52,908. (Chairman.) (To Mr. Shadwell.) Do you consider that the present arrangement and organisation of the district registries is the best for the public convenience?—I think it is a very great convenience for persons living in the districts to be able to deal with the district registrar.

52,909. It has been suggested to the Commission that the district registries at present are situated in many cases at places which once had an ecclesiastical importance, but which do not coincide at present in any way with the centres of population, and are not necessarily the most convenient for railway and other communication, and that some readjustment ought to take place, including probably a diminution in the total number of district registries. You are perhaps aware that as long ago as 1874 suggestions of that kind were made by the Commission on the Legal Departments. Are you prepared to express an opinion with regard to those suggestions?—I could only express the opinion generally that if the registries were now to be established for the first time, many of them would be located at quite different places to what they are now, having regard to what you have said; but whether it would be a prudent step to transfer the whole registries, as they now stand, from one town to another is a matter which, I think, hardly comes within our consideration.

52,910. From your point of view, do you see any great difficulties that would arise in carrying out such a suggestion?—No, except that there might be a great deal to be said for increasing the number of registries, in order to bring nearer to the people in different parts of the country the facilities which those registries are designed to afford; but that is rather a matter of general policy than one which affects the existing registrars. (Mr. Alms.) I take it that the district probate registries were originally established in order to afford convenience to the public living in the various counties, and opportunities for passing their probate papers through the local probate court. The question of personal applications becomes involved considerably with this question, because personal applications as a rule are made by people who are in poor circumstances, and therefore cannot afford to travel long distances. I quite see the point you raise that possibly the centres of the old Ecclesiastical Courts may in some instances not be the most convenient centres at the present day. In my own county there are two district registries, one at Wells and the other at Taunton. Looking at the map you might think that one of those might be dispensed with and the other retained. I do not suggest which should be retained (probably because I occupy one of them), but if I did not occupy one, probably what I am going to say will explain it. Wells is a centre for the eastern part of the county. It is a large county. Wells is very inaccessible by train. It has a very poor train service indeed. It is extremely difficult to get to Wells and back again in a day from almost any part of the county, but, at the same time, it is a centre and a large centre for such people as I described, who come with personal applications. Small railway lines run in from the localities of Wells, and it affords them opportunities of going to the district registry there. On the other hand, Taunton is a large railway centre with five or six lines all converging there, and it is on the main line; and that is convenient, at any rate, for the western end of the county.

52,911. Taking the case of Wells, would not the whole district served by Wells be more conveniently served by Bristol, for instance?—It would be a very long way, and a very difficult business to bring such people as I have described who make personal applications from the eastern part of the county, and from Wells all the way up to Bristol. It would involve a very considerable expense to them to bring them to Bristol.

52,912. Is not the case of people residing at some distance from the registry met to some extent by the power of sending papers for a grant through the Inland Revenue officer?—They do not appear to take much advantage of it in my part of the country. The Inland Revenue officer is not trained to this work; he sends the instructions to the district registry, and it frequently involves delay and correspondence explaining to the Inland Revenue officer what is further required in order to provide the necessary information.

52,913. (Mr. Boutwood.) Can the Inland Revenue officer deal effectively with the personal applications?—Himself? No; I should say not. I am afraid the idea of some of the members of the Commission in regard to personal applications is that they are necessarily extremely simple matters. In a number of instances they may be so; but, on the other hand, in my experience they involve far more intricate points than do the well-prepared wills drawn up by the legal profession. A great number of the wills that are brought in on personal applications are home-made wills prepared, say, by the village blacksmith, and the man who operates in a small locality as the lawyer. In a large number of cases they involve points which require the greatest care and knowledge as to the title of the grant and the validity of the will. Questions more frequently arise on personal applications than upon any other.

52,915. Whether it has two witnesses?—Or the non-appointment of executors. Then the Inland Revenue officer will have to follow very involved questions as to the chain of executorship, and so forth. They are extremely involved questions and give us more consideration and more trouble than any other question that arises in our courts. I do not think it is possible for an Inland Revenue officer, not trained to probate work, to undertake the passing of grants off his own bat, so to speak.

52,916. (Chairman.) But I understand that the Inland Revenue officer does not in any way pass grants; he passes them on, which is quite a different thing?—He passes them on; but I understood the question put to me by a Commissioner to be whether the Inland Revenue officer was capable of dealing entirely with personal applications.

52,917. (Mr. Boutwood.) No; I put the question to bring out yes or no to this point: The question was raised about the number of probate registries, and the suggestion was made that the existence of the Inland Revenue officer with his new powers would make up for the absence of a local registrar. I wondered how far that was true—how far the Inland Revenue officer would be a real substitute, or could be a real substitute, for the district registrar?—From his want of special training I should think that he would not be by any means capable of dealing with the many questions which arise on the presentation of papers leading to a grant.

52,918. (Chairman.) In the Judicial Statistics I see that the personal applications direct to a registry numbered 6,762 in the year 1913, whereas personal applications through the Inland Revenue officers amounted to 4,955. That is to say, a very substantial number—not so very far short of the number made direct—were made through Inland Revenue officers. I see also that at Bodmin the number of grants made through an Inland Revenue officer was nearly three times as great as the number made direct to the registry. At York the number was twice as great and at Taunton it was smaller. At Bodmin and York, where the number of personal applications made through Inland Revenue officers is very much larger than the number made direct, do you find that inconvenience arises from that method of receiving personal applications?—(Mr. Shadwell.) It involves a great deal more correspondence and instructions, and so forth. Personally, in consideration of the inconvenience of reaching Bodmin from other parts of the county, I am constantly recommending persons who apply by letter to know whether they can come to the registry to make their applications through the Revenue officer in order to save them the lengthy journey and inconvenience of waiting. It is a most inconvenient county to travel in. That accounts partly for the number that come in that way. They involve more trouble at the registry.

52,919. But, still, the system works satisfactorily?—The system works because I encourage it.

52,920. What is the case at York?—(Mr. Simpson.) The reason of the number that I have in my district is that I have in my district Hull and Middlesbrough, with a very large number of poor people, and therefore the bulk of those applications come from those two places. I invariably, if a person writes from anywhere near an Inland Revenue officer, say: "Take the papers to the Inland Revenue officer if the estate is under £500, and he will forward the papers to me." He is only an intermediary.

52,921. Quite so. He is a post office?—He never looks at the will, or whatever he sends up, to see if it is executed properly, or anything else; he merely sends it to me, and I draw the papers—the oath—not the Inland Revenue affidavit, which he draws.

52,922. Do you find that that system gives you a great deal more trouble than the personal applications direct?—The trouble is much the same. I am rather more anxious about those cases, because the Inland Revenue officer is not responsible at all. I always take particular interest in those cases, to see that they are all right. If something arises which I think the Inland Revenue officer can deal with, I send him very careful instructions. Of course, the officer at Hull is probably a man of very considerable education, receiving a large salary; and I do, when I am writing to him, give him a rather more free hand than I should give to a smaller man who has not, perhaps, the same experience. I think it is most convenient.

52,923. Turning to the main question with which we are dealing, if such local registries as were retained were placed at the great centres of population, instead of as now, sometimes at small places difficult of access, the convenience of the public would be consulted more completely rather than less completely?—Yes.

52,924. So far as any persons who have facile access now had less facile access under a revised system, their convenience would still be met by the system of applications through Inland Revenue officers?—I do not think the solicitors would say so. Supposing you moved my registry from York to Hull, I think the convenience of the solicitors of York would certainly not be consulted, because they can come in and see me personally about every case. They would suffer considerably. Of course, as a matter of fact, Hull is not so convenient as York. York is the centre of the railways.

52,925. Yes; York is not one of the cases where the registry is placed away from the centre of population and centre of communication?—No.

52,926. But in the cases where the registry at present is away from good communications and away from the large population, do you see any inconvenience in moving it to a place where there are better communications and a larger population?—I think ultimately it is more convenient. There are a larger number of solicitors in Hull than in York.

52,927. The question has also been raised of the amalgamation of probate registries, where they exist, with the district registries of the High Court, or with both, the district registries of the County Court, or with both. Are you prepared to express an opinion on that suggestion?—My opinion is that the person who is appointed to the probate registry should be a man who thoroughly knows the probate work. No doubt it is the same with the County Court registrar. I could not take on the County Court registrar's work at York, and I do not know that the County Court registrar could take on my work. He has probably had no special training, no more training than any other solicitor, in probate work, so that another solicitor in York going to him for information would not necessarily get any more than he could give himself.

52,928. May we take it as your opinion that the persons most suited for district probate registrars are the clerks in the Principal Probate Registry who have had experience of probate work?—Yes, undoubtedly.

52,929. Do you all agree in that?—(Mr. Alms.) I do not deny that the clerks in the Principal Probate Registry are certainly well qualified for the appointment of district probate registrar.

52,930. Do you consider that they are the persons best qualified?—Now you are putting me perhaps in rather a difficult position, because I happen to be a solicitor registrar. I should say, on principle, they certainly ought to be best qualified by reason of their special training.

52,931. Their training in the Principal Probate Registry would not in itself qualify them for the work of a County Court registrar or a High Court registrar?—No, it would not. I think the suggested amalgamation would not tend to efficiency.

52,932. I gather that your opinion is generally against such amalgamation?—Against it, particularly as the scope of County Court jurisdiction has increased, is constantly increasing, and is likely to increase, and that would entail heavier duties upon the County Court registrar which would leave still less time for district probate work.

52,933. Another suggestion which has been made to the Commission as tending to the convenience of the public generally, is, that all geographical limits for grants of probate or administration should be abolished; that district registries should still exist, but that any person wishing to make application for a grant should be perfectly free to make it at whatever district registry he liked, or at the Principal Registry?—In my experience I think that is a very good suggestion. There is excellent communication from East Devon and North Devon with Taunton, but because they happen to be over the border in another county they are precluded from bringing their papers to Taunton.

52,934. (Mr. Coward.) The limit is ridiculous, is it not?—I am inclined to think it is. A person might be very near the border and he might have to travel many more miles to his own registry than to the registry of the adjoining county.

52,935. (Chairman.) The case was put to us of a man whose business was in Manchester, but who resided across the river in Cheshire. In that case if he wished to apply for a grant at the local registry he would have to go to Chester, whereas his business and his man of business would be probably in Manchester. It was suggested that inconvenience of that kind would be removed by allowing the applicant to make his application wherever he preferred?—Yes.

52,936. (To Mr. Simpson.) What do you say to that?—I agree. (Mr. Shadwell.) And I agree.

52,937. If there was perfect freedom of application, do you think that that would tend to increase the business of district registries or to increase the business at the Principal Registry?—(Mr. Shadwell.) To increase the business at the district registries. (Mr. Alms.) I think it would. It would give facilities to the people.

52,938. What is the position at present as regards applications by post—by correspondence?—(Mr. Alms.) I receive a large number—the majority—of applications from solicitors in my registry through the post.

52,939. Are you aware what the practice of the Principal Registry is in that respect?—(Mr. Simpson.) They will not receive them at all through the post.

52,940. They do not receive applications at all by post?—No, everything must be done by the solicitor or the applicant.

52,941. It is the practice at district registries to receive applications by post?—(Mr. Alms.) Yes.

52,942. Does the registrar in those cases charge certain fees for his services in dealing with the application?—(Mr. Simpson.) Yes. (Mr. Shadwell.) Yes. (Mr. Alms.) For the correspondence and assistance that he gives to solicitors who are practising in his registry he makes a small charge.

52,943. It has been suggested to the Commission that that system is undesirable on various grounds.

21 April 1915.] Mr. EDWARD ALMS, Mr. W. H. L. SHADWELL, and Mr. GORDON SIMPSON.

Have you any observations on that point?—(Mr. Shadwell.) May I ask whether it is considered undesirable that the business should be conducted by correspondence or that a charge should be made for the correspondence?

52,944. The suggestion, as I understand it, is, that it is undesirable that the registrar should have a pecuniary interest in certain forms of grant, and also the suggestion has, I believe, been made on behalf of the profession that the registrar, by taking fees for work of this kind, is doing solicitor's work, which he is not entitled to do?—There is more than one objection.

52,945. Will you take them separately?—The first is that it is undesirable that a registrar should receive pecuniary interest. May I understand to whom it is undesirable? It can hardly be said to be undesirable from the point of view of solicitors, because they resort to the practice very largely and find it most convenient. The objection cannot come from the solicitors who follow the practice.

52,946. Although it has not been given in evidence my attention has been called to a report of the Law Society, in which objection is taken to it on behalf of the profession?—Yes, that is to say, by the Incorporated Law Society of London, the members of which consider that they are losing fees which might come to them.

52,947. (Mr. Coward.) The Law Society does not consist only of London men?—No, but I thought the action taken in this matter was on behalf of those who resided in London and who practised in London.

52,948. Certainly not; they are represented on the council by members from all parts of the kingdom, or rather England and Wales?—(Mr. Alms.) May I say how I think this question has arisen? I happen to be a solicitor as well as district registrar, and therefore, perhaps, I can look into it and take it more or less from an impartial point of view. I have before me the annual report of the Council of the Law Society of July last, and on page 106 it says: "At a meeting of the Council held on the 28th November 1913, a letter was read from the secretary to the Wakefield Incorporated Law Society, stating that the office of registrar of the Wakefield Probate Registry was vacant," and pointing out the principle you are dealing with now, namely, that a registrar receives certain fees for assisting the solicitors in his district; and the solicitors in the Wakefield Law Society deemed it was undesirable, and they got the Law Society to move in the matter in their report. I can quite conceive, and I think it is quite clear to the members of my profession, how that has arisen. In Wakefield there is a district probate registry. It is a large town, and there are a considerable number of solicitors there. There is also a very large area outside in which solicitors practise, and they practise through the district registry and send their papers to the registry, and are willing to pay the small fee the registrar charges for assisting them in the preparation of their papers. The solicitors residing in Wakefield itself are very dissatisfied, because, if that practice did not exist, they would look to the solicitors residing in the provinces to send their papers to them, and they would present them to the registry and incur what are deemed, and properly deemed, agency fees; that is to say, the dual scale of agency charges, which the provincial solicitor, or his client, would find, as is set forth in the scale the Law Society publishes in its report dealing with this particular matter, from twice to three times and sometimes four times as much as he would pay to the probate registrar for the small fee that he charges. The same principle was involved when the Law Society itself in 1883, I think, took action against the big law stationers, Waterlow and Sons, who adopted the principle of receiving papers from provincial solicitors, engrossing the will, preparing the papers, or giving them certain assistance, and presenting the papers at Somerset House. The Law Society took proceedings against them to endeavour to prevent them doing that. The Law Society was unsuccessful. At the present time Waterlow and Sons, and quite a number of other law stationers in London, are in very close competition with each other in order to obtain the business of the country solicitors and present their papers to Somerset House. That in itself has tended very much against the members of my profession in London, who, prior to that, received the papers from the solicitors in the provinces and made their legal charges to them, proper legal charges, but which amounted to considerably more than the solicitors pay the law stationers in London. I think that is the nut which the Law Society are endeavouring to crack. Very rightly, the Law Society are endeavouring to protect the interests of the profession.

52,949. That is hardly the point, is it. Here is a public servant who is a probate registrar, and he receives money from the public for doing work. The suggestion is that that is not desirable. I do not know that the Law Society, or any other society, has anything to do with this?—(Mr. Shadwell.) Of course, to understand that properly one must understand what the principle of the registry is. The principle of the district registries on their foundation was supposed to be the same as that of the Principal Registry; that is to say, the work is done entirely on personal delivery of papers; there is no such thing as correspondence at all. That system does work in London, because the solicitors' firms are all resident in London, or are acting as agents for those residing in the country.

52,950. No, indeed, not if you think of it. Forgive me for interrupting you. I do not think it bears it out. For instance, take London, and supposing somebody resides at Reading or Brighton, what is he to do? He comes up or sends up to London. If he is at Brighton he might go to Lewes, it is true, but it is not likely; he would come to London. And, similarly, if at Reading, he would come to London; he would not go to Oxford. He will either have to come up to London or communicate with somebody in London. It is exactly the same thing, as far as I can see, with regard to the district registries?—The principle being that all applications are to be made by personal delivery and personal attendance and not by correspondence, the same principle was observed at the district registries. Then it was found to be inconvenient for the solicitors coming from different parts of the country to have to come up to the registry town to present papers, and it was suggested that they should be allowed to send their papers by post. That was not according to the rules of the court, and therefore it could only be done by consent of the registrar. The registrar in consenting to receive applications by post required to be remunerated for his services which were outside what he had undertaken to do. Any district registrar is entitled to say that he will not conduct correspondence, and that he will require every application to be made by personal attendance.

52,951. (Chairman.) Your suggestion is that this system was introduced for the convenience of the profession and the public, and is an addition to the duties for which district probate registrars were and are still appointed?—That is so.

52,952. And you represent that it is a matter of public convenience that this system should continue?—Undoubtedly.

52,953. If the probate registries, including the Principal Probate Registry, were thrown open to applications by correspondence, then it would become part of the duties of probate registrars to receive applications in that way?—It would.

52,954. This question has been raised at intervals for a long time, has it not?—It has.

52,955. On one of those occasions did the Treasury lay down that if at any future time applications by correspondence were introduced, the registrars would have no claim for compensation for the abolition of fees for such work?—I do not think that that is quite the construction which the Treasury intended should be put upon their minute. The statement to which you are referring is contained in the Treasury Minute of 16 March 1861, when salaries for the district registrars were fixed. The words used in the Treasury Minute are: "Although their Lordships are of opinion that it is not desirable that the district registrars should derive any profit from acting as agents for professional men in matters connected in any way with the business of their registries." This is not a question of acting as agent for professional men; it is a question only of correspondence with them, and receiving papers by correspondence instead of direct.

52,956. Was not it this system that the Treasury referred to in speaking of "profits from acting as agents for professional men"?—Yes; but I think they misunderstood the system, or at any rate it was misrepresented in this minute, and that they would not have used those words if they knew the system as it now exists.

52,957. But, in fact, in using those words they refer to the system as it exists?—They refer to the system as they understood it, but not as it is. In going on they say: "In fixing the salaries to be henceforth received" by district registrars, they desire it should be fully understood that if Parliament should hereafter decide "to restrict or altogether prohibit the business of the district registries in this respect, the registrar shall have no claim to increase of salary or compensation for the profits of which they may be thereby deprived." That, I take it, referred only to district registrars whose salaries were those fixed by that minute. "If they should decide to restrict or altogether prohibit the business," not if they should impose the same duty upon them without further salary.

52,958. You suggest that if a further duty was imposed upon them in that respect they would have some claim to reconsideration of the salaries?—I should say so.

52,959. The question has been raised as to whether this system is permissible, having regard to Rule 5 of the Rules and Orders of 1863?—I do not think that has any reference to the practice of a public officer.

52,960. The terms of that rule are as follows: "No district registrar or clerk in a district registry shall directly or indirectly transact business for himself or as the proctor or solicitor of any other person in the district registry to which he has been appointed"?—He never does. This correspondence is not acting as a solicitor.

52,961. Your view is that it does not constitute action as proctor or solicitor?—Clearly not. (Mr. Alms.) Nor, may I say, as an agent. If you come to define the word "agent" he is not acting as the agent, particularly in the sense that the London solicitor acts as agent for the country solicitor in presenting papers where he makes a dual scale of charge, presents the papers, and performs the duty of presenting those papers completed. This is a mere act of assistance and guidance on certain questions raised.

52,962. (Mr. Coward.) Is not that what a London agent does?—Not in the matter of presenting papers to Somerset House, no. (Mr. Shadwell.) It is in fact doing by letter what would be done by word of mouth. If the solicitor instead of sending his papers by post delivers them in person, the errors in them are pointed out to him by the registrar verbally. (Mr. Alms.) And you would not call the registrar the agent of the provincial solicitor if the provincial solicitor attended personally at his office.

52,963. (Chairman.) You told us that if this was not done by the registrar—taking the case of Wakefield, for instance—a Wakefield solicitor would have to present the papers?—(Mr. Alms.) He would hope to; but my experience as a solicitor is that the provincial solicitors would not employ the Wakefield town solicitor, because they have a very reasonable objection to the business of their respective clients being known to solicitors in the same locality. That is a very strong objection indeed.

52,964. You mean they would go to the Principal Registry?—They would probably send to the law stationer in London, who does it for a very small fee indeed; that is to say, the papers must all be in order and sworn, and if any questions on points of practice and so on arise they would probably send them to a solicitor in London.

52,965. But supposing a man wished to take out the grant in Wakefield and employed a Wakefield solicitor to present the papers, would what the Wakefield solicitor would do for him differ materially from what the registrar does for him under the present system?—(Mr. Shadwell.) Entirely.

52,966. In what respects?—What the Wakefield solicitor would do would be merely to bring the papers to the registrar and receive from the registrar the information which would otherwise be given direct by letter to the original solicitor, and the Wakefield solicitor would have done nothing but act as agent in the delivery of the papers.

52,967. (Mr. Coward.) The registrar would then get no fee and the solicitor would?—That is so. The original solicitor would have gained nothing.

52,968. (Mr. Boutwood.) So what is done by correspondence does not go beyond what in other cases is done verbally?—That is so.

52,969. It is a mere substitute?—That is all.

52,970. It does not go beyond that?—It does not go beyond that. (Mr. Alms.) May I say that one great advantage which it gives to solicitors is expedition, and that they are essentially desirous of securing. If papers were sent to London that expedition would not exist; delay would be incurred; and if the papers completed and sworn were incorrect in any respect, they would be returned from Somerset House, and there would be further delay, much to the annoyance of the country practitioner.

52,971. (Chairman.) In many of the district registries there are a large number of ancient wills preserved?—(Mr. Simpson.) There are.

52,972. Are the arrangements for the custody of those wills and their protection against loss by fire adequate and satisfactory?—In Lincoln and York I had very good strong rooms, and I have mechanical means for putting out fires, and buckets of water; in fact I think the arrangements are as good as in London.

52,973. Are there ancient wills at Taunton and Bodmin?—(Mr. Shadwell.) At Bodmin there are, and since I have been registrar the Office of Works have paid attention to the condition of the strong room, and have made a new roof in reinforced concrete. (Mr. Alms.) At Taunton we also have a considerable number of ancient records, and I also drew the attention, shortly after I was appointed, of the representative of the Office of Works to the strong room existing there, and asked him whether, in his opinion, it was secure against fire. Certain alterations were made, and also there was the provision of certain extinguishing appliances. With reference to the documents themselves, I may say that I receive very great assistance from Mr. Fry, of the National Record Society. I think Somerset was one of the first counties to which the society sent its representatives. The ancient records are very ancient, as you are aware, and have to be preserved very carefully. The paper is very brittle, and I myself had them placed in cases before Mr. Fry came, and since then, on Mr. Fry's recommendation and with the assistance of the National Record Society, they have been bound in more secure cases, and in every way are preserved in their present state and condition in a manner which I think would meet with the approval of everybody.

52,974. Do you consider that it is for the public convenience that these ancient records should be preserved locally rather than at a central office?—(Mr. Shadwell.) Certainly. (Mr. Alms.) I do, certainly. We are constantly having local references to ancient documents. The representatives of the local archaeological society are constantly making references to these old documents and ancient wills where names occur. I think it would be a very great inconvenience indeed if documents were moved from the local centre.

52,975. (To Mr. Simpson.) You wish to call attention to a statement by Mr. Musgrave in his evidence, that a district registrar, as such, is not qualified for appointment as registrar in the Principal Probate Registry. Do you wish to make any correction of that statement?—District registrars are qualified to become registrars of the Principal Registry, as such, under Section 8 of the Court of Probate Act, 1858.

52,976. That is to say, they are not qualified "as such," but are qualified if they have previously served for five years in the Principal Registry?—Yes; barristers and solicitors would be qualified as barristers or solicitors.

52,977. Yes; but in neither case does the qualification arise from the fact that they are registrars, but from the fact that they have served five years in the Principal Registry; and in the other case that they have all qualified as barristers or solicitors?—Yes. (Mr. Shadwell.) I would refer to question 46,532: "Clerks to the district registries are really private clerks of registrars paid out of public money?" And Mr. Musgrave said, "Yes, they are paid out of public money." Whether he meant "yes" to apply only to the statement that they are paid out of public money does not appear. If it is understood that it means "Yes, they are private clerks to the registrars," then I should say that his answer was distinctly not in accordance with the facts. They are public clerks and not private clerks.

52,978. You represent that they are public clerks?—Yes, and in no sense private clerks of registrars.

52,979. They are, as a matter of fact, appointed by the district registrar with the approval of the President?—Yes, and under protest, as they have no power to do it.

52,980. (Mr. Boutwood.) With reference to the suggestion about a contributory scheme of pensions, one of you said that the salaries paid to the registrars' clerks would not permit of deduction towards a contributory scheme. As, perhaps, you are aware, there is a very large contributory scheme in connection with the railways, and I think I am right in saying that the general range of salaries in, say, the Railway Clearing House, is appreciably lower than the scale of salaries to the district probate registry clerks. Of course, nobody thinks his salary can bear any deduction—that is the general proposition—but it only occurred to me whether you had taken facts like that into full consideration when you gave that answer—that we have contributory schemes in this country for pensions where scales of salary are not higher, and, probably, are appreciably lower, than those we are concerned with now?—(Mr. Alms.) Would you consider that the two classes were holding quite the same position?

52,981. That is almost a different point.—It involves the principle of the capability to contribute, does it not?

52,982. With regard to those old documents, are they at all classified or indexed?—Yes, they have been indexed most admirably at Taunton by the National Record Society.

52,983. All over the country?—In Taunton and in certain other counties, because Mr. Fry, who represented the National Society, very kindly made me a present of the index of another county in which I was interested.

52,984. The National Record Society is a private society?—Yes, it is a private society.

52,985. But so far as either the central or local registrars are concerned, they do not do that work?—Not indexing. (Mr. Shadwell.) As a matter of fact, when I went to Bodmin I found the old wills very imperfectly indexed, and very ill-sorted—hundreds and thousands of them out of their places. I went through every document myself, made a complete new index, and put them all in perfect order from the earliest date down to the end of the eighteenth century. (Mr. Simpson.) At Lincoln we did something similar, only I did part of the clerk's work while he did the indexing, because he was an expert; he did it, and I gave him time in that way to do it.

52,986. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) (To Mr. Simpson.) You had experience in the central registry?—Yes.

52,987. And you understood it was the custom in the central registry that no correspondence was dealt with?—No applications for grants by correspondence were dealt with.

52,988. You have had experience of a registry in which correspondence does in fact come in?—Yes.

52,989. Do you think it would be an advantage to the public if a custom were adopted in the central registry of correspondence being answered and allowed in that way?—Yes, I think it would. It is not quite to the same extent, because the London solicitors are all round there

52,990. Supposing the Government should agree to that principle, and should direct that letters, with regard to probate, received at the Principal Registry, shall be answered, do you conceive that any clerk in that registry would have any claim for compensation on any other ground than that it was impossible for him in his working hours to do the work? Could the clerks ask for extra payment on any other ground than that it was impossible for them to answer the letters during their official hours?—That would be the only ground.

52,991. Supposing the same thing happened with regard to the provincial district registrars, that you were directed to answer letters; again, would there be any claim for compensation on any other ground than that the answers could not be written during your official day?—Compensation would be required because we lose the pay which, when we accepted the registry, we expected to get.

52,992. The Government say that you are directed, as part of your official duties, to answer certain letters?—Yes.

52,993. And the same direction is sent both to Somerset House and to the district registries. You say that in Somerset House the only claim for extra payment could be, that it was impossible to answer the letters in official hours. In your case you say there would be a further claim for extra payment?—Yes, because we suffer from loss of the extra fees.

52,994. Do any letters come to you which you do answer, without charging anything, in your district registry work?—All the customs and excise work entails a certain amount of correspondence.

52,995. Do any letters come in from the public which you answer without charging the public?—There are a certain number of letters to the public we charge for. I should not charge for answering the letter of a man who wrote up to know whether he could prove a will—I mean a personal applicant—for answering his letter.

52,996. Then it is a matter of some difficulty to decide whether, with regard to a particular letter, you will charge or not?—I never have experienced any difficulty. I should not charge poor people who wrote to me any fee at all. I charge the solicitors when they send their cases to me.

52,997. You conceive that you would be entitled to charge the poor people a fee, only in your kindness you do not?—No, I do not think I should.

52,998. Could you give us, in two or three words, a statement of what letters are received from the public, the answering of which is charged for, and what letters the answering of which is not charged for?—The letters I charge for are the letters asking me questions relating to grants—a solicitor sending in papers.

52,999. I am talking of the public?—A solicitor being a member of the public, I charge for all the letters I write to solicitors with reference to their grants, and I charge if a person wishes a search to be made; that is all.

53,000. Then an ordinary member of the public, writing for information about probate, and not through a solicitor, personally, you do not charge?—No.

53,001. Is that the case with regard to Bodmin, for instance?—(Mr. Shadwell.) On the general principle, one considers one answers no letters at all, and if one does, one is entitled to make a charge.

53,002. Then the principle on which you go at Bodmin is not the same principle that is acted upon in York?—I will not say it does not come to very much the same thing in the end, but the principle is that I am entitled to charge for every letter I write or to refuse to answer any letter.

53,003. Is that the principle at Taunton?—(Mr. Alms.) That is the principle at Taunton. I cannot say it has always been acted upon.

53,004. This is of great importance to the public. The principle is that no letter is written from your office without being charged for?—(Mr. Shadwell.) That is the principle, yes. (Mr. Alms.) Yes, that is the principle.

53,005. Is that principle invariably acted upon in your office?—(Mr. Shadwell.) No. (Mr. Alms.) No.

21 April 1915.] Mr. EDWARD ALMS, Mr. W. H. L. SHADWELL, and Mr. GORDON SIMPSON.

53,006. What are the cases in which it is not acted upon?—(Mr. Alms.) In cases of poor people. (Mr. Shadwell.) If a person writes to know whether he can come to the office on such and such a day, being a personal applicant, I should write and say he could or could not, or write telling him to go to the Revenue Office, or something of that kind, without making a charge.

53,007. You conceive that you would be entitled to make a charge in that case?—Certainly.

53,008. But as an act of grace you do not make a charge?—That is so.*

53,009. You have in York a clerk who has the misfortune to be very deaf?—(Mr. Simpson.) Yes.

53,010. What is his age?—78.

53,011. He draws his full salary?—Yes.

53,012. If he had been superannuated he would have drawn something less than his full salary?—He could not be superannuated.

53,013. But if a superannuation scheme had been in existence and he had been superannuated, he would have drawn something less than his full salary?—Yes.

53,014. And if he had been superannuated on the ground of inefficiency he would have drawn something less than that which would come to him as a consequence of superannuation on the mere ground of age?—I think the superannuation is a fixed amount—for so many years' service, one-sixtieth for each year.

53,015. Even although it is an allowance given before the completed period of 40 years or before the age of 60?—Yes.

53,016. If he had been superannuated before the age of 60 on the ground of inefficiency, he would have got less?—He would have got less than the full salary.

53,017. (To Mr. Alms.) What are your official hours at Taunton?—9.30 to 4 o'clock.

53,018. 9.30 to 4 every day. I want you to think of those days in the year when there is practically no probate work to be done. There are such days, are there not?—No matter of extracting a grant.

53,019. Do you on those days require the officials to come perfectly punctually at 9.30 and stay the whole time until 4 o'clock?—Certainly. We never know when a person may walk in with a personal application.

53,020. What in fact on such days do they do from 9.30 to 4 o'clock?—There may be correspondence—there generally is—to answer. Questions of searches for wills are very frequent.

53,021. (Mr. Coward.) Of course the wills are all indexed?—They are indexed, yes, but they have to be replied to and dealt with in some way, and searches made sometimes.

53,022. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) You told us that the National Record Society arranged and paid for the indexing of your wills. Who did that actual indexing?—Mr. Fry.

53,023. Did he have assistance from your clerks?—No, he brought down his own lady assistant with him.

53,024. And your clerks gave him no assistance?—I cannot say they did not assist him. They gave him assistance so far as they were constantly to and fro for him, giving him the necessary documents. A great number of the documents were out of place and so forth.

53,025. Can you say, looking back, say, to the year 1913 or 1914, that during that period no one of your clerks answered a letter on probate business between 9.30 and 4 p.m. for which a charge was afterwards made?—No, I cannot.

53,026. Then between 9.30 and 4 p.m. they do answer letters for which charges are made?—Yes.

53,027. You hold several other offices in Taunton?—I hold two others.

53,028. Can you say that during the last two years no clerk between 9.30 and 4 p.m. has done in your office any work arising from any one of your other offices?—Do you mean during the hours.

53,029. Yes, between 9.30 and 4 p.m.?—Occasionally, when there has been no work there and when there has been something that it has been necessary to do in my own office, I have got a clerk to attend to it, but in no way to detract from his duties in the registry.

53,030. As long as his duties in the registry are adequately performed, do you think yourself free to direct him to do work for which you are paid?—As a rule he has got his duties there which occupy his time. As I say, occasionally it may be he is free.

53,031. (Mr. Coward.) In the case of large estates the probates are usually granted in London and not dealt with in local registries?—I would not say that.

53,032. Would not you say that the greater part of the large estates are dealt with in London?—I do not know whether there is any record of that, but there are quite a number of large estates dealt with in the district registries.

53,033. Then the district registries you would say are not confined to benefiting the poorer classes?—Not entirely.

53,034. Upon the question the Chairman asked you with regard to amalgamation with the district registries of the High Court and whether that would not be practicable?—Are you also including the County Court registries?

53,035. I do not know about the County Court, but the district registries of the High Court?—In the provinces, as I dare say you are aware, at any rate in the smaller districts, the High Court and County Court registries are in the same office.

53,036. I do not care about that, but I am dealing with the High Court. Would there be any difficulty in amalgamating the Probate registries with the High Court registries?—That involves the performance of two duties, the qualifications for which are entirely distinct.

53,037. Quite right. I would suggest to you that you must have, if you are going to do that, some one at the office who understood this class of work?—Unquestionably.

53,038. If you had one person there who understood that class of work, would not you do it perfectly well?—I should say so, if that one person were the responsible head, yes. You must have a responsible head for both duties.

53,039. He need not be the registrar of the court if there is somebody there who understands the work, and how it ought to be done, and what is necessary to be done. That is the question I am putting to you?—If I may say so, I think the registrar of the High Court is responsible for the High Court in that district, and he is held responsible for the duties fulfilled and performed in his office. Similarly, if he undertook the office of district probate registrar, he would be held responsible for that.

53,040. I should like to ask your colleagues the same question—whether that would not be a perfectly feasible way of doing the work that has to be done in the district probate registry?—(Mr. Shadwell.) As I understand it would mean simply this, that there would be a person in the office with the full qualifications now enjoyed by the district registrar, but that he would be called by a different title.

53,041. But he would not have the staff. This title arrangement costs very nearly 45,000*l.* a year?—The cost of maintaining the probate registries, but I do not see how the work which is done by the probate registries could be done otherwise.

53,042. I do not know whether you happen to know a registrar named Mais. We have had him before us?—I know him.

53,043. He does this work, and does the other work, too?—Some of it. There are two registrars, and Mr. Mais attends to the Probate registry, and also to part of the High Court registry.

53,044. Quite right, and he finds no difficulty whatever with it?—No, I do not know why he should.

53,045. I thought it right to ask your view about this?—There is no High Court registry at Bodmin. If there was I am not prepared to say that I could not perform the duties of it; and if the work was not enough with the probate work to require more than my whole time, I could do it.

* So clearly is it established that correspondence forms no part of the duty of the registrars that no right of franking and no allowance for postage is granted to them.—W. H. L. S.

53,046. (Sir John Kempe.) (To Mr. Alms.) Would it be possible for you to give us any idea of the amount of fees that you have taken for your correspondence work outside your official work, so to speak—I mean connected with your official work, but not paid for as official work?—I have not got the account with me, but in my registry, speaking generally—there may be a few pounds one way or the other—I should say last year it was about 75*l*.

53,047. (To Mr. Shadwell.) Could you answer the same question?—At Bodmin it is about 200*l*.

53,048. (To Mr. Simpson.) Could you answer that question?—Do you mean what I myself have, or what the clerks have?

53,049. For correspondence?—The total of the correspondence?

53,050. For extra official work?—About 140*l*.—that is the clerks' and mine.

53,051. (Chairman.) The sums which you mentioned are finally received partly by yourself and partly by your clerks?—(Mr. Shadwell.) Received by ourselves, and some of the amount is allowed to the clerks.

53,052. Corresponding to the amount of work the clerks do in respect of that correspondence?—I should not put it quite in that way, that it corresponds to any work, but I say in consideration of the registrar receiving this extra payment, and in consideration of the insufficient salaries which the clerks receive for their public duties, the registrar is generous enough to make them small allowances by way of increment to their salaries.

53,053. (Sir John Kempe.) When made registrar you undertook not to practise in your own registry. Does that also mean that you do not practise in any other registry?—(Mr. Alms.) I am enabled to practise in the Principal Registry.

53,054. But not in the other district registries?—Yes, I am permitted to practise in any other district except my own. The prohibition extends only to my own district registry; that is to say, I cannot peruse and settle my own papers and pass them and decide upon my own points of practice.

53,055. But is there any practice in other registries, as a rule?—Yes. Occasionally I have had cases that have arisen in other districts, although I must say that those cases I generally send to London, but there is nothing to prevent my taking out a grant in another district registry if the person dies within that district.

53,056. Might not rather awkward positions arise sometimes. I suppose some questions are common to two registries at times, and would not it be awkward to be practising in another registry having regard to the duties in your own registry. Will not the duties clash sometimes?—I do not think so. If I received papers from another solicitor registrar I should deal with them quite as carefully as I should the papers received from another individual.

53,057. As to the qualifications for a probate registrar, I think you are of opinion generally that the qualification of having been a probate registry clerk is the most useful one?—Unquestionably.

53,058. But the qualification of having been a solicitor is also useful?—I think so.

53,059. A clerk in a probate office would have time to study and to pass the solicitors' examination, would he not?—(Mr. Shadwell.) Yes. Clerks who have entered the Probate Registry in London have become qualified as barristers.

53,060. And they also could become qualified as solicitors?—I do not know that they could, because being articulated to a solicitor would interfere with their services in the registry—not otherwise.

53,061. Would not it be a useful thing if the qualification for becoming a registrar could be to have passed the examinations for a solicitor without reference to five years' practice?—I think it would be very difficult to carry that out in practice, because during the time when he was serving his articles and learning the profession of a solicitor he could not be serving in the Principal Registry. I do not think a solicitor who had passed his articles and got his certificate would care to enter as a clerk in the registry after that.

53,062. You mean, it is not merely the examination, but you have to serve your articles as well?—You do.

53,063. But still you might require an examination to be passed to show that you are qualified as far as knowledge goes in certain legal branches such as are required for a solicitor's profession. A probate clerk need not necessarily know anything about solicitor's law, so to speak, but he picks up his knowledge in the probate office, but you say solicitor's knowledge is very useful too. Would not it be a good thing to require a clerk to have passed the solicitor's examination, or something equivalent to it, and then make the probate service of five years equivalent to a solicitor's practice of five years—and make those two interchangeable?—(Mr. Alms.) He could not be admitted a solicitor under such conditions, because the requirements are, first, that he must be articulated and must give his whole time and attention to his employer in his office, and he must not receive a salary or do other work whilst he is under articles.

53,064. Still he might pass an examination equivalent to the solicitor's examination to show that he has the knowledge?—That, of course, might be done.

53,065. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) I understand you to say that if a will requires a grant of probate in your district it is forwarded through you to the Central Office, and you charge fees as a solicitor?—Do you mean send to London? I do not quite follow.

53,066. You said that while you were not allowed to practise as a solicitor in your own registry you are allowed to charge fees for forwarding to London a will to be proved in the Principal Registry?—I am allowed to extract a grant. I thought you meant fees qua registrar.

53,067. No, I mean as a solicitor.—As a solicitor, yes.

53,068. That is to say, if your client chooses to have his will proved in London, then you charge fees as a solicitor?—Yes.

53,069. If your client chooses to have his will proved at the local registry of which you are registrar, you charge no such fees?—No, I could not do it. I would not allow him to do it. I should say "No; you will have to go somewhere else," and if he elected to stand by me, I should say, "I cannot pass your will through the local registry; it must go through London, because I am prohibited from practising in my own registry."

53,070. (To Mr. Shadwell.) Do you sometimes act as a solicitor, sending wills to London to be proved there, and charging as a solicitor?—I am not a solicitor and cannot act as one.

53,071. That point would only arise when the registrar is also a solicitor?—(Mr. Alms.) Yes.

53,072. Do you think that it is an entirely satisfactory arrangement?—That I am able to take out a grant in London?

53,073. The fact that there is a choice in the mind of your client whether he will prove his will locally, in which case he gets your services for nothing?—No, he would not get them at all. I am precluded from practising in my registry.

53,074. He could take them to you personally, in which case you would be able to charge him nothing?—That is a personal application; I am afraid it is rather a supposititious case, because as a rule they place confidence in their solicitors, and they do not mind from what registry it is extracted so long as they get the grant of probate.

Mr. A. E. DAVIS (Chief Clerk, District Probate Registry, Durham), accompanied by Mr. J. E. LISTER (Liverpool) and Mr. R. W. JONES (Chester), representing the District Probate Registry Clerks Association, called and examined.

53,075. (Chairman.) (To Mr. Davis.) You are Chief Clerk in the District Probate Registry at Durham?—Yes.

53,076. Are you also Chairman of the District Probate Registry Clerks Association?—I am.

53,077. How far is that association representative of the whole number of clerks in the district probate registries?—I think there are four registries who do not subscribe to the association, but in at least one case or two cases we have had donations from some of the clerks—about four registries out of the 40.

21 April 1915.]

Mr. A. E. DAVIS, Mr. J. E. LISTER, and Mr. R. W. JONES.

53,078. In the case of the 36 who do belong, do all the clerks in each registry belong?—I should say, yes, speaking from memory. All the clerks at Wakefield do not belong to it, but I think that is one of the four that I reserved.

53,079. Your association, in any case, represents a great majority?—A very large majority.

53,080. How long have you yourself served in the Durham Registry?—22 years, and before that I was at Worcester from 1863 to 1893, and from 1893 to the present time I have been at Durham—51 years odd in all.

53,081. At what age did you enter the Worcester Registry?—I think I was 15; just after I left the cathedral school.

53,082. You went there straight from school?—I went to King's Scholars' School, connected with the cathedral, in which I gained a foundation at that time.

53,083. You wish to make representations partly on the question of salary, but more especially on the question of pensions or retiring allowances?—I do. I think the latter is of more importance excepting in the small registries.

53,084. Dealing with the question of salary first, what is your representation on that point?—What we think is that the promotion is so exceedingly slow, that a man who enters a registry is sometimes stationary for as much as 20 and even more years before he is moved on. In some of the smaller registries, until he gets the chief clerkship, he never reaches a maximum of more than 150*l.* a year. I could give you one or two instances if you wish it. That would, probably, dealing with the facts, be better. I have prepared a return which I thought might be of use to the Commission. It has been obtained by a form of return being sent to each registry, and asking the chief clerk, or some other member of the staff, to fill it up. The return gives the name of the registry; the name of the clerk; his position in the registry; date when first appointed; date of promotion, if any, showing the date of each promotion, if more than one; number of years' service; the number of grants for 1914, and the average number of grants for the last three years; and his present salary per annum.

53,085. Will you hand that to the secretary?—I will. It is rather rough, as I have only got the return out within the last week or two. I asked them to send in the return as soon as I knew we were coming before you. I may say that, with regard to some of the lengths of service, I should like to reserve them, and as I am not quite sure whether, in some cases, a clerk may not have put down his entrance into the Service as a copying clerk, and may not have been on the staff; but I think in nearly all cases it is all right, and that they were on the staff at those dates.

53,086. Your representation is, that the system under which fixed salaries are attached to each clerkship results often in a man remaining stationary at the same salary for a number of years?—Yes; I would like to give you an instance. Just take Carlisle: The present chief clerk was appointed in 1858 at the commencement of the Probate Court, and he has been there ever since in the position of chief clerk, I think.

53,087. Has his salary not varied during the whole of that time?—I think not. I am not sure whether he got less, but I have given his salary now.

53,088. His salary now is 200*l.* a year?—Yes, and he has been there since 1858. The second clerk entered the registry also in 1858, and was appointed to his present position of second clerk at a salary of 150*l.* in 1885.

53,089. Did I understand you to say that in no case did any clerk, except the chief clerk, receive more than 150*l.* a year?—I should think not. I am not able to answer that question.

53,090. I see the second clerk at Lancaster, for instance, receives 200*l.* a year?—It is a much larger registry. I ought to explain that, so far as I know, since the Treasury have paid the salaries, they have always been paid on the scheme that was fixed by Lord Penzance, and that scheme I could give you a copy of if you have not one already.

53,091. We have it.—That scheme fixed the salaries according to the number of grants passed in the registry. They are classed under different headings—1,200 to 1,500—and so on down the scale; and the chief clerks of the larger registries under that scheme get larger salaries, and so do the other clerks, than those in these smaller registries.

53,092. It is not the case that, in the larger registries, the second clerk is limited to 150*l.* a year?—No.

53,093. I understood you to say so?—No, that is a wrong impression.

53,094. At Wakefield the second clerk receives 300*l.* a year and the third clerk 175*l.*?—Yes, that is the largest registry.

53,095. Do you suggest that salaries advancing by increments would be a more suitable system of payment?—I do, entirely.

53,096. Are you aware that increments do exist in certain cases?—I am not.

53,097. I see that at Liverpool two of the clerks have a salary which advances by increments?—My colleague will be able to answer that, because he is chief clerk there. (Mr. Lister.) That was the only instance, I think, where it was so arranged a few years since.

53,098. Was that arrangement introduced recently?—Yes, quite recently. He was a young man, and he was put on at 50*l.*, I think, and advanced 5*l.* a year.

53,099. Do you suggest that that system should be more widely applied?—(Mr. Davis.) I think so. I think it would give more satisfaction to the clerks.

53,100. Apart from the question of fixed salaries, or salaries advancing by increments, do you suggest that the general level of salaries is too low, having regard to the work to be done?—I do, in the smaller registries.

53,101. You do not suggest that in the case of the larger registries?—I do not, except in regard to the junior clerks. I think junior clerks in the larger registries even may have to wait a great number of years at a small salary. Take Wakefield, for instance, which is the largest registry, you will see there are three junior clerks there getting 65*l.* a year, and, if I remember rightly, one has been there 10 years or 11 years.

53,102. Longer than that, I think?—Yes, and they still get 65*l.* a year, and have had no advance. So that, even in the larger registries, it is, I think, necessary that some flow of promotion should be adopted, or that there should be annual increments.

53,103. What would be the nature of the work done by those junior clerks? Would it be mainly copying?—I am not quite sure about that.

53,104. Taking Liverpool, I see you have, besides the established clerks, two copying clerks there?—(Mr. Lister.) Yes.

53,105. Is the whole of the copying done by the copying clerks, or do some of the established clerks do copying?—In the quiet season in the autumn some of the salaried clerks would do copying. Otherwise they have no time for it, but are occupied in general office work.

53,106. Have you made any comparison between the salaries paid to the junior clerks in these registries and the salaries paid to junior clerks in a private solicitor's office?—(Mr. Davis.) I have not made any comparison.

53,107. The other point on which you wish to make representations is the question of pension?—Yes, and the slowness of promotion.

53,108. The question of the slowness of promotion you have already dealt with in speaking of the question of salary. Do you wish to add anything on that question?—No.

53,109. On the question of pensions, would it be correct to say that you make representations on two grounds: In the first place, on a technical ground with reference to the legal position of the clerks and the interpretation of the statutes bearing on it; and in the second place on what I may describe as the equitable ground; the nature of their work; their position as public servants, and other considerations of that kind?—Yes.

Mr. A. E. DAVIS, Mr. J. E. LISTER, and Mr. R. W. JONES.

53,110. Dealing with the technical ground, that question is one which has been under consideration for a long time, has it not?—Yes, since our association was started, I may say.

53,111. And it has formed the subject of legal opinions both on the part of lawyers consulted by your association and also by the law officers of the Crown?—It has.

53,112. Those opinions have been somewhat various. Is it the case that counsel have expressed the opinion that the whole question is of an uncertain character, and that the interpretation of the statutes is a very difficult and doubtful question?—That is so; Mr. Danckwerts and Mr. Matthews.

53,113. What is the present position as regards the claim to pension and the decision of the Treasury on the subject?—The present position is this: that after taking the opinion of the law officers, Sir Rufus Isaacs and Mr. Simon, as they then were, they gave pensions to certain clerks who were appointed before 1873, or 1879, I am not sure which. I have the letter giving the result.

53,114. The result was that in 1912 the Treasury agreed that pensions should be given to clerks?—"On or after the date of the passing of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, clerks who were required to give their whole time to their duties will be entitled to reckon their service for pension as from the dates of their appointment."

53,115. Has that decision been subsequently revised?—Yes, perhaps 12 months afterwards. The letter is dated 2 March 1914.

53,116. What was the effect of that letter?—The letter is: "I am instructed by the President to inform you that he has now received a final communication from the Lords Commissioners of His Majesty's Treasury stating that after consultation with the law officers of the Crown and upon reconsideration, the Lords of the Treasury can no longer regard clerks in District Probate Registries as entitled to any pensions under the Supreme Court (Officers) Act, 1879, and that they cannot make any awards of pensions to any of such clerks from this date. The President accordingly requests that all your clerks who entered the service prior to the 28th October 1879 may be informed at once of the decision of the Treasury." The law officers' opinion was that those clerks who entered the service prior to the 28th October 1879 were entitled to pensions.

53,117. And the Treasury, on further consultation with the law officers of the Crown, announced that they were not entitled to pensions?—I think so, but I am not sure whether it was the same law officers or not. I think Sir Rufus Isaacs was not one of the law officers when the question was reconsidered, though probably he would be consulted.

53,118. That is the present position of the Treasury and their final decision?—That is so, except that I may say that certain clerks did receive a pension and receive a pension now under that decision, and certain representatives of clerks who were deceased were paid the pension that the deceased person would have been entitled to had this decision been given before he died.

53,119. The Treasury did not go back on awards already made, but declined to make any further awards in future?—That was so.

53,120. The Commission do not propose to go into the detailed question of the interpretation of these statutes, which, as you have already said, is a matter of great difficulty, and has been pronounced to be very doubtful by various legal authorities who have been consulted. We think it more important to consider the other grounds which I mentioned, namely, the position of the clerks as public servants and the nature of their service, and any other considerations of what I may describe as an equitable kind, which may be put forward in favour of their claim. Will you deal now with that side of the question, and explain the grounds on which you think they have a good claim to be made pensionable?—The ground upon which I think they should be made pensionable primarily is the slowness of promotion, the consequence being that the clerks are obliged to work until they are long past work, and if they can go to the office they go, and have to go. Their salaries having been so small for very many years, they are totally unable to save anything except in a few of the larger registries. Therefore I say it is detrimental to the public service that a man should be going to the office to do such important work, as we contend this is in the district registries, after the age of 65, or, in exceptional cases, perhaps, after the age of 70. But what has been the fact? Not so long ago there was one man at the age of 90 in, I think, the Lichfield registry, before he resigned. A man at Chester was 87. (Mr. Jones.) He is 95 now.

53,121. (Mr. Philip Snowden.) It seems to be a very healthy occupation.—(Mr. Davis.) Very healthy, no doubt, to some. I have some information as to ages, and it is gathered, I may say, not from the clerks themselves. I did not ask them their ages, but from a little statement I had some years ago from them, and I have added on the period since so far as I can; I will not pledge myself that these are actually the ages within a year or so. The number of our clerks is about 162.

53,122. (Chairman.) Is that the total number of clerks?—Yes. We have 28 clerks with between 20 and 30 years' service; 35 with between 30 and 40 years' service; 17 with between 40 and 50 years' service; 8 with 50 years' service and over, and some 57 years' service.

53,123. Your suggestion is, that the absence of any system of pensions results in men remaining in office after they have ceased to be fully efficient, and that that is detrimental to the public service and injurious to the individuals. Is that your argument?—Yes; it is injurious to the individuals, because it stops the flow of promotion.

53,124. What happens in the case of a man whose age is advanced and whose powers are declining?—Well, he goes to the office and does his best, no doubt. I am unable to speak individually as to whether anybody's powers are declining, but one takes it that they cannot be otherwise at that advanced age.

53,125. They are given as much work as they are still able to do?—I should imagine that they do the chief clerk's work in some way. I do not know how. Most of them would be chief clerks, but not all.

53,126. Do you suggest that if there was a pension system, men would retire, or could be called upon to retire, at a more moderate age?—Yes, at a more moderate age.

53,127. In that case, would you suggest a fixed age for retirement?—I think it should be 65, with exceptions. It could be left in the hands of either the district registrar or the President; if he found an exceptional man whom he wished to retain, he might be retained two or three years more, perhaps.

53,128. Are there further arguments which you wish to put forward in favour of a system of pensions?—I ought to say that we think the position of clerks in district registries is a very important one, and that they should be recognised in the proper way as Civil servants of the State, and in that way be entitled to pensions the same as other portions of the Civil Service in nearly all cases are. There are just one or two notes I made at the end of our statement which you have not got, but they are two or three notes I should like to ask the Commission to consider from the clerk's point of view. One is that if any doubt exists steps may be taken to recognise the district probate registry clerks as Civil servants of the State.

53,129. Your point in suggesting that is that they should be made pensionable?—Yes. As you know, counsel has considered them to be so, and counsel says we have been paid our salaries irregularly now the statutes are so confused.

53,130. (Mr. Coward.) Surely you would put your point from an entirely different point of view; that is to say, because of your position?—That is it, because of our positions, which we consider to be important positions, we think we ought to be recognised as Civil servants of the State.

Mr. A. E. DAVIS, Mr. J. E. LISTER, and Mr. R. W. JONES.

53,131. That is quite irrespective of counsel's views?—Certainly. Then the second point is that they shall be entitled to and shall receive superannuation allowance; that their lengths of service for such superannuation shall be retrospective and date from their appointment, so where appointed previous to the Judicature Act, 1873, they should be dated from when that Act came into operation; that the present staff shall not be required to pass a Civil Service examination. We think it would be ridiculous to ask men like myself and others who have got on in years to pass a serious examination at our ages; we probably would not be able to do it. Then we suggest that the scheme of salaries shall be revised and the salaries increased to a maximum by yearly instalments in each class.

53,132. (Chairman.) In suggesting a system of yearly instalments or increments, do you suggest an increase in the total amount paid, or would you be satisfied if the same total amount were distributed in such a way as to produce salaries rising by increments?—I suggest an increase in the smaller registries.

53,133. This suggestion applies specially to the smaller registries?—It does.

53,134. In the larger registries, do you consider that the total amount paid in salaries is sufficient if distributed in a different way?—I do not know how you would distribute it in a different way. I think the juniors want a little increase in the larger registries, too, but that would not be so bad if there was a flow of promotion. It is the want of promotion, the sticking at the same salary for so many years, and then there is no chance of bringing up a family and saving any money, and if ill-health overtakes a man he is done for and he gets into debt.

53,135. You suggest that a system of pensions and a fixed age for retirement would make a better flow of promotion and so remedy that difficulty?—Yes, I do, if there was compulsory retirement.

53,136. Does that complete your statement on the subject of pensions?—There is just one other thing: At a meeting of our association some time ago, it was decided that we should ask the President to make the chief clerks eligible for district registrarships. Some of them are now eligible for district registrarships, but one has never been appointed.

53,137. In what way are they eligible?—In this way: that clerks who were in the Consistory Courts before the Probate Court was established were made eligible, I think, under Section 20 of the Act of 1857.

53,138. Any clerks who are eligible under that clause must be of a somewhat advanced age now?—Yes, they must indeed.

53,139. Perhaps rather too old to be appointed registrars?—Yes; we do not suggest that they should be appointed, but they have applied and have never been appointed. A chief clerk applied for the last vacancy but was not appointed; he was eligible, and he did not retire until over 80 years of age.

53,140. You suggest that the clerks in the district registries should be made eligible?—We do.

53,141. That, of course, would require legislation?—It would. It should be on the same terms as the Principal Registry clerks are appointed; they are eligible under the same Act.

53,142. In the smaller registries are the clerks fully employed on the work of the registry?—I think so.

53,143. Does it take up all their time?—I think so.

53,144. In the very small registries where the grants are under 300 a year, and in one case, I think, under 200 a year, is there really enough work to employ two or three clerks in addition to the registrar?—At least two, I think. There is so much detail that unless you see the work it is most difficult for you to understand.

53,145. Have you experience of one of the very small registries?—Yes, I was at Worcester.

53,146. What was the number of grants there?—When I went there first I think it was between 500 and 600, and then it got up to over 600.

53,147. That is what you would call a middle-sized registry?—Yes.

53,148. (Mr. Coward.) There were three clerks there?—Yes, and a copying clerk.

53,149. (Chairman.) Was the time of the clerks there fully occupied?—Yes, fully occupied.

53,150. But there are some registries with between 200 and 300 grants a year where there are three clerks?—I could not tell from memory, but it is in the last part of the return I handed in. They are put in order of size as regards numbers.

53,151. Taking Taunton, there are three clerks, and the number of grants was 272 in 1913. At Wells there were 307 grants and three clerks?—Yes. I ought to point out that it is not only the actual present work of the day, but the office copies of wills that have been proved at a previous time are ordered, and in the registries where they have old records, as they have in nearly all these small registries, they being in cathedral towns, the time of a clerk is a good deal taken up by getting out wills for people who want to see them, and putting them back again. Sometimes at Worcester we used to have what we call a literary searcher who got an order from the President and would come down for days at a time. I have heard since that there has been a lady there who takes a great interest in that sort of thing and occupies the time of the clerks very largely indeed. The persons cannot be left with these old things in their possession without someone being in the same room. That, I would point out, takes up a good deal of time at some of the registries.

53,152. At the larger registries, at Liverpool for instance, are the clerks pretty fully occupied?—(Mr. Lister.) Yes, at Liverpool they are. We have no ancient records there, and have not any trouble of that sort.

53,153. What are the office hours at Liverpool?—The registry is open from 10 to 4.

53,154. Are the clerks ever occupied for longer hours than that?—Yes; coming at 9.30 in the busy times till half-past 5 or 6 o'clock.

53,155. What holidays do they have in the year?—The junior gets a fortnight, the third clerk gets three weeks, and the second clerk and myself four weeks; we both have been in the registry over 40 years, and, perhaps, it is on that account, partly.

53,156. (Sir John Kempe.) You say the salaries at the small registries are low. I suppose the gradations of salaries at different registries are fair. That is to say, compared with the work done, the salaries are, in proportion to one another, all right?—(Mr. Davis.) Yes, I think so. I think the chief clerk's salary being low the rest are low. There are a great number of chief clerks who do not receive more than 150*l.* a year—17. Then the second clerks in those cases do not get more than 100*l.*, and the third clerk, perhaps, 90*l.* or 80*l.*

53,157. But those salaries are fixed in proportion to the amount of work in each case?—They are fixed by the number of grants.

53,158. Does not the number of grants represent proportionately the amount of work?—I think not. I should like to say that it does not represent the ability required in a chief clerk.

53,159. No; but does not it represent about the same time taken up? One hundred grants would take about the same time in each office?—Yes.

53,160. And the same amount of labour of the clerks?—Certainly.

53,161. Therefore the salaries are fairly proportionate to one another, though they are rather too low?—I think that is so.

53,162. I do not understand how you would correct that. Both the fact that there are no pensions and that the scale of the salary is too low, are, of course, unfortunate matters; but how could you give a higher salary if the work is very light?—I can only suggest the amalgamation of a small registry into a larger one.

53,163. That points not to giving higher salaries but amalgamating registries with existing ones?—Yes; by that means they would get larger salaries and a flow of promotion.

53,164. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) In all registries there is a certain amount of correspondence which takes place, and which is paid for by the person writing to the registrar on probate business?—Yes; by the public and by solicitors.

Mr. A. E. DAVIS, Mr. J. E. LISTER, and Mr. R. W. JONES.

53,165. Is it not always the custom that a certain amount of the fees so received is paid to the registrars' clerks?—In the decision of Lord Selborne, I think, in 1883 or 1882, on the question of agency, he understood that it was divided between the registrar and his chief clerk.

53,166. What is the general scheme under which such division takes place?—I think it is a matter of arrangement between the registrar and the chief clerk. There is no scheme.

53,167. Do you know what the custom is normally?—Shall I tell you what it is at my own registry?

53,168. Yes.—The registrar gets two-thirds and he gives his chief clerk one-third, and the chief clerk then divides it again with his next clerk who assists him.

53,169. You spoke just now of office copies of wills that are ordered. Are those part of this agency business?—No.

53,170. The office copies of wills are ordered by whom?—They are partly one and partly the other. If a person comes into the office and orders an office copy, that is, of course, done by the clerks in the registry; there is no agency in that case; but if a solicitor writes to the registrar and asks him, as his agent, to send him an office copy, then the registrar orders the office copy to be done and sends it.

53,171. Then if a man comes into the office and personally asks for a copy of a will, he pays a fee which goes to the Government?—Certainly.

53,172. If he writes a post card asking for a copy of a will he pays much the same fee, but it goes to the registrar?—No. He pays the Government fee for making the office copy just the same; but he also pays a small fee to the registrar for obtaining the office copy for him and sending it to him when it is ready. He pays for the correspondence.

53,173. Do you know what that fee is?—Of course the registrar has to make the search and all that sort of thing for him, and I think the fee is 3s. 10d. for the search, and I think the registrar charges him 2d. a folio for examining it.

53,174. I want to contrast what happens in the two cases: (1) Where the man applies personally and all fees are paid to the Government; and (2) where he applies by letter, and certain fees are paid to the registrar. Does that examination of the office copy take place in the case of the Government?—I am not quite sure. If it is examined on behalf of the Government, there is a fee for examining of 3d. per folio.

53,175. And that goes to the Government?—Yes.

53,176. If the demand for a copy comes by post, the fee for examination goes to the registrar?—Yes, but he does not certify it to be an examined copy; it is what we call a "plain" copy. If it is certified, a fee of 3d. per folio is charged, which goes to the Government.

53,177. In addition?—No, not in addition to the registrar's 2d. a folio. The registrar gets no fee if the copy has to be certified.

53,178. Then it is a clear advantage to the registrar, first that any application for copies should be made by post, and next that a "plain" copy should be given instead of a certified copy?—I should not like to say that. We have to attend to them if they come; that is all I can say.

53,179. Supposing a copy of a will is wanted by post, for which a fee is going to be charged, in slack times is the work of making that copy ever done in office hours?—The copy is made in office hours, yes.

53,180. Is the copy checked in office hours?—I think not. No, I should say not.

53,181. Can you, on looking back upon your own experience for the last year, remember doing any work in office hours for which the registrar was paid?—Well, I have to examine all the papers when they come in, and I look at drafts. The registrar receives draft papers from solicitors requesting him to be good enough to settle them and send them back. We all get to our office at half-past nine in the morning and we stay until the work is finished. We do the work of the day in a day.

53,182. But part of your day's work is this agency work?—I must admit it is to some extent, but you see there are lots of solicitors in the town and neighbourhood who come over during the day and bring drafts, and I have to look at them during the day.

53,183. (To Mr. Lister.) At Liverpool in the last year have you done, during office hours, agency work?—In dealing with the cases.

53,184. You have done work for which agency fees were charged?—Yes, correspondence, if we have been written to, would be done during office hours.

53,185. (To Mr. Jones.) Have you also done agency work during office hours?—The Government hours are 10 to 4. After 4 the time is my own, and I have to go back very often to do the Government work on that account, because I did the other work in office hours.

53,186. And you think it is the universal habit that in the registry the agency work is done during office hours?—(Mr. Davis.) I should think it was to some extent, but you must not forget that in my case the clerks are there at 9.30 and we stay until the work is finished.

53,187. You said you did not think it ought to be made a condition for your becoming pensionable that you should pass a literary examination for the Civil Service Commission?—That is so.

53,188. But you know there is another kind of examination for the Civil Service Commission, namely, an examination into a man's health. Do you think it is fair that a man, perhaps quite a young man, should be put on the pensionable list without any examination into his health?—I should say the present staff should be treated so.

53,189. Without any question as to whether they are stone deaf or not?—No.

53,190. Or whether they have consumption, for instance?—No. I think it might be put in this way—men of a certain number of years' standing.

53,191. But men may go deaf who have had only a few years' service, and other men may take these posts on the ground that they are physically incapable, and it is an advantage to have a light job?—I should not think so in probate registries. I think the registrars are too particular themselves.

53,192. But you do ask that the whole body of men should be admitted without any medical examination as pensionable?—I think it only fair to them if they have been in the service for a few years. They have undoubtedly made it what they intend to be their occupation in life.

53,193. How many years would you ask for?—I should say five years' standing.

53,194. Everybody of five years' standing?—Yes.

53,195. What would happen to the people under five years' standing?—It would be very hard lines upon them, too, I think, if they were asked to pass an examination. Men after they leave school after five years forget a good deal.

53,196. I am talking about a health examination?—I hardly know how to answer your question, it is such a personal matter with each clerk.

53,197. (Mr. Philip Snowden.) Would you mind explaining the way in which the clerkships are filled now? Are the appointments nominally made by the President, but in reality by somebody else?—The nomination is by the district registrar; in fact he appoints, and the appointment is approved by the President.

53,198. Have there been within your knowledge any instances where favouritism has been shown in the making of those appointments in which the relatives of those having the appointments have been put into these positions?—No.

53,199. There is nothing of that sort going on?—Not in my experience.

53,200. If some such scheme as that which you have been suggesting were adopted, that would mean that candidates for clerkships in the future would have to undergo an examination?—Certainly.

53,201. I suppose you have never considered that it was within your province to formulate anything in the nature of a scheme of examination?—Never.

53,202. You put forward the claim that all the past service should be reckoned for pension?—Yes.

21 April 1915.]

Mr. A. E. DAVIS, Mr. J. E. LISTER, and Mr. R. W. JONES.

53,203. When these clerks who have 40 or 50 years' service were first appointed, had they any expectation of a pension?—The agitation for pensions has been going on since 1862, or about that time.

53,204. But there is a difference between an agitation for a pension and having an expectation?—I would hardly like to say an agitation. I would rather say a claim.

53,205. My point is, had these men when they were appointed to the clerkship, any legal expectation of a pension; that is to say, had they, as ordinary Civil servants, had any expectation of a pension?—No, I think not.

53,206. They knew the condition of their service when they entered and that the posts were not pensionable?—I think so.

53,207. Do you think the fact that these posts were not pensionable has had any influence in fixing the amount of salary?—No, I think not.

53,208. Do you think your salaries would have been what they are if you had had a pension at the end of your service?—Yes, I think they should have been. I think the very lowest salaries have been paid. Many of the old Consistory Court diocesan registrars, as they all were, were all appointed, in fact, when the Probate Court was established, as district registrars. Then they were invariably almost all solicitors, and they had a staff of clerks, and their clerks were taken over, I think, as a rule. Well, solicitor's clerks in those days—I have no experience of them now—were only poorly paid; not so well paid as Government servants by any means, I should say; and the same salaries as they were receiving as solicitor's clerks, I have no doubt, were fixed. That is the way I rather look upon it why the small salaries have been fixed.

53,209. Can you point to any case where a staff of public servants have been put upon the establishment and all their back service has been counted for pension?—I could not. I have not gone into that matter at all; but I think you are rather under a misapprehension. We rather think that we are entitled to pension since the Judicature Act was passed in 1873, and that the Act of 1879 gave it us—that it would allow the Lord Chancellor to give a certificate. We do not claim to go back to 1858 when a man was appointed or anything of that sort.

53,210. That is the point I was trying to bring out. I gathered that you were claiming, as in the case of the clerk at Carlisle who was appointed in 1858, that he should be able to claim a pension for all the years of service?—No, I did not mean that.

53,211. You meant you should go back to the time when you were given an expectation of a pension?—That is so.

53,212. That makes that clear?—It is 40 years since the Judicature Act.

53,213. Does the registrar apportion the salaries?—No.

53,214. It is done by the Treasury?—By the Treasury.

53,215. (Chairman.) That is to say, it is fixed by the scheme which was determined between the Treasury and the President of the Division?—And Lord Penzance. That scheme has never been revised, to our knowledge, and it is 50 years old.

53,216. The scheme was not fixed by the Treasury alone but by concurrence of the President of the Division and the Treasury?—Yes, the Treasury and the President.

53,217. Is it not the case that under the Statute the salaries are to be fixed by the Treasury and the President of the Division in concurrence?—I think that is so. I am not quite sure when this scheme of Lord Penzance came into operation, but it was, I think, soon after the establishment of the court.

53,218. (Mr. Philip Snowden.) I am not concerned about that matter. Have you made any comparison between your salaries and the salaries paid to County Court clerks?—No.

53,219. What would be the amount of these agency fees about which you were speaking just now—say, in your own office?—I get about 150*l.* a year.

53,220. And your proportion is one-third?—No, I pay the second clerk.

53,221. You get one-third of the total fees?—Yes.

53,222. So that makes it up to about 450*l.* a year?—Yes, more, because the registrar takes two-thirds, and I get a third. I could not tell you the exact amount.

53,223. That would be just 450*l.*?—But it gives me 150*l.* personally.

53,224. In addition to what your other clerk gets?—Yes.

53,225. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) What do you pay the other clerk?—He takes one-third of what I get.

53,226. Then he takes 50*l.* a year?—Yes.

53,227. Is there any other payment out of the third?—No, those are the payments.

53,228. It follows that the total amount is about 600*l.* a year?—Yes, I should think so.

53,229. (Mr. Philip Snowden.) That is an addition of 150*l.* a year to your salary?—Yes.

53,230. And your salary is what?—400*l.* now. It was raised after some trouble last year, I think.

53,231. So your income is really 550*l.*?—Yes, about that. The agency varies very much, of course. (Mr. Lister.) The agency at many of the registries is not so much as that. (Mr. Davis.) Ours is a very large correspondence registry indeed. I must mention that. We are a little town of 13,000 or 14,000 inhabitants, but we have a tremendous population right round us, and that creates a large correspondence.

53,232. I was not quite clear about this matter of the agency and the difference in the cost. I will give you a case: Supposing I wanted a copy of a will, and it consisted of 12 folios, and I come to the office for it, and I ask you to supply me with this copy, what would it cost me?—It would cost you 1*s.* for the search, and 6*d.* per folio, which is 6*s.*

53,233. That is 7*s.* altogether?—Yes, that would be a plain copy. If you wanted it examined and certified, it would be 3*d.* per folio more, which would go to the Government.

53,234. Then we will say 10*s.* for everything?—Yes, and that goes to the Government; 1*s.* for the search, 6*s.* for the copy, and 3*s.* for examining.

53,235. That is 10*s.* altogether?—Yes, and examined copies have to be put upon one shilling stamped foolscap. Every office copy that is certified to be an office copy has to bear a shilling stamp on the foolscap.

53,236. That is 11*s.*?—Yes.

53,237. Supposing I write for that, what would it cost?—It would be exactly the same Government fees as regards the search and the copy—that is, 7*s.* Then we should charge 3*s.* 10*d.* for writing the letter and the search. Then the registrar would charge 2*d.* per folio for examining, which he takes—that is 2*s.*—and another 1*s. for the second letter.

53,238. What about the paper on which it is written with that 1*s.* stamp?—The foolscap with the 1*s.* stamp on it is obtained at the post office.

53,239. That is 13*s.* 10*d.*?—Then if it takes more than that foolscap sheet that we get, we have paper supplied by the Government to fit in.

53,240. That is the difference, and that difference goes in agency fees?—Yes.

53,241. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) More than that, because they not only get the 3*s.* 10*d.*, but also the 2*d.* per folio?—(Mr. Lister.) That charge for examining is not made at Liverpool, and perhaps not at other registries. (Mr. Jones.) Nor at Chester. (Mr. Davis.) I think this agency practice varies very much all over the country.

53,242. (Chairman.) In the case of a certified copy obtained by post, there is not a charge of 2*d.* for examining in addition to the 3*d.* for examining, and the charge for the certified copy?—No. The registrar has no examining fee then for himself; it goes to the Government.

53,243. In the case of a personal application not by post for a copy which is not required to be a certified copy, is there no charge for examining?—None, though we never allow one to go out without it being examined.

53,244. But there is no charge for it?—No charge for it.

* I should have said 1*s.* 6*d.*—A. E. D.

Mr. LEONARD WILLIAM KERSHAW (King's Coroner and Attorney, Master of the Crown Office and Registrar of the Court of Criminal Appeal), called and examined.

53,245. (Chairman.) What is the position you hold?—I am King's Coroner and Attorney, Master of the Crown Office, and also Registrar of the Court of Criminal Appeal.

53,246. How long have you held those posts?—My present offices I have held since the 16th January 1912—three years and a month or two.

53,247. And before that?—Before that I was assistant registrar in the Court of Criminal Appeal for just under four years. I was first appointed in May 1908.

53,248. Was that when the Court of Criminal Appeal came into existence?—The Court actually came into active existence on the 19th April, which was an Easter Saturday. My appointment is dated 25th May, and I had not heard anything about it until a few weeks before that, but there were only two or three Courts, I think, which sat before I was assistant registrar.

53,249. Before that, had you practised at the Bar?—I had practised before that at the Bar for just over 22 years, chiefly at the Criminal Bar.

53,250. Will you tell us briefly the nature of the matters dealt with in the Crown Office?—Really the chief matters are the following: the filing and entering of the appeals to the King's Bench Division. Those appeals are appeals from quarter sessions or from petty sessions, chiefly by way of special cases stated; there are appeals from County Courts; there are appeals from official referees; and there are other appeals. Those are the more important matters. Then there are, in addition, filing appeals to the Court of Appeal, which is done in the Crown Office. We deal there with appeals from the King's Bench Division, or from the County Court, under the Workmen's Compensation Act, which go straight to the Court of Appeal, as opposed to the King's Bench. That is dealing with the filing and entering of appeals. Also in the Crown Office we draw up the orders in all those matters dismissing or affirming the appeal, and, of course, in some of the cases the order may be a simple matter; but, certainly, in a very great many of the Crown Office matters as dealt with now they are not simple matters. They are drawn up in the Crown Office. Then we also issue the rules nisi, which are obtained on application to a Divisional Court, and we draw up the order of the rule nisi, which is an order calling upon a person to show cause why a particular thing should not be done. Then we issue the writs and issue the subpoenas. That is, or may be, a comparatively simple matter; but even issuing subpoenas is a matter that requires care, they are not absolutely issued as of course—

53,251. (Mr. Coward.) Are not they?—No.

53,252. Supposing it is a subpoena ad test?—The large majority are simple. We do not issue subpoenas in practice, for instance, for any matter in the Divisional Court; there must be as a rule a cause or matter to be heard.

53,253. Of course you would not. In the Divisional Court there would not be any matter in which a witness would appear?—There are not many of them, but as a matter of fact, only two days ago, I had brought to me personally from the office an application to issue a subpoena for a matter which is now proceeding in the Divisional Court which I refused, because I did not think it a proper matter in which a subpoena should be issued.

53,254. But it never would be issued. How could it be? They would not hear witnesses?—I should not like to go quite so far as that, because the Lord Chief Justice in this particular case said he thought it had better be issued.

53,255. Because he wanted the man there, I suppose?—Yes.

53,256. It would be very, very exceptional?—I quite agree, it is very exceptional.

53,257. I am bound to say I never heard of such a thing in my life?—No, and in the three years I have been there I think I have had half a dozen applications brought to me to issue a subpoena in the Divisional Court and I have refused—I will not bind myself to my figures—certainly four of them. There are such applications made which have to be dealt with. I can tell you the kind of case. If there is an old plan or old map which has to be referred to, one would issue a subpoena for that, if there is no copy. I hope I make it clear that it is that kind of case. In other matters I should exercise my discretion—it does not often arise—as to whether I thought there was a probable reason to think that the presence of a witness at the Divisional Court might save time and save money.

53,258. (Chairman.) Will you continue stating what the Crown Office does?—In addition to that we have to keep the lists for all the matters dealt with in the Crown Office. That includes the Crown paper, the Civil paper, the special paper, and the motions for judgment.

53,259. (Mr. Coward.) These are lists of cases standing for hearing?—These are the lists of cases standing for hearing and the daily lists. It requires some consideration to make up the daily cause list, and is not a matter always quite as simple as people might think when you have to judge the length of a case. Of course, it is done mostly in the office, but I personally take a considerable part in doing it and find it considerably difficult. One naturally does not want to bring people there unnecessarily, and on the other hand one does not want that the Court should run short of work. Sometimes it is very difficult to judge the length of a case; in fact, often one absolutely has not the materials to do it. In addition we also from the Crown Office have to provide the officers to take the courts, really in the sense of associates in the case of the Crown paper, the Civil paper, the special paper, and the motions for judgment. Of course, it is very seldom that all four are going on at the same time. Perhaps you do not wish me to go into exhaustive detail further.

53,260. (Chairman.) For our purposes the general sketch you have given is sufficiently detailed. You also have the supervision of the Associates Department?—I have. That department is practically under the control of Master Lawford, who is an assistant master, and it is one of the matters I hope I may have an opportunity of saying something about later—both upon that subject and the Criminal Appeal work, if you wish to hear me upon those points.

53,261. What is the work of the associates?—Upon that matter my duty is general superintendence. In practice I have very little to do with the associates, and if you wish to hear evidence upon that, I do hope that you will hear either Master Lawford or one of the clerks, Mr. Kenyon or Mr. Thomas, if you wish to go into any detail. I dare say I can give it to you generally, but if there is any question of detail at all I hope you will hear some other man who is, I will admit, more qualified than myself to speak as to details with regard to associates. They have the keeping of the daily cause lists and the warned lists published; they have to summon the juries, and one of them has to sit in court with every King's Bench judge, who is taking King's Bench work except the Bankruptcy. Then the jurors summoned have to be dealt with as to excuses and questions as to when they are next wanted, and that kind of detail, which has to be dealt with in every court—special jury or common jury—and though I do not myself ever have now to deal with them, some years ago for a short time, long before any appointment I have now got, I did, and I do not think it is easy work dealing with jurors who probably are not very pleased at being where they are. I speak from slight experience on that point about 15 years ago. The associate who is sitting in court has to keep the minutes of every order; the orders and certificates of the judgments have to be drawn up; and the associate ought to be ready in court always to answer any questions on practice which the judge may ask him. Then he has to see that the documents are properly stamped. In the office itself there are a very large number of questions that people come in to ask with reference to their cases when setting them down for trial and when they are likely to come on; and cases have to be entered for trial and the lists made up and published. There is also the troublesome matter that cases are postponed suddenly, which has to be provided for. By no means do I say that I have given a full and complete description of the work, but I have endeavoured to give you the general outline for which you ask.

Mr. LEONARD WILLIAM KERSHAW.

53,262. The duties of the associates would appear from your description to be duties requiring common sense, tact, temper, and judgment, rather than legal knowledge of technicalities?—I think they require extreme tact, and I accept your words entirely. I should myself say that they require very great tact and general ability to deal with the work and a certain knowledge of practice, but not a legal knowledge.

53,263. The work in the Crown Office is, I suppose, very technical?—It is very technical and requires a very good knowledge by the clerks as to the particular procedure. There are such a number of matters where different considerations come in. For instance, the length of time to appeal and whether the right step is being taken. They require extreme technical knowledge, and I think the Crown Office clerks require tact and common sense.

53,264. (Mr. Coward.) The Crown Office work is quite technical, but there is such a thing as a book upon the subject?—Yes, there is a book upon it, and I think a most admirable book.

53,265. With a certain amount of trouble any one of us could ascertain what had to be done in a particular case, could not we?—I do not know. All I can say is, that there are an enormous number of people now who do not understand it. I spent a considerable time some years ago in studying the book you have referred to, and I have not the slightest doubt with great advantage I could continue to study that book.

53,266. (Chairman.) Your staff in the Crown Office consists of how many clerks?—In the Crown Office we have seven clerks.

53,267. How are they distributed between the different classes?—We have at present got three first class clerks, two second class clerks, and two third class clerks.

53,268. What are the corresponding numbers in the Associates Department?—At present I have not mentioned anything about the war vacancies or sickness. As a matter of fact we have clerks ill now, and some are away. You are speaking of the ordinary full staff, I presume? In the Associates Department there are 12 clerks, of whom one is a first class clerk, and I think there are five second class clerks and six third class clerks.

53,269. Do you find that the present system of appointment has satisfactory results as regards your staff?—Personally, I think it has. I think the class of man—and I am speaking of my three offices—is admirable. I have the very highest opinion of the men in all my three departments.

53,270. Have they usually been appointed without previous legal experience?—Speaking for those appointed in my time, I do not think any have had any previous legal experience. There is one man in the Criminal Appeal Office who has been called to the Bar, but he has never practised; he was appointed to the Central Office long before my time.

53,271. Do you find that without previous legal experience they can learn their work satisfactorily in the office?—I find so, certainly. I think one man has been appointed in my time to the Crown Office absolutely from the outside, and one, I think, in the Associates Department from outside, but others have been transferred from other departments of the Central Office.

53,272. That is to say, they have had experience in the Central Office but not as solicitors' clerks or other outside legal experience?—No, as far as I know, they have not had any legal experience as solicitors' clerks.

53,273. Do you think it preferable to appoint men in that way without experience in a solicitor's office; in fact to catch men of good education and intelligence straight from school or university rather than to get men who have been employed in solicitors' offices before they come in?—Yes, I think it is. I personally am so impressed with the class of man that we have got now, that I should not like to express any opinion, although I speak with hesitation, that we could get a better class of man. Of course occasionally there are individual cases, but you are speaking of the class.

53,274. Yes. In the two branches under your supervision do you make any clear distinction between the work of the different classes? Is there a clear distinction, for instance, between the work of the third class and the work of the second class?—I think so in the Associates Department. I speak with very great hesitation on that point. In practice a second class clerk is always expected to be present in the office itself as apart from the court work, who, of course, has the responsibility. I do not know that any real distinction is made in the Crown Office, but certainly the second class men there do in fact have much more responsibility put upon them. I would not like to say it is because they are second class; the third class men in the Crown Office are very much younger, and naturally one would be careful to see that they were not given so much opportunity of control in the office when there was not somebody else there, such as a second class man.

53,275. It has been suggested to us in connection with some of the legal offices that a part of the work is of a very mechanical and routine description—filing papers and so forth—and that if the junior clerks are doing work of that kind it is a bad preparation for advancement to the more important work which is done by the senior clerks. Therefore it has been suggested that it would be desirable to have two entirely separate recruitments—recruitment for the third class without any prospect of rising to the higher classes, and recruitment for the second class separately and at a somewhat higher age, with the prospect of advancing to the first class. Would that system be applicable in the departments of which you have control?—I do not think it would be applicable in either of the departments that we have spoken of. At present you have not asked me anything about the Criminal Appeal Office. I do not think any of the work that any of the clerks do in either the Crown Office or the Associates Department could in any sense be properly described as mechanical. I had not considered that question, but it certainly is my opinion that there is no mechanical work strictly so called that any of those men do in the Crown Office or the Associates Department.

53,276. I suppose that may arise partly from the fact that the volume of the work as measured by the number of cases passing through the office is not so large as in the other departments of the Central Office, and therefore the mechanical work of filing documents and keeping records, and so forth, is small in proportion to the total amount of work?—It is all done as part of the same thing. We have not in the Crown Office a department for filing our papers. It would have to be done there and then by the same man. It is all really one transaction. The man who takes the thing in probably has to file it, though he may not eventually enter up some particular book. The whole thing is done in the Crown Office.

53,277. I gather that you would not be in favour of any such separation as has been suggested in the case of some other departments?—No, I should not.

53,278. Is the staff of your department of the Central Office interchangeable with the staff of the other departments?—Yes, it is interchangeable.

53,279. How far is the interchangeability carried out in practice?—I think that is one of the very difficult questions of which I should like to see very much some solution. The interchange is really carried out by the Committee of Control. It takes a very considerable time to learn the business properly in the Crown Office and in the Associates Department, and it is very difficult to interchange the two, and to send one man who has learnt his work fairly well to another department altogether; in fact I, myself, with Master Bonner, spent some time, some months ago now, trying to devise a scheme for the senior master as to how it should be done. I feel that there are very great difficulties in doing it. I think it is absolutely essential, while the promotion is to be from one office to another, that there should be some such scheme if the Crown Office and the Associates Department are to remain part of the Central Office. I personally feel the difficulty, though I do feel that it is essential. If we have this interchange we are continually having in offices, where knowledge of the office is essential, new men who do not know the work, and who are learning their work.

53,280. That is to say, for a certain period after each interchange, there would be in the two departments concerned a man who is learning the work of the department to which he has been moved?—Yes, and learning work that I feel really does take a long time to learn properly. I hope to live to see the Crown practice very considerably simplified myself—I do not know whether that is not hoping for too long a life.

53,281. But as it is at present, it takes some time to learn?—I should not like to leave a man in the Crown Office responsible for the work unless he had been several years in it. Then, of course, the difficulty arises when the question comes of promotion to the first class clerkship in, say, the Associates Department or the Crown Office. A man who had merely spent two or three years in the office some seven or eight years before that would be absolutely no good whatsoever as head clerk in the Crown Office; he would not know the business, even if he had been in it two or three years, sufficiently to be any practical good as head clerk.

53,282. Would not he very soon pick it up again?—I doubt if he would. I think it would be a very difficult position for that man, especially if the men immediately below him were men who had been in the Crown Office for a number of years and actually knew it.

53,283. Would you say that a man who has been moved about, and worked in several different departments, or in all the different departments of the Central Office, would in the end be a better man than a man who had worked himself up in one department alone?—For the Crown Office and the Associates I do not think he would.

53,284. Not for that particular work?—For that particular work I do not think he would.

53,285. Would not it give him a wider outlook altogether?—It might give him a wider outlook on facts which would have no bearing upon the office that he would hold as head of one of those offices.

53,286. You do not think that for that particular purpose he would be a better man?—I like people to have wide outlooks, but it does not seem to me that there would be, for these particular offices, any advantage.

53,287. What is your conclusion on that point—that the Associates Department and the Crown Office Department should not form part of the Central Office?—That is my opinion. I think it would be much better with the Crown Office and the Associates Department forming one office in itself, responsible through its particular master to the Lord Chief Justice (as we deal practically only with King's Bench Division matters), who is head of that division. I do feel, of course, that it may well be that the consideration of compensation would come in, supposing that view of mine were to meet with anybody's favour. There might be compensation to clerks in the Central Office. I do not want to say a word or do anything to reduce their prospects or their hopes. I do not think any of the clerks are by any means overpaid, but my own view is, that if it could be arranged without any of the clerks suffering any loss, either immediate or prospective, that, as a businesslike working, it would be far more workable that it should form one separate office.

53,288. Would you retain the Crown Office and the Associates Department together?—I would, because I think those two could work together extremely well, and I feel that they ought to be under the one master. I hope that in any expression on this point it will not be thought that I am suggesting in any way any sort of complaint about the Committee of Control, or anything of that sort. Nothing is further from my mind, but I feel myself that there are such difficulties in dealing with the offices as they are now arranged that I think the Committee of Control have a very difficult task.

53,289. Is it due to the difficulties of promotion, arising from the causes you have mentioned, that there are an exceptional number of first class clerks in the Crown Office?—I think it is. When I came into the office Mr. Short and Mr. Image were both first class clerks—on what considerations I do not know. Mr. Gipps, the junior first class clerk, was appointed a few months after I was appointed, and the Committee of Control asked me my opinion, and I gave it. I had had some opportunity then of seeing him, and I made inquiries, and I thought it would be a great injustice if Mr. Gipps was passed over; but, apparently, there was difficulty in moving him to another office. I think it may be due to the difficulties I have mentioned.

53,290. What is the arrangement in your office as regards vacations?—In the Crown Office there are at least two clerks during all the vacations, and at the beginning of the Long Vacation, and certainly at the end of the Long Vacation, there are always considerably more, as there are the lists and other matters to be dealt with. In the Associates Department at least two clerks are always present during vacations. The Christmas vacation, I am told by Master Lawford, is an extremely busy vacation, because all the cases have to be re-numbered, and at the end of the year a considerable amount of work has to be done.

53,291. Can you say what the average length of vacation for an individual clerk actually is?—I made that inquiry in the Associates Department, and, I think, the average length is about seven weeks. It is six weeks in the Crown Office.

53,292. What is your opinion on the question of a fixed age limit for retirement?—I myself am in favour of an age limit for retirement of the clerks, provided, of course, that at the time a man is appointed he knows there is that fixed age limit; or, if any other steps are taken, that there is compensation, because if a man has served many years it would be hard on him if he were forced to retire unexpectedly. Generally speaking, I am in favour of there being a fixed age limit. A man has performed, presumably, for many years the same routine of business.

53,293. Would you suggest the usual Civil Service limit, which is that a man may retire on a pension at 60, and must retire at 65 with possible exceptions?—Yes. Dealing with the "may retire," I do not know quite about the clerks in the law courts now. I thought that they might. But for compulsory retirement I should be inclined to say 65 years. Not that by that I mean to say for a moment that I do not think there are men above 65 who are extremely competent and extraordinarily able, but, dealing with it as a general proposition, I am in favour of 65.

53,294. What do you say on the same question with regard to the masters themselves?—I am only one master and there are many. I am inclined to think that an age limit is advisable; whether necessarily the same age limit, as low as 65, I am inclined to doubt. The average master is appointed very much later in life than the clerks, and one of my reasons for favouring retirement at 65 is that the man has served so many years in the one office, which would not apply to the master until he got to be a very old man.

53,295. Several witnesses who have expressed themselves in favour of an age limit for retirement in the case of masters have suggested that 70 would be a proper age in their case?—Yes, expressing merely my personal opinion, I do not disagree with that at all.

53,296. Will you tell us now about the Court of Criminal Appeal and your duties in relation to that court?—Under the Act and the rules I have a number of duties cast upon me, but you want the actual thing rather than the technical thing?

53,297. Yes?—First of all the notice of appeal is received in the registrar's office, and he is responsible for getting all the papers and everything proper ready to lay the application before either a single judge or, as the case may be, before the full Court. The first few steps are probably matters I never hear of now and have not to deal with. When the necessary papers have been obtained, that is to say, the indictment, depositions, transcript, and such like papers, it is the duty of the registrar or the assistant registrar to read them all and to make a note of points in the form of an informal report, so that the judge's time, or the time of the court, need not be unnecessarily wasted in reading through papers that are quite unnecessary. I think I may say I have had some experience of this court, at any rate, and the amount of immaterial and irrelevant matter sent in is enormous. The making of that note or report by the registrar, or by the assistant registrar, is a duty that takes a very considerable time. Of course, in some long cases it often takes a day. The shortest case that I know of takes almost an hour or so. I happened this morning to have, in my opinion, an extraordinarily frivolous appeal, but there were a considerable number of papers to read through, and I formed my opinion early; but I wished to be certain that there was nothing important. In this case, as is usual, I should think, in 90 per cent. of the cases we get, the appellant was not represented by any solicitor or counsel, and I certainly regard it as my duty to read everything to see if there is any possible point that ought reasonably to be brought to the notice of the judge—never mind whether the man raises it or not. When that is done, probably in most of the cases I have to decide—when I say I, I mean the assistant registrar assists, but I have myself, in fact, to decide—whether an appeal is an appeal which ought to go at once to the full Court, or as an application. If it has to go to the full Court, the public are put to a certain amount of expense at once, because the prosecution are represented. If the case goes to a single judge it is refused or granted, and we have to notify the appellants—that is work done in the office, but it requires careful attention—of the result. He is entitled then to appeal to the full Court, and a certain number of them do appeal. Over 30 per cent. of the appellants never come into the court at all, that is to say, as far as the public know; they know nothing about it, because they abandon their appeals after the application has been refused by the judge. I am responsible for seeing that the proper people are notified. When the case comes into court, I have to see that the papers that are properly necessary are ready. Of course, I do exercise a certain amount of supervision there. If it is a case I have not personally read for the note, I always see the case and go through it—and I am going through them now for the next court day. When that is complete we have to notify, I think, five different people, on an official notification, of the result of the appeals. I am just roughly stating duties to give the Commission an idea of the work. In addition to that, a very large number of these cases really call for an inquiry, not only in the interest of the appellant, but in the interest of the public generally, because if an appellant makes some statement which, on quite simple inquiry from me, turns out to be absolutely unfounded, he would not be given leave to appeal; but otherwise, if he got leave, the country would be put to very considerable expense, because the country has to pay for the prosecution being present, and the expense is certainly considerable. There are few cases where there are not some inquiries to be made—letters written and inquiries of that kind. I, myself, find that my work as registrar is very considerable. I have an assistant registrar, and I do not think one could have a better assistant registrar, but I, in fact, deal, in the manner I have mentioned about making the report, with well over 20 per cent. of the cases in the first place. The work of dealing with those necessitates my dealing with them on at least two Saturdays out of three in the sittings, when a messenger takes papers to my house, which I deal with in a considerable part of the intervening space between Saturday and Monday. To do this with any sort of satisfaction only to myself, I have to be at my office before 10 o'clock in the morning, meeting the principal clerk, who brings me, on my directions, any letter that raises any matter in the least out of the common or any appeal of any peculiar importance or that may be of importance. I always see him at 10 o'clock, or a few minutes before, in my room at the Crown Office.

Mr. LEONARD WILLIAM KERSHAW.

53,298. Am I right in gathering that your duties as registrar of the Court of Criminal Appeal are the most onerous and heavy of the duties of the various offices you hold?—Yes, I should say they are. The duties of the registrar are absolutely cast upon me by statute. In the statute and the rules it is upon me that the duty is cast, and, speaking quite personally, I feel that it is a real responsibility.

53,300. You think the registrarship ought to be a separate office?—I think it ought to be a separate office, and that the registrar ought to be able to devote the whole of his time to the Court of Criminal Appeal. If there is not work sufficient for two, there is, without any qualification, too much work for one man. I certainly do not want to overstate it, but I do not think there is sufficient work in normal times for a registrar and an assistant registrar. I think the registrar ought to have the first opportunity of devoting his whole time to the work, and should have an assistant, who, I think, quite conceivably and quite easily might be able to assist either the other masters or the master of the Crown Office, if necessary.

53,301. Your staff in the Criminal Appeal Office is not large?—No, my staff in the Criminal Appeal Office, if I may describe it in that way, is 6 minus 1. The staff has been reduced, and was reduced in 1912 when a vacancy arose. I said that in my opinion it was not necessary to fill it; though the work had not decreased, it had been more organised. Mr. Short, who is, or was, the senior second class clerk in the Criminal Appeal Office, was lent to the Poor Persons Department—the department formed for giving legal aid in Civil matters to poor persons. Mr. Short was lent with my consent to that department temporarily in April last for some of his time, and, in July last, for all of his time, but temporarily. I regret to say that that temporary work is still running, and I have found very considerable inconvenience in consequence of it, but of course I have had to put extra responsibilities upon the next clerk. I had in that office arranged the work distinctly upon the ground of the second class and the third class in this sense, that I divided all the cases into two divisions of the alphabet, and I made one second class clerk responsible for one division with a third class clerk to help him in both cases. Since the temporary loan of Mr. Short, I have had to put the actual responsibility on a third class clerk.

53,302. That office is not part of the Central Office?—No, it is not part of it at all.

53,303. Do your general remarks about the quality of the clerks, and their method of appointment and so forth, apply to the staff in the Criminal Appeal Office?—My remarks as to the quality of the men certainly apply to all the offices I am concerned with, and about which I can speak with personal knowledge of the men. I think as a class in all three offices it would be impossible to get better. You asked me about the registrarship being a separate appointment. It seems to me that that could be carried out at present without any increase of cost and that it would be far more convenient. It is far more convenient in the Registrars' Office, but in the Crown Office and the Associates Department it would be far more convenient that there should be one master to actually have the responsibility for those departments. In my opinion the work that Master Lawford has now, of arranging the lists and the sittings of the judges, ought to be work actually done by the master who occupied that position, and who would be the actual head of the Crown Office and the Associates Department. I feel convinced that it is a far more businesslike arrangement, because at present Master Lawford and myself have continually to be seeing each other to know what the arrangements are. For Divisional Courts we supply men to take the court from the Crown Office; we are continually running about seeing each other. If one man did it all that would, in my opinion, be a very much better arrangement. The work that Master Lawford does now would, I think, with the ordinary Civil work of the master of the Crown Office that I do now, make a full amount of work for one master. At present I do not suggest that the work that I do as master in the Crown Office, purely and simply, is sufficient work for one master; but I think the work that Master Lawford does, as my assistant, would make that quite possible. I have often thought, myself, with the offices that I hold, that, if I had not both an assistant master in Master Lawford and an assistant registrar in Mr. Lawrance, who are absolutely willing—and two more able and better men to help me I cannot imagine—if there was any difficulty between me and either of those assistants I think it would be an almost hopeless position. I think it is a much more businesslike arrangement myself, and if it should ever come to any question that I had to choose between the offices I am bound to say, whichever I choose, I should be very very sorry to leave the other, but I think I ought to suggest it to the Commission.

Mr. LEONARD WILLIAM KERSHAW.

53,304. The net result of your suggestion, if I understand it rightly, would be, that the number of officers would remain the same, but that an assistant mastership would be converted into a mastership?—Yes, that would be so. One assistant master would be converted into a mastership.

53,305. And that new mastership, which would take the place of the assistant mastership, would combine the present duties of the assistant master and of the Crown Office that you discharge?—That is so, and I believe myself, when you get the actual head of an office like the Criminal Appeal Office or any office like that, the probabilities are that the result is economy rather than otherwise.

53,306. What is the arrangement as regards your typewriting and copying at present?—In the Crown Office the question does not arise. There is a considerable amount to be done in the Criminal Appeal Office, and that is a matter I hope one day to see improved. We have a very considerable amount of copying to be done. Every notice of appeal has to be copied.

53,307. Is that done at present in the Central Scrivenery Department?—It is. It, of course, means that I have to send that notice of appeal, which is an original document, and, in fact, when I first send it, the only document in existence, to be copied in another department. Most excellently they do it in the Scrivenery Department, but the anxiety I feel about it is that a small boy has to take that original document away. I have a system which I was, I think, responsible for suggesting, by which we make a little note in a proper book of the documents sent, and a counterfoil is sent down with the documents, so that if it should get lost there we can trace where it is, and it is sent in a locked bag, so that if the small boy wants to turn head over heels on his way the document has a certain amount of chance of arriving.

53,308. Have you any shorthand writers at your disposal?—No; every letter that we write has to be written. If I write it myself I write out a rough draft of the letter, and either have that copied in the Criminal Appeal Office, or, if necessary, send it to be typed, if I want a typewritten copy in the Scrivenery Department.

53,309. Would a shorthand typist be of great use to you for the notes that you speak of, which you prepare for the duties of the Court of Criminal Appeal?—Immense use. In practice, if that goes to a single judge only, he has my own manuscript note.

53,310. Would it be a convenience to you in preparing those notes if you could dictate them?—Certainly it would. It takes a long time to do it now.

53,311. Would not that be a great saving of time?—A great saving of time. Then those notes are always copied if the case goes to the full Court, and there is a typewritten copy for each judge, and if he wishes to refer to it at all it is there.

53,312. If you had a shorthand typist to whom to dictate those notes, half a dozen copies could be struck off at the same time?—It would be an immense saving. It would not save me much time personally at present, because I am afraid a very considerable amount of my work as registrar I do at my house. The Crown Office work is a great deal of my work, and one is so continually interrupted, that when I am doing a long case, I often find I have had to take it away and do it at home. Even then, if I had a shorthand typist, I should have to dictate to him—and it would have to be "him" in the Criminal Appeal Office—some time on Monday morning. Copies of the documents in every case have to be made for the judges.

53,313. (Sir John Kempe.) You said that the work done in the Crown office was in your opinion very important for two reasons, the variety of the work and the extreme technicality of a great part of it. Then you went on to say that you thought that the technicality of the Crown Office practice might, with advantage, be very considerably reduced. How far does that technicality depend upon your own practice in the office?—It does not depend upon me at all.

53,314. What is there that is technical?—It would have to be reduced by new Crown Office Rules.

53,315. It depends upon the rules?—It depends upon the rules.

53,316. Are those rules important? Why have they grown up? I suppose there is some necessity for them?—I speak with hesitation, because it was long before my time, but originally you had to get the practice from an enormous number of statutes. I think it was in 1886 when the Crown Office Rules were drawn up, and those Crown Office Rules were the summary of not all the statutes, but of most of the statutes affecting the Crown practice. But they did not amend it. I am speaking of the time when I was only just called to the Bar and had nothing whatever to do with this. Those rules are technical, and the whole practice is. You cannot always go to the rules, and you sometimes have to go outside the rules altogether—to the original statutes. Those rules were redrawn in 1906, and our present rules are the Crown Office Rules of 1906, and they are technical, and the practice generally is a technical practice.

53,317. In fact, you could not alter it without altering the law?—It would be altering the law. I think myself it could be altered to a very considerable extent by altering the rules. I have not considered how far it could be done by rules, and how far statute would be necessary. But I am quite sure that it could be simplified. I think I remember reading some time ago that a Royal Commission in a Report of, I think, 1874 or 1879, expressed the pious hope that the Crown practice then would be considerably simplified. I think it is very much the same now. I think the tendency of all courts now is that there should be less technicality than in days heretofore.

53,318. There would be no possibility of bringing your practice nearer to the other courts as you say you have very little to do with the other courts. You say the office work is quite distinct from the work in other departments, and the work does not bring you in connection with the other departments. You could not get rid of your technicality by bringing yourself nearer the other departments?—We have to do with all the courts, but I do not think the abolition of technicality would bring us nearer the other departments, except in this sense, that, of course, if the practice in the Crown Office was perfectly simple and was little more than routine work, then I do think that one of my difficulties that I have referred to as to the interchangeability of the clerks would be either abolished or modified.

53,319. Still, I gather from you that it is not within practical politics to suppose you ever could bring them together because you cannot get rid of the Crown Office practice and technicalities?—Not while the technicality of the procedure exists.

53,320. And that you cannot get rid of?—That I certainly cannot get rid of. It would have to be done by, at any rate, the judges or statute—I do not know which.

53,321. You might as well, I suppose, alter the technicalities of Chancery—it is the same sort of thing?—I should think so, but I would rather not express any opinion about Chancery practice.

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-EIGHTH DAY.

Thursday, 22nd April 1915.

PRESENT :

SIR HENRY BABINGTON SMITH, K.C.B., C.S.I. (Chairman).

Sir JOHN ARROW KEMPE, K.C.B.
Mr. ARTHUR BOUTWOOD.
Mr. CECIL COWARD.

Mr. ARTHUR EVERETT SHIPLEY, F.R.S.
Mr. GRAHAM WALLAS.
Mr. E. W. H. MILLAR (Secretary).

Mr. ARTHUR LABRON LOWE (Registrar of the Birmingham County Court), called and examined.

53,322. (Chairman.) You are registrar of the Birmingham County Court?—I am.

53,323. And you are also district registrar of the Birmingham District Registry of the High Court?—Yes, my colleague and I. There are two registrars of the County Court, and we are both district registrars of the High Court.

53,324. You are also President of the Association County Court Registrars?—I am.

53,325. Does that association comprise the whole of the registrars?—No; I reckon that there are 500 registrars, and 378 of them are members of the association.

53,326. How long have you held the post of registrar of the County Court?—I was appointed on the 9th January 1905.

53,327. What had been your experience before that?—I was a solicitor practising at Birmingham. I was a partner in one of the large firms in Birmingham.

53,328. (Mr. Coward.) What firm?—Messrs. Johnson, Barelay, Johnson, and Lowe it was in those days.

53,329. (Chairman.) We have already had from a previous witness a statement which, I think, is sufficient for our purpose, as to the nature of the County Court jurisdiction. I will not ask you, therefore, to deal with those points which you have set out in a convenient way in the first pages of your précis, but I will ask you to begin by telling us about the duties of the registrar. Is it the case that, taking the work numerically by the number of matters dealt with, a very large proportion of the work of the Court is done by the registrar?—Yes, there is no doubt about that.

53,330. What would be the percentages dealt with by the judge and the registrar respectively?—I have calculated it from the Government returns, and I find 1 per cent. of the cases are dealt with by the judge; 26·3 are disposed of by the registrar; 36·3 are undefended defaults and judgments on confession; and 36·4 are cases struck out or otherwise disposed of and do not come before the Court.

53,331. I suppose those percentages could hardly be taken as accurately representing the amount of work which is disposed of by you and the judge as judged by its importance?—No, I am not suggesting that for a moment.

53,332. The cases going to the judge would be far more important?—Those percentages are simply numerical.

53,333. What are the duties of the registrar?—The main duties of a registrar may be put under two headings—judicial and administrative.

53,334. Dealing first with the judicial duties, what are they?—They are in court and in chambers. In court we have to dispose of a certain number of cases every day. In normal times in Birmingham we deal with 60 default summonses and 300 ordinary summonses a day. We put down 100 for each half-hour. We begin at 10 o'clock and it takes till half-past 10 to deal with the default summonses. Then we deal with ordinary summonses, 100 each half-hour, which takes till 12.

53,335. I am struck with the rapidity with which you dispose of these summonses—100 in half an hour?—I thought you would be. Sometimes we do not dispose of more than 50.

53,336. (Mr. Coward.) The usher calls out the name of the case, the defendant does not appear, and you say "Judgment for the plaintiff," and that settles it?—Yes, the plaintiff or his representative proves the debt, and we say the amount per month the defendant has to pay.

53,337. (Chairman.) You are speaking not of default summonses?—Ordinary summonses. A man may enter 100 cases in a batch, so there is no time lost in going backwards and forwards into the witness-box; he is in the box for the whole batch. The usher calls out the case, the defendant does not appear, or he may have written and sent a consent. If he has not sent a consent, one has to make an order of so much a month. The plaintiff may ask for, say, 5s. a month, and you have to look at the papers to see what the man is; whether he is a labourer, say, and if he is, you say, "5s. is too much—3s.," and that is, from practice, done very quickly.

53,338. Does the defendant appear in a large proportion of those cases?—Not in a large proportion. In money-lending cases the defendants very often appear. In the ordinary grocery and drapery cases the plaintiff now very often gets the consent of the defendants, who sign a form of consent: "I admit I owe the plaintiff so much, and I offer to pay so much a month." Of course those cases are gone through very rapidly, because there is nothing that one has to exercise one's brains upon at all.

53,339. Besides that you have the Bankruptcy work?—That comes in the afternoon, and there is chamber work. I do not know whether, if I give you an account of what we do in a day, that would be convenient to you. The registrar who is sitting in court in the way I have described, disposes of those cases up till 12 o'clock, and the defended work takes him generally till half-past 1 or 2. The other registrar goes into the court with the judge at half-past 10 when the judge sits.

53,340. Does the judge sit every day at Birmingham?—Yes, the same time as the registrar does, but not on a Saturday. He is with the judge until 12 o'clock, when the judge gets on to defended work. We are always with the judge when dealing with applications. The judge does not want a registrar when engaged on defended work, and the registrar goes into chambers and deals with ex-parte applications at 12 o'clock until half-past 12 or a quarter to 1, depending on the number. Probably after that there are some appointments. In the afternoon the registrar who was with the judge may have a Bankruptcy court for hearing public examinations, which begins at half-past 2, and that may go on till 4 or 5. The Bankruptcy work having fallen off, we have not had so many lately. The other registrar at a quarter-past 2 deals with High Court summonses and other matters dealt with on appointment, such as taxations, and similar matters.

53,341. There is a clear distinction, I suppose, between his sittings as registrar of the High Court and as registrar of the County Court?—As registrar of the High Court we sit in the same room as chambers. We do not sit in court for that at all.

53,342. It is in the same room, but a different list is called on?—In the same room at a different time; the High Court work is always taken at a quarter-past 2.

53,343. What do you say as regards the administrative work?—I have set out in my précis the different things we do in chambers.

22 April 1915.]

MR. ARTHUR LABRON LOWE.

53,344. I think we need not go into the details?—Ours is a large court and we have to divide it up into departments; we divide it into the staff office, the plaint office, the money office, the district registry and bankruptcy office, and the copying office. I have set out the main work that is done in each of those departments.

53,345. I understand that the staff office deals with general clerical work?—Yes, general correspondence. We have about 300 letters a day to deal with.

53,346. The plaint office deals with the steps in an action prior to hearing?—Yes.

53,347. The money office is a name which speaks for itself. It deals with all the book-keeping and the receipt and payment of money?—Yes. We have to have accounts in most of those cases, and all money in the County Court is, theoretically, paid into court and paid out.

53,348. The monetary transactions are extremely numerous, but simple in character?—Yes. An order is made, say, in an ordinary debt-collecting case, to pay 5s. a month; the defendant pays this money in and it has to be accounted for by the registrar, and is paid out to the plaintiff on production of what we call the plaint note, which is the plaintiff's title to any money that may be in court.

53,349. Then with regard to the district registry and bankruptcy office, is that a department dealing partly with the work appertaining to the district registry of the High Court, and partly with the work of the County Court in matters of bankruptcy?—Yes, and in the case of administration orders and workmen's compensation cases, we find it convenient to do it in that way. Although we are district registrars of the High Court, we manage the district registry as part of the whole County Court system, and the clerks are all part of the County Court staff.

53,350. That is to say you have not separate clerks appointed exclusively for the district registry work, but that work is transacted by clerks who also do County Court work, and are part of the same staff as the clerks engaged solely on County Court work?—Yes; I want to make that clear. The head clerk in the district registry only deals with High Court work, but tomorrow, if it fell off, he might be brought in to do County Court work.

53,351. Is there free transfer of clerks between the different departments of the office?—Yes; we begin with boys coming in after they leave school. They go first of all into the staff office, under the care of the chief clerk, and get into the ordinary business ways of the office, and from there they go to one of the other departments, and are moved up from one department where they may be juniors, to another department where there may be a vacancy, our object being that they shall see the work of all the different departments as they progress up the scale.

53,352. Do you find that system advantageous?—We find it most advantageous.

53,353. Do you find that there is any difficulty caused by the fact that a clerk, when moved into one of these departments for the first time, does not know the work of that department, and has to learn it?—Not at all.

53,354. It does not take him long to learn it?—No.

53,355. Is that the case with the district registry work as well as the County Court work?—When a man is new he has to learn the work like anything else, but he does not find any difficulty. He would not be put straight away to the head of the district registry department or of one of the County Court departments; he would have been junior in the district registry before he got to that.

53,356. But you find no difficulty in teaching him his work as junior in each department in turn?—No; just as in a small court, I presume, they would not have these different departments, and having only a few clerks they would have to do the whole work of the office.

53,357. What is the arrangement as regards copying work?—There we employ girls. We now have six girls. They live in a room which the Treasury built at the top of the court. They have a big room to themselves, and they do practically all the copying work.

53,358. Do you find that they do that work satisfactorily?—Yes, quite.

53,359. Do the ushers do a certain amount of the filing work?—They do now. At one time they did not, but now we have commissionaires, and we find they are very capable men, and when not engaged in court—and for a good deal of their time they are not—they do ordinary clerical work.

53,360. What kind of work?—Copying work. They help to copy the summonses, and they look after the papers. We have an enormous number of papers. Every paper has to be filed so that it can be got at in the least possible time in its own particular matter. When we are dealing with 50,000 cases in a year it means a considerable amount of work to keep the papers in order so that they can be turned up. The judge may ask for a paper at any time.

53,361. Do you find that a satisfactory arrangement?—Yes, they do that work very well indeed. We have had very much less trouble with the papers since we put them on to do the work.

53,362. Turning to the question of remuneration, you have given in your précis a statement of the remuneration of the registrars, and the allowance for clerks and ushers at Birmingham, for the last three years. I propose to put that on the notes as it stands.* I observe from that that you do not expend the whole of the allowance for clerks and ushers?—No, we do not. We are trustees, really, of the money for the Treasury, and if we can do it for a bit less we do it. Mr. Bridgeman quite understands and trusts us to do it, and we do it to the best of our ability.

53,363. That is an advantage, because if you keep a little in hand it enables you to give increments to clerks where you think it is required?—Yes, and enables us to reward any special service. I notice that in 1914 we had 200*l.* in hand; in 1913 we had 38*l.* in hand. Mr. Bridgeman never says to us: "I am going to reduce your clerk hire because you have not spent it all," or anything like that. He knows perfectly well that we do it as well as we can.

53,364. You also give a statement of the remuneration of the registrar at Rochester?—Yes; he kindly sent it to me, and I thought it might be useful to the Commission.

53,365. Is not the Rochester Court a court with over 6,000 plaintiffs?—It was over that number two years ago, but for the last two years it has been under 6,000 plaintiffs.

53,366. I see the registrar's salary amounted in 1912 to 876*l.*?—Yes.

* The following is the statement:—

Mr. ARTHUR LABRON LOWE.

53,367. Is that his net salary?—Yes, I imagine that would be his net salary. He would not have to pay any clerks out of that.

53,368. I thought the net salaries were limited to 700*l.* a year. Is not that the case?—Yes, it is limited to 700*l.* Then there are the Schedule B fees.

53,369. Does that include the Schedule B fees?—I suppose the explanation is that that includes the Schedule B fees.

53,370. You have also given us a statement of the rate of remuneration of the clerks in your office?—Yes.

53,371. I see your chief clerk receives 600*l.* a year as remuneration?—Yes.

53,372. There are seven officers receiving 300*l.* a year or over?—Yes.

53,373. And the remainder—the great majority—receive salaries of between 100*l.* and 200*l.* a year?—Yes.

53,374. While there are five, I think, who have salaries under 100*l.* a year?—Yes, they are comparatively young.

53,375. Those, I suppose, are young men just beginning their service?—Yes, boys, and those who are working up. All those I think you would find would be under 21. Boys come to us at 5*s.* a week; we raise them the first year 5*l.*, the second year 8*l.*; the third year 10*l.*, and the fourth year another 10*l.* If the boy stays on with us—he usually does—he is generally receiving about 25*s.* a week when he is 21. That is how it works out.

53,376. What are the salaries of the girls in the typewriting department?—It is not a typewriting department, but a copying department. Very few of them type, only two. It is nearly all hand work; they copy these summonses.

53,377. Is it not possible to do that by typewriting?—Very few of them do typewriting. They have to be duplicated, and it is mostly done by writing.

53,378. But duplication is surely much more easily done by typewriting than in handwriting?—The Treasury, I think, only allows us two typewriters. As a matter of fact all the summonses are copied by hand.

53,379. Would not it be economical and convenient that they should be typewritten?—I think we once applied to the Treasury for another typewriter, and they did not see their way to grant it.

53,380. In your opinion would it be advantageous to use typewriting to a greater extent?—No, I think it is done in the best way now. I do not think we could improve it.

53,381. Have you experimented at all with the rate of work in typewriting and handwriting?—No, not in copying the summonses.

53,382. We have had it in evidence that as regards copying a continuous document, the rate of typewriting is something like double that of handwriting. In the case of a discontinuous document no doubt the difference would not be so great; but would not it be worth while experimenting to see whether there is not a similar advantage in the case of your documents?—We might try to see if it is so. I will put it before my colleague. A summons is a discontinuous document. First of all, there is the name of the plaintiff, his address, and description; then the defendant's name, address, and description, and certain other particulars are filled in in a printed form.

53,383. (Mr. Coward.) It is filling up forms rather than copying?—Yes. It is not copying in the sense of it being continuous. It is filling in the name and address of the plaintiff and defendant. I expect time would be lost in adjusting the machine to get at the right lines, and that sort of thing.

53,384. (Chairman.) Possibly; but the document, you said, has to be produced in duplicate?—Yes, we have a carbon in between.

53,385. When it is done in handwriting you duplicate it by means of carbons?—Yes. The girls come to us at a salary of 10*s.* a week, which is double what the boys get. They advance for the first year by 2*s.* a week, and each subsequent year by 1*s.* a week, until they reach their maximum, for the ordinary girls, of 20*s.* a week. On page 24 of my précis you will see Miss Wilde gets 78*l.* a year as head of the department.

Miss Hamilton does some rather special work as well as the ordinary copying, and Miss Smith is a shorthand writer as well as a copyist, and does a good deal of the correspondence. We reckon that the ordinary maximum is 52*l.* a year.

53,386. Turning now to the question of appointment, what is the statutory qualification of a registrar?—Five years' standing as a solicitor of the Supreme Court.

53,387. By whom is the appointment made?—By the judge, with the consent of the Lord Chancellor.

53,388. Speaking generally, are registrars selected, as you yourself were, from among practising solicitors?—I believe so. I should think in the great majority of cases they are selected from solicitors practising locally.

53,389. In your opinion, is that the right source from which to select registrars?—Yes, I believe that is the proper way to do it.

53,390. The suggestion has been made that the appointment should be made not by the judge but by the Lord Chancellor, or other central authority. What is your opinion on that suggestion?—I can only say that I do not think it would be a good thing. I think the present practice has worked very well. I am bound to say that there is a general feeling in the country that if the appointments were placed with the Lord Chancellor the local candidates would stand little chance, and the appointments would be more likely to go to London men. After all, there is a very personal relationship between the judge and his registrar, a great deal more so than between the High Court judges and their masters; and I think it is very right that the judge should appoint somebody who is acceptable to him. I should like to say that Mr. Coley, who is a member of the Committee of the Law Society, writes to me that he thoroughly agrees with this paragraph in my précis: "So do all of us," he says. I believe the Council of the Law Society take the same view.

53,391. Your clerks and officers are appointed by yourself?—Yes.

53,392. Do you consider that any legal experience is desirable there?—I do not think so; certainly not when they come to us as boys. The experience they want is the experience they gain by passing up through the office. After all, in Birmingham we should very much resent any clerk deciding any legal point; he would be called over the coals very much if he did. Any novel point we should expect to be brought to us.

53,393. You find no difficulty in taking in boys as you do, without any legal experience, and training them up in the office?—No; at that age they would not have any legal experience. They want experience of the office.

53,394. (Mr. Coward.) Discipline?—Yes, and business habits. I think it is altogether a mistake to say that these clerks want legal experience and legal knowledge.

53,395. (Chairman.) Do you find any difficulty in getting suitable candidates?—None.

53,396. How do you get them?—By advertisement; and we might have five applications, or about that number, for one vacancy. We advertised for two girls the other day, and had over 100 applications.

53,397. From what class are they drawn mainly?—The boys are the sons of superior clerks, or clerks in solicitors' offices, and commercial gentlemen who are managers of departments—the ordinary clerk class.

53,398. What has been their education generally?—The School Board.

53,399. At what age do you take them?—Fourteen.

53,400. You take them at the end of their primary education, and before they have been to a secondary school?—Yes. When I was in practice I found that the best class of clerk was the boy who came from the Bluecoat School. They had been so much better taught, and had better manners, we used to think when I was in practice.

53,401. How do you decide between the applicants in reply to your advertisements?—The chief clerk holds an examination in which he tests their handwriting and their capacity for doing work. Then he brings up the result to us, and we decide.

Mr. ARTHUR LABRON LOWE.

53,402. After they have entered the office do you encourage any further study or education?—Yes, we are very anxious about that, because it really improves them so much. We have not had many, but we have had several who sat for an examination held by a society known as the Chartered Institute of Secretaries. It gives them something to do after their office hours.

53,403. Do they attend evening classes to prepare for that examination?—Yes, some do attend evening classes. We have such classes in connection with our Midland Institute at Birmingham, and also technical classes.

53,404. Can you say whether the practice in other courts is similar to the practice in yours as regards the method of recruitment?—No; I should not like to say it is exactly, but my colleagues on the Committee of the Registrars Association tell me that they generally fill up their vacancies from clerks in solicitors' offices or accountants' offices. I do not know that it is the same practice, probably not, in smaller courts.

53,405. In smaller courts do you think they would be more likely to take men from solicitors' offices?—Older men, I think.

53,406. When the clerks have once come to you, do they practically remain with you permanently?—Yes, they very seldom leave. Looking through my list, I see that some three or four have left and gone elsewhere.

53,407. Was that to better themselves?—Yes. One of them obtained a secretarial appointment with the Marquess of Anglesey. That was a better thing than stopping on. Two left because they were dishonest. Another was consumptive, and had to go out to South Africa; he died there, poor chap. Two others set up in a motor business. Another obtained a very good appointment in a commercial office in Birmingham. Those are all, out of our staff of something like 42 men and boys, who have left since 1912.

53,408. Apart from cases of misconduct, do you ever find it necessary to dispense with the services of clerks?—No. Since my appointment I can only think of three cases, and they were appointed under an old system before we had this system of examination. We really put it to them that their vocation was not the Birmingham County Court, and that they would do better elsewhere. They showed no promise of progression at all. You are bound to hit on those people sometimes, but there have only been three cases since my appointment 10 years ago.

53,409. In the case of a change of registrar, what happens? Does the new registrar ever appoint a new staff?—I should think not. I cannot imagine that he ever would do so. He is new to the work, except for just the experience that he has as a practising solicitor. I can only imagine one case where he would be likely to dispense with the staff, and that would be where the work was so small that it took one clerk a portion of his time—in very small cases. Where there was anything of a staff, I imagine that the registrar would never dispense with it.

53,410. You think that the staff need have no apprehensions as regards the security of their position from that point of view?—That is my opinion, except in cases of very small registries, where a new registrar might be appointed and might be a practising solicitor who would look upon the place as simply almost an annexe to his office, and might very well then dispense with a clerk who was doing the work and let one of his own clerks do it.

53,411. Have you known any case of that sort?—I have not. Thinking it over, that is the only exception I could think of.

53,412. Do you think it desirable that the appointment of the clerks should remain with the registrar?—As long as the present system stands and the registrars are made personally responsible for the work and the honesty of their clerks, I think—and my colleagues of the Registrars Association agree—that the registrar should have the right of selection and complete control over those clerks. We are now personally responsible for anything that a clerk does, and in big courts it is a big responsibility. It is very easy to get a payment posted to the wrong account, and a man comes in and finds apparently a payment has not been made, and it follows from that very likely that an execution may be issued when it is not issuable, and the registrar is then in for an action for damages.

53,413. (Mr. Coward.) And you have to pay?—And we have to pay. There is no defence.

53,414. (Chairman.) Have you ever had to pay since you have been a registrar?—Small sums. We have never had to pay large sums.

53,415. Does it often happen that a registrar has to pay any large sum?—I have never known a large sum being paid. I know the registrar at Barnet had to pay something like 50*l.* not very long ago.

53,416. (Mr. Coward.) They are small sums with which you deal?—Yes. When a man gets an execution in, when it ought not to have been put in, it is the one thing which damns him for the rest of his life.

53,417. You never knew that?—I have known a man say it.

53,418. You have never known a registrar held responsible for such a thing?—Yes, that is what they hold us responsible for.

53,419. Have you known such a case?—Yes, we have paid where execution has been wrongfully issued. It is so easy to do it. A man comes in and pays 3*s.*, and it is entered in the cash-book and posted to the wrong account. You cannot always get it right. The plaintiff comes in and says, "Jones has not paid the 3*s.*, issue execution," when he has paid and it has gone to the wrong account. Execution is issued wrongly and we have to pay. It is quite a responsibility.

53,420. (Chairman.) The clerks remain permanently, and for promotion have to look to the process of moving up in the office as vacancies occur?—Yes.

53,421. The selection for promotion is, of course, as the original appointment is, with the registrar?—Yes.

53,422. Do you move them up by seniority, or do you select by merit?—We select by merit. We think seniority might be the deciding factor if two men were practically equal, but it is the last thing we should go by.

53,423. You do not often move up a man who is considerably junior to the one over whose head he passes?—No, we very seldom pass them over, but it may happen between two men, one of whom is a bit older than the other.

53,424. Then you do not carry merit further than this, that as between two men of approximately the same standing you would choose the better?—Yes, we should choose the man whom we thought the better without reference to seniority, but if the two men were of about equal merit we should give the senior the preference.

53,425. If you had a man decidedly junior but of outstanding merit, would you put him over the heads of half a dozen clerks senior to him?—Yes, I should not hesitate if I thought him the best man.

53,426. For appointment, say, as chief clerk, you might take a man who was four, five, or six places down the office if you thought him the best man?—Yes, I am sure we should not hesitate if we thought him the best man.

53,427. Does that often happen or does promotion in practice follow seniority?—It is much more likely to follow seniority, because they have worked up and know the work of the office.

53,428. In fact it is more a matter of theory than practice?—Yes, but I say at once that I should not hesitate to do it if I thought the best man was the junior. I should like to explain that by having the copying department we eliminate all those people whose work is not progressive, so really the appointments, when they become vacant, are always confined to men and boys, and girls do not get any forwarder; they keep always in the copying department.

53,429. It results from that that your clerks having better work to do probably have a better scale of salaries generally than if the copying work was done by the clerks?—Yes, because the copying department is run cheaply.

53,430. (Mr. Boutwood.) Do not you mean that that system of relegating men to the copying department in itself is a sort of preliminary selection?—I mean, by having these copying clerks, they cannot get any forwarder—not beyond the copying stage—so when an appointment becomes vacant they are not candidates for that appointment.

MR. ARTHUR LABRON LOWE.

53,431. But your copying clerks are men or boys who have been weeded out of the other departments?—No, the copying clerks are these girls and the ushers who are not candidates for anything better. The men and boy clerks are not copyists at all.

53,432. (Chairman.) Turning to the question of organisation, do you consider that the union of the district registry and the County Court registry, both as regards the registrars and as regards the staff, is a satisfactory arrangement?—Yes, I do.

53,433. Will you explain your reasons for considering it satisfactory?—In Birmingham we issue something like 2,500 writs in a year, and there would not be enough work for one man to be High Court registrar. We find that we can work it in with our other work, and by doing it in that way there is perhaps enough work for the two registrars to perform, and of course they delegate the purely clerical work to the staff.

53,434. You do not find any inconvenience in having too large a scope of work by the union of the two offices?—No, I do not find any inconvenience. We take it alternately, one registrar deals with the High Court one day and the other registrar deals with the High Court the next day, and so on. We work it so that it does not clash with the County Court work.

53,435. You find it convenient to have a united staff for the purpose?—Yes. I have no doubt about that whatever.

53,436. Would it be convenient to go further and unite the probate registry with the other two registries?—That of course would be only in the smaller places. My colleague would say that he thought it might even be done in Birmingham. In smaller places I have no doubt it would be convenient.

53,437. But you think it would not be convenient in larger places?—I think it would be less likely to be convenient.

53,438. (Mr. Coward.) Why?—Because I doubt very much whether a man would have time to do the work. I have no experience of probate registry work or what it amounts to.

53,439. Would there be any difficulty in doing it something in this way—that you should have somebody from the Principal Registry who understood all about the work to come down there and superintend and supervise all that class of work?—Then there would be no difficulty at all.

53,440. And I should have thought myself that you might have had one man who would do the whole thing with your assistance; you would only have to have another clerk or two?—We should have no difficulty then in doing it. I have no knowledge of how many grants Birmingham make in a year. I mean at present our time is pretty well filled up, and if it meant much more work I think there would be a little difficulty, but if it was only supervision there would be no difficulty.

53,441. (Chairman.) If you had a chief clerk who was thoroughly competent in the probate work, you think that the two present registrars could supervise it in addition to their present work?—Yes, I think so. Mr. Registrar Whitelock goes further than that and says he thinks we could do it anyhow.

53,442. In some of the smaller places you tell us that the probate registry is combined with the other two registries?—I am not sure whether it is actually done—no, I do not know that it is. The registrar at Norwich tells me that he thinks it would be very desirable. The registrar at Carmarthen tells me he thinks it would be desirable, and one or two other registrars have also told me the same thing, that they think it would be certainly very much cheaper, and there would be no difficulty at all in doing it. The registrars in smaller courts are not fully occupied in doing registrar's work. Their court, instead of sitting five days a week, sits one day a month or one day in two months.

53,443. They are not supposed to give their whole time?—No.

53,444. Are you required to give your whole time to the work?—Yes, we are bound to.

53,445. You are not allowed to practise otherwise?—No, we have orders from the Lord Chancellor to that effect.

53,446. Do you consider that any improvement in organisation could be made by abolishing or uniting some of the smaller courts?—I do, and I think it is really at the bottom of anything that is done to improve the County Court system. I do not think we shall do any good until we either abolish or amalgamate some of these smaller courts. May I instance the case of Birmingham. The judge at Birmingham is the judge at Solihull. Solihull is less than 10 miles from Birmingham. Nearly everybody who lives there works in Birmingham, and there is no reason at all why the Solihull work should not be done in Birmingham, and much more conveniently than sending the judge to Solihull.

53,447. (Mr. Coward.) It would be more convenient to everybody?—Quite so. There would be no waste of judicial time, because he would get a day's work; but you know there is an enormous waste of judicial time going a distance to try one undefended case and a couple of judgment summonses.

53,448. (Chairman.) If it is equally convenient to go to Birmingham why do any of the plaintiffs go to Solihull?—Because there is a question of jurisdiction. Probably there is not any jurisdiction in the Birmingham court, and they are bound to commence the proceedings there.

53,449. They go because they are bound to go there?—Yes, on the question of jurisdiction.

53,450. (Mr. Coward.) If the defendant resides within the Solihull district he would have to go there?—Yes, unless the cause of action arose wholly or in part in the Birmingham district.

53,451. (Chairman.) The original theory of the establishment of the County Courts was to place a court within ten miles of every person?—I have been told that was the idea.

53,452. But I gather from what you say that you do not attach importance to the continuance of that principle?—Not the slightest. That was in 1847, I believe; and things have altered a good deal since then.

53,453. Communications have, of course, improved since then?—Yes, and, besides, it is a different thing altogether. I put in my précis that the only dissentient voice was the registrar of Bristol, who thought it would not be possible, but does not give a reason. I have communicated with him since, and he says: "I think it would be advantageous. The difficulty would be in getting a clause, if it was necessary to have an Act passed through Parliament, conferring the power." Just in the same way, you know, probably, when it was proposed to abolish the assizes in some of the small towns, there was a great outcry about it.

53,454. His objection referred to a practical difficulty and not to principle?—He was in favour of it as a principle, and thought it would be advantageous.

53,455. (Mr. Coward.) You probably would have the same difficulty with regard to shutting up any of the County Courts and moving them, or amalgamating them, that you have with regard to the Assize Courts?—I think there would be. There are certain local strong powerful interests.

53,456. (Chairman.) If it was equally convenient to go to one of the larger centres, why should the local interests object?—There is the appointment of the registrar for one thing. I think the duke's or squire's tenants like to have a court close to them.

53,457. (Mr. Coward.) All the shopkeepers like to have people there, and the hotel-keeper likes to have them there for dinner?—Yes.

53,458. (Chairman.) Then it is rather the indirect considerations than the direct ones which would create a sentiment against the abolition of the smaller courts?—Yes. I think nobody could possibly say that it would not be advantageous to abolish a number of these courts.

53,459. Turning to the question of remuneration, the present system may be described, broadly, as a system of payment by results or piecework?—Yes, except in the larger courts.

MR. ARTHUR LABRON LOWE.

53,460. Except in the larger courts, where there are fixed salaries. Do you consider that the right system?—Personally I do not think it is an ideal system by any means. It does not affect us in Birmingham in any way, because we get our fixed salaries. I thought it might be helpful to the Commission to make inquiries from my colleagues on the Committee of the Registrars Association, and their opinion comes to this. I find that the general opinion appears to be that the system of payment by results is satisfactory on the whole, and that no other system could be applied where the work was not sufficient to occupy the registrar's whole time. Personally, I think it is a horrid system in a sense. May I instance the Courts Emergency Powers Act, where one has the power to remit the fees. A summons is taken out and it is not served. We in Birmingham always remit the fee, but it is rather horrid to put the registrar in the position of handing his half-crown over to the plaintiff. The fee belongs to him.

53,461. Is that one of the Schedule B fees?—Yes, it belongs to him, and if he remits it, he remits it out of his own pocket. I submit that that is wrong in principle. A man ought not to be put in the position of having to decide whether he shall hand over the money out of his own pocket to the plaintiff.

53,462. It was represented to us by one witness that the system of payment by results had contributed largely to the success of the County Court system, because it made everybody connected with the court, and the registrars in particular, anxious to serve the convenience of the public. Do you agree with that view?—I do, but I think there is another side to it: I think it leads a bit to touting for business. Cases come before me where leave to sue is sometimes granted in the smaller courts on affidavits founding the jurisdiction which ought not to be granted.

53,463. What do you mean by "touting for business"?—I should think, perhaps, the clerks might have their salary affected and would be glad to have as many causes as they could. I do not mean the registrar himself.

53,464. Do you mean they actually suggest to creditors the bringing of actions in the County Court?—Possibly. I have been told that it has happened—not in my own court. But what is a more serious difficulty than that is that people can issue a summons in court A if they can found jurisdiction, that is to say, either that the action or part of the cause of action arises there. The forms are laid down in the books. If the registrar grants leave for the summons to be issued in his district, then he secures another plaintiff; if he refuses leave he loses it.

53,465. (Mr. Coward.) It adds considerably to the expense. Supposing a solicitor in place A succeeds in getting a summons against a man in place B outside the district, the costs of the solicitor issuing that summons would be greatly more than if the man lived in the district. There would be the affidavit and the attendance?—Yes.

53,466. It is a substantial addition when you are dealing with small matters?—So it is, but I think you cannot always go into the defendant's district. I think the rules now are about as good as they can be made on that. They do protect the persons generally known as the working classes very strongly.

53,467. And they ought to be protected?—I agree, and ought not to be allowed to have any default summonses issued against them, but only ordinary summonses in the case of men known as the ordinary working men.

53,468. (Chairman.) Your conclusion is, that where the work is only part-time work payment by results is the only possible system?—Yes, that is the opinion of our Committee. My own opinion is not very strongly in favour of it, but on the whole I agree with it.

53,469. (Mr. Coward.) Or you do not dissent?—No, I agree where the registrar does not give his whole time, at any rate I am unable to suggest any better system. Where he gives his whole time I certainly think it would be better if he was paid by a salary.

53,470. (Chairman.) You would extend the system of payment by salary in the larger courts?—I would.

53,471. How would that affect the clerks in the larger courts?—I do not think it would affect the clerks.

53,472. They would remain paid on the same system as at present?—Out of the Treasury allowance for clerk hire.

53,473. Do you consider that the remuneration of the clerks is adequate?—I do.

53,474. How does it compare with remuneration for similar work outside the Government service?—There, again, I thought it useful to get opinions from other courts than mine. The registrar at Bury in Lancashire considers it compares unfavourably, while the registrars at Norwich, Gateshead, Brighton, Newport (Mon.), Rochester, and Carmarthen, and also Birmingham, consider that it compares favourably.

53,475. You, yourself, consider it compares favourably?—I consider it compares very favourably.

53,476. The claim has been put forward on behalf of the clerks, that at any rate those who give their whole time to the work should be made Civil servants, and should be pensionable. Will you give us your opinion on that claim?—First, my opinion is that so long as you hold the registrar responsible for the work and honesty of the clerks, you must allow the registrar to engage, employ, and dismiss the clerks. If you alter that, then of course an entirely new set of circumstances arises. Very few of the registrars themselves are Civil servants. Mr. Bridgeman tells me there are only 12, of whom we at Birmingham are two. All registrars, even of courts of over 6,000 plaintiffs, do not devote the whole of their time to the work; many of them have private practice, and therefore I do not quite see in that case how you could make the clerks Civil servants. Where they issue not more than 6,000 plaintiffs and the registrar's salary is an inclusive one, it seems to me altogether out of the question to suggest that his clerk, who during half his time does his employer's work as a solicitor, and who during the other half of his time is employed on County Court work, should be made a Civil servant. I imagine you could not consider that. Then I think there would be a difficulty in the work of organising where you have courts all over the country, some issuing less than 100 plaintiffs and others issuing 50,000 plaintiffs. The clerks seem to think that there is some analogy between their position and the position of the clerks in the High Court. Personally I do not think there is.

53,477. You do not think that the positions can really be considered analogous?—I do not. I say in my précis why I think they differ. One of the reasons is that the officers of the High Court are concentrated in one office. In the case of the County Courts you have an enormous number, something like 500 different sized County Courts all over the country. I have read the statement submitted by the clerks, and they say that the work is more difficult in the County Court than in the High Court. I really do not agree. I agree that in one sense it is more varied, but in the County Court there is a great deal of work that is not of the calibre of the High Court work—copying and that sort of thing.

53,478. A large amount of the work is of a routine and mechanical nature?—Yes, and I dare say a good deal of it is in the High Court. There is this book-keeping system which has to be done very carefully; but so far as the work itself is concerned, I do not see that it is much more difficult in the County Court, but I understand they make that point.

53,479. The suggestion was that in the offices of the High Court the work is much more specialised, and that a man is doing one particular bit of the work, whereas in the County Court the clerk's work is more generalised and therefore more varied?—One can imagine that to be so. In our court, which is a large court, we specialise, although we pass a man on. A man who is doing plaint office work does nothing else for the time being unless he may assist a man in the money office, who takes in and pays out money, when he is pressed.

53,480. Whereas in one of the smaller courts a clerk would have to do something of all the work?—No doubt.

Mr. ARTHUR LABRON LOWE.

53,481. Although the work might be more varied, would it in the smaller courts be of a simpler character?—Much, I should think. Where you get a great number of cases it always complicates the thing.

53,482. Do you think the suggested system of making the clerks Civil servants, and making them pensionable, would cost more than the present system?—Yes, I am sure it would cost very much more. I got out the difference it would cost in the Birmingham County Court if we put every clerk, but not the ushers, up to 100*l.* a year, and I found to raise the clerks in the Birmingham Court getting less than 100*l.* a year to 100*l.* a year, which I understand is the minimum in the Civil Service, would increase the clerk hire by 550*l.*

53,483. You are mistaken in thinking that 100*l.* is the minimum in the Civil Service. In the offices of the Supreme Court it is the minimum, but not in the Civil Service generally?—They said, I thought, in the statement, that they wanted the same salary as in the High Court, and I thought in the High Court the minimum was 100*l.*

53,484. In the High Court it is, but speaking of the Civil Service generally there are many classes in which the commencing salary is a good deal less than 100*l.*?—Then, of course, the difference would not be anything like so much. If you take it at 50*l.*, for instance, it would be even then considerably more than we pay now.

53,485. The suggestion made by the clerks that they should be placed on the same footing as clerks in the Central Office of the Supreme Court would involve the large increase of which you speak?—Yes, because I understand in the Central Office the minimum salary is 100*l.* a year. Then there would be a further difficulty from an administrative point of view. It would be very difficult to establish any exact method of grading in those courts of such a different size. Even in my own court we find that no system could be strictly adhered to. The Legislature from time to time imposes new work on the County Courts, and consequently additional work, on the members of the staff. It is often useful to recognise that work by the grant of a small rise, but if a man has got to his maximum in one class, the only way you could recognise his extra work, if he were a Civil servant, would be to put him into a superior class, which really the increase of work would not justify. Such a method of grading, too, involves annual increases. Any actual grading method where you automatically go up every year so much is not possible in the County Court as it now stands, because the clerk-hire allowance would not stand it.

53,486. That would not be compatible with the system of a fixed allowance for clerk hire?—Clearly not.

53,487. On the other hand, do you find inconvenience arising from the absence of a pension system?—Yes, we do.

53,488. There is difficulty when men advance in years, and become somewhat past their work?—Yes; we suffer from that in Birmingham. Some of these men have been with us for a very long time, and we have had to tell them—three cases I am thinking of—"You know you cannot do the work you were doing and we must reduce your salary," and we have had to reduce their salaries. It is not pleasant to have to do it, but we have had to do it.

53,489. Would it be possible, without making the clerks pensionable on the Civil Service system, to introduce a contributory pension system which would meet that difficulty?—I do not see why not. I should have thought it would be possible. We have, at Birmingham, the Corporation with a scheme of that sort, and I do not see why it should not be done in the County Court—a contributory scheme like they have in big works, where the Government would pay so much and the clerk so much.

53,490. In the case of the Birmingham Corporation, do the Corporation contribute and the clerks contribute?—I believe that is so.

53,491. Are you familiar with the pension system applicable to poor law officers?—No.

53,492. You are not aware whether that is a contributory system?—No, I am not aware of that.

53,493. But you think a system of that kind might solve the difficulty?—I think a system of that kind would remove really any ground of objection that the clerks may have. It is a question of promotion and whether they get on fast enough, and, of course, these old men who have been in the service of the court so long block the way. Any system of pension of that sort, I think, would remove the difficulty.

53,494. (Chairman.) In dealing with the question of pensions for the clerks in County Courts, you have mentioned the objections which you see to applying the regular Civil Service system of pension to them, and you have suggested that a contributory system of pensions would be preferable and would meet the existing difficulties?—Yes.

53,495. Would you apply such a system also to the high bailiff's staff?—Yes, I think I should.

53,496. The executive staff as well as the clerical staff—I mean the bailiffs and warrant officers as well as the clerks?—Yes; I do not see why a pension system should not be applied to them as well.

53,497. You think it might be applied all round?—Yes, I do.

53,498. But you would not change in any way the present system of appointment, either of the registrar's staff or of the high bailiff's staff?—Not so long as the registrars and high bailiffs remain personally responsible for the work and the honesty of their clerks.

53,499. If they were not personally responsible, would you see any objection to a system of appointment, either by some central authority or by competitive examination?—Nothing like the same objections. You would still have the difficulty of having these courts all over the country and organising it. I say this: Supposing all the clerks in Birmingham were Civil servants; we are a long way from London, and on every little irregularity, if we complained, I suppose the clerks would complain to London, and, I think, from a disciplinary point of view, there would be difficulty. Supposing you did want to get rid of a clerk, things accumulate up and up, and you may give him reasonable notice that he may go; but it is very difficult to bring an accusation against him to justify you in coming up to London and going before the head of the department and saying why the man should go. Besides, it would be a much stronger thing, and, I suppose, being a Civil servant, you could not dismiss him.

53,500. Civil servants can be dismissed?—But it would not be misconduct.

53,501. Civil servants can be retired for inefficiency?—Yes, but it is a very difficult thing to prove something against a man, although you may know that a man is not worth his salary and not the man you want.

53,502. You suggest that it would tend to too much centralisation of discipline, and render the application of disciplinary measures difficult?—Yes, I do think that, whether the registrar is responsible or not.

53,503. Are you acquainted at all with the Post Office organisation?—No.

53,504. There you have officers throughout the country with a system of appointment by a central authority. You are not familiar with the working of that system?—I am not familiar with it at all. In the case of the Post Office they would all give their whole time to the work. I still feel that it would be only possible to discuss the question of Civil servants in the case of those registrars and their clerks who give their whole time to the work, and that, I am afraid, would not meet the case of the clerks for the reasons that I gave.

53,505. The pension difficulty would still exist in the case of the part-time clerks?—Yes, it would. In the case of part-time clerks it would be very difficult to work even a pension system, I think.

53,506. Are the hours of attendance long at Birmingham?—No; we begin at 9 o'clock, when the office opens, and we nominally close at 6. The office for the public closes at 4. Then, of course, there are the ledgers to be posted from the cash-books, and there is other work to be done; and I think I could say that in ordinary times the clerks get away about half-past 5.

53,507. What holidays do they get in the year?—The chief clerk gets four weeks, the others get from a fortnight to three weeks. Then there are the statutory holidays, which are fairly good, both at Christmas and Easter—two or three daysextra.

Mr. ARTHUR LABRON LOWE.

53,508. Is there much variation in different courts, or may that be taken as a fair sample?—I think it is a fair sample.

53,509. (Mr. Coward.) By “statutory holidays” you mean Good Friday, Christmas Day, and days of that sort?—Yes, the Act provides the holidays. In the Bury Court they do not get so much holiday; but, for some reason, in Lancashire the courts all close the whole of the Whitsuntide week, and the clerks get the whole of the Whitsuntide week.

53,510. (Chairman.) Is there any fixed age of retirement for either registrars or clerks?—No, for neither.

53,511. Do you think that there ought to be?—As far as the registrars are concerned, what I feel about it is that we are judicial officers, and at present there is no compulsory age limit for the retirement of any judicial officers. I submit that the registrars should not be selected for compulsory retirement unless as part of a general system embracing judges and other high judicial officers. I know we are administrative officers as well as judicial; still, judicial work is a very considerable part of our work, and it appears to me that there should be no distinction made between registrars, who are the lower judicial officers, and the higher judicial officers.

53,512. Looking at the question on its merits, which may apply to other judicial officers as well as to registrars, do you say it is desirable to have a limit or not?—Yes, I should think it is—not 65, I think that is unnecessarily low. I think it should be 70, but I do not think one ought to work after 70.

53,513. Have you known cases in which registrars have gone on when they would have done better to retire?—No, personally I have not.

53,514. Such cases might occur under the present system?—They might certainly occur.

53,515. As regards the clerks, are you in favour of a fixed age of retirement for them?—Plus pension, I am.

53,516. That is to say, if a pension system were introduced you would also introduce a fixed age for retirement?—Yes, I would, 65.

53,517. Turning now to the district registry of the High Court, may we take it that your observations as to the clerical staff generally, their conditions of service, pension, and retirement, apply also to the staff doing the work of the district registry?—That is so.

53,518. Are there any special observations you would wish to make applying to them particularly?—No; the only man who is exclusively a district registry man is the man who is head of the department, and he could be moved on. Supposing one of the better posts offered in the plaint office, or the staff office, we should move him to-morrow if we thought he was the best man. From an administrative point of view, the district registry is just as much one of the departments of the County Court as far as the working is concerned.

53,519. Is the staff in the district registry appointed by the registrar?—Yes.

53,520. In exactly the same way as the staff in the County Court?—Yes.

53,521. And your observations with regard to appointment apply also there?—They do.

53,522. (Mr. Boutwood.) When you advertise a vacancy and candidates present themselves, do you, or does anyone for you, see them? Is there anything approaching to a personal selection?—Yes; the chief clerk holds an examination.

53,523. But I thought that was in handwriting and simple subjects?—Yes; but he makes inquiries as well as to who they are, who their people are, and all that sort of thing.

53,524. It does include some sort of personal appreciation?—Certainly.

53,525. You said, I think, that you neither looked for nor required anything that could be called a legal experience or training in a lawyer's office in your men?—That is so.

53,526. Several witnesses have urged very strongly that for the courts in London that preliminary experience is essential. Is there anything different in the nature of the work done by the two sets of clerks that would account for that difference of opinion? Are your men doing practically the same sort of work as the clerks in the London offices?—There are certain distinctions; but, generally speaking, it is the same sort of work, with the distinctions that I have already pointed out. It depends very much when you appoint them. Ours are appointed as boys, and they get experience working up through the office. If you brought in a man and put him at the head of one of our departments he would want to have had some experience of County Court work.

53,527. I will put it in this way: If you were suddenly picked up out of Birmingham and dropped down at the head of one of the London offices, would you antecedently expect to have any difficulty in carrying out your Birmingham system in London?—That would only apply to the district registry when you are speaking of the High Court?

53,528. Yes.—I think the clerks in our Birmingham district registry would have no difficulty at all in carrying on the work in London.

53,529. (Chairman.) In saying that, are you speaking of the work of the Central Office?—Yes, the Central Office of the High Court.

53,530. You would not apply that to the Chancery office, I suppose?—No, I would not; because, honestly, we do not know much about Chancery in Birmingham; it is a bit more complicated. But for the King's Bench Division work I do not think there would be any difficulty about.

53,531. (Mr. Boutwood.) I think you said you had 300 letters a day?—My chief clerk tells me that that is about the number.

53,532. And you have apparently about half a dozen men to deal with them. Your staff office has about seven or eight men in it?—Yes; the letters do not all come in at once, but during the day by different posts.

53,533. But 300 letters is a considerable number. What sort of letters are they? What sort of answers do they require?—Most of them do not want an answer at all. A great many of them are simply enclosing remittances. I suppose the chief clerk brings up in the middle of the day to us perhaps from half a dozen to a dozen letters every day which require our instructions as to how they should be answered. We work it like this: We do not go out to lunch but have it in our chambers at the court, and the chief clerk comes in while we have lunch and we discuss the administrative work there. He brings these letters with him and gets our instructions as to what answers should be sent. As I say, there would be from 6 to 12 of such letters a day to be answered.

53,534. You seem to favour a contributory scheme of pensions for dealing with the difficulty of men becoming incapable of doing their work and staying on too long. That is all very well; a contributory scheme would prevent any difficulty of that sort for the future, but how would you propose to deal with the existing men?—I am afraid the Government would have to pay them; there would be no other way of doing it. It is a real difficulty, these old men who are past their work. I have had a return got out and I see one man in 1901, head of one of the departments, became practically incapacitated for that better class of work, and we had to reduce his salary from 400*l.* to 150*l.* Another man who was doing very well up to a point, in 1901, was getting 245*l.* and is now getting 130*l.*, and it is every bit as much as he is worth; in fact I do not think he would get a job anywhere else at the same salary. Another man who was getting 170*l.* is now getting 110*l.*, and it is honestly as much as he is worth, but the only alternative in those three cases would have been to ask these men to retire.

53,535. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) I understand you feel that the administrative conditions of the work, where the officers give their whole time to it in the registries, are very much better than where they are only part-time officers?—I think so. You mean as regards preferment?

53,536. No; I mean that as regards the general conditions of the work from the point of view of the public service, it is better that the work should be done by full-time officers?—Certainly, I think it is better that the work should be done by full-time officers, but the small courts are too small to allow that to be done. You could not get a man at 100*l.* a year to do it.

Mr. ARTHUR LABRON LOWE.

53,537. Do you think it would be possible to make a rearrangement of the districts, so that all work should be done by whole-time officers?—I should hardly think so. There are too many small courts.

53,538. And you could not abolish some?—You could not abolish sufficient to get them near enough.

53,539. You could bring it about in the case of a large proportion of the work?—You could improve it immensely, no doubt, if you could get information as to circumstances, and so on.

53,540. Taking an ordinary manufacturing district where the population is very close, and where you get large towns—the West Riding and similar districts—do you think there it would be possible to have one administrative judicial office where the High Court registry, the County Court registry, the probate registry, and the work of the high bailiff, could all be done?—You could not have it for the whole of Yorkshire. You do not mean that, do you?

53,541. No, I mean in the West Riding of Yorkshire, or the Black Country, would not it be possible to divide it up between offices, each one of which should do all those various kinds of work?—Yes, I should think so. I do not see why you should not. You would have to study the matter very carefully to see what the communications were, and all that sort of thing. I am quite sure that anybody who did that could improve the system vastly beyond what it is to-day.

53,542. I gather you also think that there is no reason why men possessing different skill and experience should not be working in one office, and that a man whose skill is concerned with the probate work, for instance, might work in the same office with one whose skill has developed in connection with High Court work?—Certainly. I have not been in the probate office at Birmingham recently, and do not know how much work they have to do, but when one was in practice one knew all about the work, and I have very little doubt I could pick it up again and learn sufficient of the work to supervise it, if I had the time to do it, in a very short time.

53,543. (Mr. Coward.) In a week's time?—I should not like to say exactly that. I should say in a fortnight or a month. One has been told, and I believe it is so, that they only deal with an ordinary common case, and if anything presents any difficulty it goes up to London.

53,544. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) But in every Government office, large and small, different officials are dealing with different branches of work?—Yes.

53,545. One obvious difficulty arising from such a rearrangement, in so far as it could be carried out, would be that it would require legislation?—I am not sure that it would.

53,546. If you fused the smaller courts it would?—The rearrangement of County Courts would. They do abolish courts from time to time, but a whole rearrangement, I imagine, would hardly be done by order of the Lord Chancellor; it would require legislation; but I have not looked into the question to see.

53,547. You might get legislation which, instead of making these changes, made it possible to make them by Order in Council, say?—That is the way it would be done, no doubt.

53,548. Then in case of future development, either of population or means of communication, the whole system could be adapted?—That would be the way to do it, no doubt.

53,549. You would prefer not that legislation should make particular changes, but that legislation should alter the way in which changes might in future be made?—That certainly is so.

53,550. Then you argue that it is extremely desirable that the registrar should appoint his own clerks, and you say the registrar would, for instance, naturally wish to retain the services of existing clerks because it would be to his advantage to do so, and that if he has to work with the clerks it would be to his personal advantage to appoint good clerks. I understand you to mean that even if a registrar was a man quite indifferent to public spirit and was acting entirely selfishly, you can trust to the fact that he has to work with his clerks (putting aside his personal responsibility) to induce him to appoint good men?—I think so. The registrars are hardly appointed from the class of men who do not take an interest in their work, or at least I do not think so. The registrarship is a good appointment and a registrar is rather pleased when he gets it, and wants to do the work well, and make his office efficient. It is new work to him, and he naturally takes on his predecessor's staff.

53,551. But supposing a registrar had become very old and knew that he would only occupy his office for a very short time, and he had an opportunity of appointing someone who was strongly pressed upon him on account of family claims, or something of that kind; if he were a selfish man he might put up with the short inconvenience of having a very incompetent clerk?—But the registrar does not appoint his successor; the judge appoints his successor.

53,552. But it is extremely likely that when once appointed the staff will be carried on?—I think it is extremely likely that the new registrar would carry on the other man's staff.

53,553. Then it is only at the beginning of the registrar's career that this feeling, that he must appoint good men to work with him, exists?—The point I was on was the taking on of his predecessor's staff. He will soon find out that he has to appoint good men to do his work, or else it will get behindhand, and he will get in a mess.

53,554. But at the end of his time that feeling may be weaker?—But he has always the judge and the public behind him, and he has to do his work properly or else he will very soon get pulled up.

53,555. Do you think that is generally true of all cases of patronage, that there are no men who abuse patronage?—I have never had any patronage. I would not like to say that.

53,556.—You say in your précis: “The clerks being the registrar's servants, any man who is found to be idle or incompetent, or who shows no sign of developing or fitting himself for higher duties, can be, where necessary, got rid of with great advantage to the service. This would not be so if the clerks were “Civil servants.” As a matter of form, Civil servants can be dismissed for incompetence or idleness just the same as any other employees?—What I had in my mind when I wrote that was this: You may be quite convinced yourself that A. B. is not the man you want; that he shows no sign of progression and will never be worth more to you than 1*l.* a week, but if I am to come up before some central authority in London and say, “I want to get rid of this man; he is no good,” they will say, “What is the matter with him?” and you can bring no actual case of incompetence and idleness against him.

53,557. Do you think, as a matter of fact, men are more often dismissed from the present registrars' offices for a low degree of competence or low degree of industry than is the case in the Civil Service generally?—No. As I say, all through my time we have had only three dismissals for incompetency in the last 15 years.

53,558. Then in that respect there is no advantage in the existing practice?—It is quite right that the registrar should have the power to do it. I think there is something in it.

53,559. (Mr. Coward.) It keeps them up to the mark?—Yes, I think there is something in having the power.

53,560. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) The Chairman asked you about the Post Office, and you said you were not familiar with it. Are you familiar with the Inland Revenue arrangements?—No, I am not.

53,561. You do not know how in the Inland Revenue efficiency is kept up?—No.

53,562. I gather that you think the existing arrangement by which a man is practically never dismissed until the end of his life—but his salary comes down?—It only comes down in certain cases.

22 April 1915.]

MR. ARTHUR LABRON LOWE.

53,563. The existing system by which a man stays on with diminishing efficiency and diminishing salary as long as he can walk to the office at all is not a good arrangement?—I think it is not.

53,564. And you want a pensionable system?—I prefer it certainly.

53,565. Do you feel that there is a real difficulty about giving to a man who only temporarily holds his office, and may be in the last year of his power of holding the office, the right of appointment to a pensionable position?—But you see the time these men have been in the office—40 years, 39 years, 40 years, 60 years, 40 years, 35 years—you cannot turn these men away.

53,566. But I am talking about the future. Do you see no difficulty about the position in which a registrar, who may be leaving perhaps two years hence, is given the right to appoint a young man to a pensionable position?—I should not have thought there was any difficulty about that. I do not think a registrar would ever do anything improper in that way—appoint a man for the sake of getting him a pension, if that is what you are thinking of.

53,567. If there is any difficulty do not you think the State is bound to take greater precautions where you are appointing to a pensionable post than where you are not?—Yes, I should say so.

53,568. At present there is no inquiry into a man's health?—No.

53,569. And no Civil Service certificate?—No.

53,570. Do you not think that to give the right to somebody to appoint to a pensionable position even without inquiring into his health is a rather strong measure?—I admit at once it would be different and would probably require certain rules and regulations and consideration.

53,571. We have had a document which I think you have seen, submitted by the officials in the County Courts to us, and in the course of it they submit a speech by a gentleman named Fletcher?—Yes, I have seen it.

53,572. He says: "I remember reading the report of the commission or committee appointed a few years ago, to inquire into the subject of imprisonment for debt as it is commonly termed. There were two of the judges who gave evidence, who stated that they seldom cared to make orders of committal, and they found that one of the results was a large reduction in the entry of complaints, a result to which their registrars soon drew their attention, explaining the effect of it upon their salaries." Do you remember that inquiry?—No, I do not remember it.

53,573. Would you like to comment on that statement?—Where a judge seldom commits, it no doubt affects the plaintiffs. There are some judges who practically refuse to commit, and in that case no doubt it does send the number of complaints down, because people cannot enforce their judgments. The judgment summons does affect the number of complaints; it is the fact that if I sue a man in this particular court I may get a judgment, but the judgment will be a barren judgment because he has got no goods, nothing that I can seize, and the judge will not commit him.

53,574. (Mr. Coward.) It is bad for the money lenders?—Yes, it is bad for everybody really; at least that is my view.

53,575. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) Mr. Fletcher goes on to say: "One of these judges said (in effect) that he regretted that the registrars of the under 6,000 courts were paid by results, as he felt that his registrars, all excellent men, could not but be influenced by this circumstance (though entirely sub-consciously) in their attitude towards such questions as judgment summonses and imprisonment for debt." Do you think there is anything in that point?—It is difficult for anyone to think of a matter like imprisonment for debt or any other matter where it does affect his pocket in the same way as he would where it does not in fact affect his pocket. As the judge says, "sub-consciously," it would be very difficult to think of it with an open mind. My views as to imprisonment for debt, where it does not make a snap of the fingers' difference to my pocket, would be quite impartial, but in the case of another registrar, where it made a good deal of difference to his pocket, he might not, sub-consciously, be so impartial; it is not putting a man quite in the right position to judge.

53,576. You would agree that a question as to whether a right or wrong policy is pursued by the Courts with regard to imprisonment for debt is one which deeply concerns the liberty of the subject?—I do. I do not want it to be felt for a moment that I am not in favour of imprisonment for debt. I am very strongly in favour of it, and I can look at it from an entirely unprejudiced point of view.

53,577. (Mr. Coward.) Not from the prisoner's but from the plaintiff's point of view?—I think from both points of view. I think it is good for the prisoners really, if worked in the way the judges work it in Birmingham. There are so very few men who ever serve their full time, which is what you have to look at, and you must be able to enforce a judgment in some way, and I think it is very much kinder to enforce a judgment by bringing a man up on a judgment summons than seizing his household goods.

53,578. In many cases I believe it makes them produce the money somehow, but I know nothing about it?—They produce the money and do not serve their imprisonment.

53,579. Do you happen ever to have been in a London office?—In a solicitor's office just during the last four months of my articles when I came up here for my final examination.

53,580. How many clerks do you employ to-day, in Birmingham?—56 altogether, including girls and the ushers.

53,581. The whole responsibility for the conduct of your office is centred in the registrar?—Yes.

53,582. You have complete control over the organisation of your office and the control of those in it?—Yes.

53,583. And, I suppose, as a practical business matter, you know all the people and what they are doing?—Yes. I know, generally. I know who the execution clerk is, and who the judgment summons clerk is, and so on.

53,584. In some way or other would you not exercise control over the whole of them?—Yes, I do, with my colleague.

53,585. And if there was any complaint to be raised against any one of them, it would have to be brought to you and you would deal with it?—Certainly. Nobody else would have any power to deal with it. Of course, the chief clerk would make investigations for us, but any complaint would certainly be brought to us.

53,586. And it would come before you?—Certainly.

53,587. And, I suppose, you do from time to time have to deal with such matters?—Yes. Clerks make mistakes, and we have to have them up and go into the matter.

53,588. I suppose if you did find that any clerk was inefficient he would go?—He certainly would if he did not show any signs of improvement.

53,589. I was going to point it in this way: The fact that the clerks know that they are under that sort of control would greatly conduce to their efficiency?—I quite agree, but I do not want you to think that we are hard on them. We should not dismiss for a first, second, or third offence.

53,590. Any more than you would in carrying on a solicitor's business; why should you?—No, the only thing we aim at is the efficiency of the office.

53,591. As I understand, your registry is a big one?—It is the largest.

53,592. And you must have a great deal of work going through your hands?—We do.

53,593. You discharge all the duties that are discharged in the Central Office in London or in the offices in London by the masters, by the registrars, and by the taxing officer?—That is so.

53,594. You do the whole thing?—Yes. When you say "the registrars," I am not sure whom you refer to then.

53,595. The registrars of the Court?—I do not know what the registrars of the Central Office do.

53,596. You do Chancery work if there is Chancery work to do?—Yes.

22 April 1915.]

Mr. ARTHUR LABRON LOWE.

53,597. And the drawing up of orders in those Chancery proceedings you do?—Certainly.

53,598. You would refer to Seaton and make the order?—We should certainly do the best we could.

53,599. And you would not think there was any great amount of responsibility resting upon you in drawing up an order?—No; if I had a Chancery order to draw up I should draw it up and, like they do in London, get it approved by both sides, or have both sides before me and settle it.

53,600. Still, the whole thing is done in your office?—Yes, exactly the same as in the Central Office in London.

53,601. No, it is not, because there you are badgered about from pillar to post; the master does one thing and the registrar another. That is the very point I am on?—All those functions are centred in myself and my colleague.

53,602. You take the responsibility for all?—We do.

53,603. (Sir John Kempe.) It is difficult for me to understand the enormous gulf which you think is fixed between the responsibility of the registrar, if he appoints his own clerks and if clerks are supplied to him by the State from outside. I do not quite follow. According to your evidence you consider that the selection and the control are the important points?—I think the selection and control are important points. Where the registrar is personally responsible (as we are) for the work and honesty of these clerks, we think we ought to appoint them. If a clerk makes a mistake I have to pay, and I think it would be very unfair to ask me to pay for the work of somebody who was sent down to me from London as my clerk whom I knew nothing about, whom I had not appointed, and whom, perhaps, I did not want.

53,604. Take the selection. You select them first of all by advertising?—The boys, yes.

53,605. The one whom you get you make inquiries about before you take him?—We make inquiries before we appoint him, and know who his people are.

53,606. The people in the State Service are inquired into and are not accepted without inquiry?—I imagine that is so, and they have to pass an examination.

53,607. That is one point, and the other point is that you accept clerks who have been selected by somebody else, because you take over your predecessor's clerks. What do you know about them when you first have them?—Only the experience of the Court. When I was appointed I went on with the present staff and no change was made.

53,608. They had had experience in the Court?—Yes.

53,609. What did you know about their personal qualities or their honesty?—My predecessor was satisfied.

53,610. Would you want any greater security if you had good men supplied by the public service?—No, but my feeling is, that if I am responsible for the work and honesty of a man, I ought to have the power of appointing him or dismissing him. My whole point is that the responsibility for that man's work, or his mistakes, is resting on me, and I have to make good any deficiency—not only deficiency caused by dishonesty, but also deficiency caused by mistakes, which, of course, any clerk may make.

53,611. Take a public office; I have had a good deal of opportunity of seeing what happens in connection with the finance of the public offices. You have given us to understand that there are frequent cases where the registrar has had to make good a deficiency?—I do not want to say frequent, but there are cases. I do not suppose we have had three or four since I was appointed, but they certainly do arise.

53,612. From what I have seen of the finance in public offices, it is extremely rare for any cases of defalcation to be found in the public accounts?—Defalcations, yes, but it is not only defalcations, but also slips and mistakes.

53,613. Where there is cash in question, security is taken?—Certainly, and we take security from all our clerks, we insure them all.

53,614. Then what is the difference between your position and the position in the public service?—Because in the positions you mention they are not personally responsible. As far as I know, there are no other men who do Government work who are personally responsible, except the registrars of County Courts. The Public Trustee is not personally responsible for anything that happens in his office.

53,615. Do you see any advantage in the personal responsibility?—I see a good deal of disadvantage.

53,616. Do you see any advantage to the public service in the responsibility of the registrar?—It saves the Treasury.

53,617. Does it save the Treasury? I think experience shows that public officers who are not responsible are quite as good in the control and the effect of their control over their officers as the registrar who is responsible?—Of course they are as good, but however good they may be, they cannot help clerks making mistakes, just like we make them ourselves. With us it is rather different. I suppose if a clerk in the Public Trustee's Office made a mistake, it could be rectified; whereas, in the case I put, we might post 3s. to a wrong account; the damage is done, you cannot get it put right—execution is issued, and you are landed in an action for damages.

53,618. That is true in the case of the Post Office and the Inland Revenue; judgment does not follow so quickly as that, but there is the responsibility?—There is, but as far as I know, there is no personal responsibility on them; but I am not saying that the other offices are not as well controlled as ours.

53,619. Responsibility of a different sort is equally effective?—Yes, and they work their offices every bit as well as we work ours.

53,620. Then I do not know that there is any advantage in responsibility?—I should be very glad to be relieved of it.

53,621. Do you think there is any real difference? Supposing you have been in an office for some time, and got to know the clerks and understand them—do you think you would find any great difference between the staff of clerks under you whom you appointed yourself and those whom you found in the office appointed by anybody else? Do you seriously think you would find any difference if you are a man who has proper control and can discipline the office properly?—I honestly think it makes for efficiency if a clerk knows that I can dismiss him and control him. I think, certainly, that it makes for the efficiency of that clerk much more than if he knows I can do nothing with him, or that before I could dismiss him I should have to go to London. I honestly think that.

53,622. It makes for efficiency, but does it make all the difference?—It makes for efficiency. That is my view.

53,623. With regard to the difficulty of grading your clerks and having your clerks in classes, that of course is the practice in all public offices. Take the Treasury: Every year there are new duties imposed upon that office; the clerks all have to learn those new duties, and they learn them easily and well. They have not to alter the proportion of classes beyond adding to the office so far as is necessary to increase the number; they keep the same proportions more or less. It does not matter what the proportions of the different classes in the office are as regards change of work or new work. Why should it be any different in your offices?—Where a man has to do more responsible work it is an advantage to the registrar to be able to remunerate him for that work. Supposing he has got to his maximum in class 2, if he gets more work to do, either you must not remunerate him extra at all or put him into class 1. The extra work that he does is not enough to put him into class 1, and therefore it is an advantage to be able to raise his salary by a small amount. That is not so much the difficulty, but the difficulty in the grading is that it involves an automatic increase year by year in everybody's salary, and that we cannot have in the County Court because we have only a certain sum for clerk hire, and that sum will not stand an automatic increase.

Mr. ARTHUR LABRON LOWE.

53,624. But if you had an automatic increase like there is in the rest of the public service, your work could be done equally well, and you could arrange your new work equally well?—If we had an automatic increase, it would be very nice for the clerks and save us a good deal of trouble, but it means that the clerks are to become Civil servants.

53,625. But you would accept the Civil Service regulations provided you had yearly increments?—I would, for those clerks whose registrars are Civil servants. I do not think it a good thing to have the clerks Civil servants and not the registrars.

53,626. And they would accept, I suppose, a rather lower scale of salary in consideration of pensions being added?—The two things are quite different—the Civil Service and the pensions. Admitting that you cannot have the general Civil Service system in the County Court as you certainly could not for the part-timer, thinking it over, the contributory pension scheme was the best solution that I could think of for the difficulty.

53,627. (Mr. Shipley.) A question about the building where you work in. Is it a public building?—It is a separate building built for the County Court.

53,628. Is it kept up by the Board of Works?—Yes, it is under their control.

53,629. Is it overcrowded or ill-ventilated?—Personally I do not think the ventilation is much worse than anywhere else. I remember when I was appointed there was a paragraph in the paper stating that they hoped the authorities would soon erect another building; but they have not, and they will not, I am sure. All courts are bound to be not very well ventilated. We are not overcrowded. Mr. Tosh, of the Public Works Office, comes round every year and sees what wants doing in the way of painting and whitewashing, and is always very good, and we get on very well.

53,630. They keep the building fairly well repainted and that sort of thing?—Yes, we have no cause of complaint in the least. Sometimes we ask for things we do not get; but taking it all the way along there is no cause for complaint.

53,631. I thought you could get anything if you only put it under the head of "Stationery"?—We do not now.

53,632. (Chairman.) You were asked some questions about legislation in relation to changes of County Court districts?—Yes. I am not sure if the Lord Chancellor has the power under the Act as it is.

53,633. Is it not the case that under Section 4 of the Act of 1888 there is full power by Order in Council to alter the number and boundaries of districts, and otherwise modify the districts?—Yes; but whether that would be sufficient for a complete new system I am not sure. It is done now, and from time to time I know certain courts are abolished.

53,634. That section, at any rate, appears to give full power to abolish any districts if so ordered by His Majesty in Council?—Yes. Whether they would consider that sufficient for a complete new system I do not know.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to add that in the preparation of my précis my colleague, Mr. Whitelock, has assisted me very greatly, and the opinions therein set forth are his as well as mine. I have also communicated with the Committee of the Registrars Association from time to time, and I think it also expresses the opinion of that committee as well as my own.

Mr. WALTER EDWIN DAVEY (High Bailiff, Birmingham County Court), called and examined.

53,635. (Chairman.) You are the high bailiff of the Birmingham County Court?—One of them.

53,636. How many are there?—Two.

53,637. How long have you held the post?—Since July last year.

53,638. What was your experience before that?—I was chief clerk to the high bailiff of the Birmingham County Court for 40 years. I have been there 44 years.

53,639. So that practically the whole of your official life has been passed in the office of the high bailiff of the Birmingham County Court?—Yes. Prior to that I was in West Bromwich County Court for a short time.

53,640-1. What are the duties of a high bailiff?—The duties of a high bailiff are prescribed by section 35 of the Act of 1888. He has to sit in court; he has to serve all the summonses, execute all the warrants, processes and writs, and see to the general rules of the office.

53,642. He is also responsible for the work of his subordinates?—Yes.

53,643. In serving summonses and executing process I suppose he always acts through his subordinates?—Always.

53,644. He does not execute any process himself?—No. Under the Treasury instructions, in courts of over 6,000 plaintiffs, he has to stay in the office and supervise the working of it.

53,645. He has also to advise and direct the bailiffs when levying execution?—In difficult matters.

53,646. Does that often arise? Do they often have to refer to you?—Frequently I have a telephone message from a man who is in trouble and he states the facts of his case, and I have to advise him what to do.

53,647. Apart from that he has to direct his office?—Yes, generally.

53,648. How many clerks are there in the office?—Seven at present; one is on active service, leaving six.

53,649. What is the salary of the chief clerk?—At the present time it is 230*l.* a year.

53,650. Does that include the schedule B fees?—No, that is exclusive of the schedule B fees.

53,651. How much do they amount to?—They bring it up to 265*l.* 12*s.* 5*d.*

53,652. What is your own remuneration?—750*l.*

53,653. How is that fixed?—The allowance for the two high bailiffs is 1,000*l.* a year, and my colleague is very ill. I am discharging his duties, and he has 250*l.* out of the 1,000*l.*

53,654. Then have you the schedule B fees in addition to that?—No, personally I have nothing except the salary.

53,655. An inclusive salary of 750*l.*?—Yes.

53,656. What becomes of the schedule B fees?—They are divided up amongst the clerks and used for the purpose of working the office—the general expenses, and all that.

53,657. The high bailiffs themselves have entirely a fixed salary and do not participate in the schedule B fees?—That is so.

53,658. You told us the chief clerk's salary. What are the other salaries, including the schedule B fees?—The second clerk gets 158*l.*; the third clerk, 122*l.*; the fourth clerk, 106*l.*; the fifth clerk, 91*l.*; the sixth clerk, 77*l.*; and the seventh clerk, 49*l.*

53,659. What are the numbers of your staff of bailiffs?—They consist of two classes, warrant officers and process-servers. The present staff consists of seven warrant officers, one of whom is on military service, and 14 process-servers, and out of that number I have five on military service.

53,660. What are the bailiff's wages?—In the case of the warrant staff the minimum salary we have is 30*s.* a week with an annual increment of 1*s.* a week up to a maximum of 45*s.* a week.

53,661. Have they any schedule B fees in addition?—No.

53,662. What are the wages of the process-servers?—The minimum wage is 25*s.* a week with an annual increment of 1*s.* a week up to a maximum of 35*s.*

53,663. Do they get schedule B fees?—Yes.

53,664. Up to what amount?—It just depends upon what service they make. They are paid so much per summons.

53,665. The amount added to their salary from those fees would, as a rule, be not more than 3*l.* a year, I gather?—It might average that. It varies very much; it depends what summonses each man has.

53,666. Will you tell us very briefly what the duties of the clerks in the office are? May it be summarised in this way: that they do the office work connected with the service of summonses; the execution of process, and the recording of the results of those operations?—That is so, and they receive cash, prepare the warrants, and pay the cash over to the registrars.

22 April 1915.]

Mr. WALTER EDWIN DAVEY.

53,667. Is the cash which they receive the cash which results from the executions?—Yes, and money paid over the counter by the suitors. There are various moneys.

53,668. But not the moneys paid into court?—Yes, these are the moneys that are paid into court. They are paid over by the bailiffs who have obtained them through the execution processes, and they are paid over by the high bailiff daily into the hands of the registrar.

53,669. Do the payments made to the court direct by the debtors pass through the hands of your clerks?—No, they go to the registrar. It is only under the executions that they reach the high bailiffs' department.

53,670. The warrant officers are the men who levy the executions?—Yes.

53,671. Is their work difficult?—Very difficult at times, and very dangerous sometimes.

53,672. Do they ever suffer personal injuries?—Very often.

53,673. Does their work require much exercise of discretion?—A great deal.

53,674. In what sort of matters?—In the mode in which they execute warrants and the difficulties they meet with, such as claims. There are all sorts of subterfuges put forward in order to avoid the levying of the execution. All sorts of evidence is tendered, true and untrue, and they have in a great measure to use their discretion on that. If they find themselves in a difficulty, and if there is any communication with the office, such as by telephone, or otherwise, they communicate at once or come back to the office for instructions.

53,675. The process-servers serve summonses?—They execute the warrants of arrest and serve the summonses. They may be assaulted in the execution of their duties; they have to be up very early in the morning, turn up at 4 o'clock very often to get the debtor before he gets up or as he goes to work; and in difficult cases they have to wait until late at night in order to catch him as he returns home to bed.

53,676. By whom is the high bailiff appointed?—By the judge under section 33 of the County Courts Act.

53,677. Is there any statutory qualification?—No, there is no particular qualification.

53,678. What is the experience that you think desirable?—He has to be well up in law, and he should have considerable experience if he is to become an efficient officer, as he has to direct his men.

53,679. Is the high bailiff often appointed, as you were, from the clerical staff of the high bailiffs' office?—Yes. For instance the high bailiff of Liverpool was a clerk: so was the high bailiff of Manchester; the high bailiff of Shoreditch; the high bailiff of Coventry; the high bailiff of Nottingham, and myself.

53,680. We have been told that in all except the largest courts the office of high bailiff is gradually being absorbed in that of registrar?—That is so in a great many courts. In a large court it is essential that there should be a separate high bailiff.

53,681. In a court such as that of Birmingham it would not be advisable to merge the two offices?—I do not think it would be wise.

53,682. Why?—The duties would be rather more than the registrar could contend with, because it takes a high bailiff all his time at Birmingham to look after the place.

53,683. In fact it is from the volume of the duties rather from their nature that you think it is necessary to keep it separate?—That is so.

53,684. Do you yourself appoint your staff?—I shall do when it becomes necessary. I have been appointed but a short time.

53,685. Did you take over the clerks you found in the office?—Yes, that has been the invariable custom at Birmingham.

53,686. Have you ever known a case in which a new high bailiff did not take over the clerks who were there already?—No.

53,687. From what class are the high bailiffs' staffs selected—dealing with the clerks first?—We either get them from solicitors' offices or advertise for them.

53,688. You have heard the evidence given this morning about the manner of selection of the registrars' clerks?—Yes.

53,689. Do you employ the same method?—No. The youngest clerk we have been in the habit of taking is one about 18 or 19, and he is put on at the bottom and works his way up.

53,690. Do you generally get them from solicitors' offices?—When we can; otherwise we have to advertise.

53,691. Do you think it desirable that they should have had experience in a solicitor's office?—The head clerk certainly should have experience, because he has to act for the high bailiff in his absence when he is in court, or when away for a vacation, or anything.

53,692. The head clerk, as a rule, would have worked his way up in the office?—That is so.

53,693. So he would have acquired the necessary experience in the office?—Yes.

53,694. For a young man entering at the bottom, is it necessary that he should have any legal experience?—No, because he has it as he goes on.

53,695. He can learn in the office?—He can learn in the office.

53,696. Then from what classes do you recruit the staff of bailiffs and process-servers?—We generally like to get hold of ex-policemen, if possible; they make very good men for that purpose. In regard to warrant officers, we want good, sharp, shrewd men who know their way about, owing to the nature of the duties they have to discharge. In the same way, with respect to the process-servers, you want a good, smart man who can read and write well and use wise discretion in making arrests.

53,697. You say you have not had any appointments to make as yet?—I have not personally.

53,698. But, from your having been in the high bailiff's office, you have seen the appointments that have been made?—Yes, I have generally investigated them myself before the actual appointment has been made.

53,699. Has there been any difficulty in finding suitable candidates?—Yes; because it is not every man who will suit that work. It is not congenial work; they do not care for it.

53,700. You are speaking of warrant officers and process-servers?—The warrant officers. The process-servers there is not so much difficulty in getting; their work is not so disagreeable as that of the warrant officers.

53,701. Do you recruit those also from ex-policemen?—Ex-policemen, if we can; but the practice at Birmingham has been, we have possession-men—men who, when the levy is made, are left in possession to keep safe custody of the goods. Formerly we had an average of about 15 and sometimes 20. We used to have a good staff then, and the practice was, that if those men behaved themselves and did their work well, we appointed them as process-servers and warrant officers. A warrant officer's duty he has to learn before he goes on the permanent staff. He could not act unless he was taught, and these men are taught by being with the officer who makes the levy and leaves them in possession.

53,702. Do you consider that the present system of nomination and promotion is a satisfactory one, speaking of the high bailiffs' staffs generally?—Yes.

53,703. The nomination and promotion is in the hands of the high bailiff himself?—Yes. In regard to the process-servers and the warrant officers, there is really no promotion except from the ordinary warrant officer to the chief warrant officer, and he gets an increase of 5s. a week. With respect to the others there is really no promotion, because when a man leaves, instead of being allowed to promote the men up and let them take the predecessors' salaries, that is not permitted; we have to appoint a new man at the bottom and pay him the minimum salary.

53,704. They are on a progressive scale?—They are on a progressive scale, but it is a very slow scale, because it takes a warrant officer, who starts at 30s. a week, 15 years to get to his maximum of 45s.

53,705. Do you consider the pay adequate?—The warrant officers are fairly well paid, but I do not consider that the process-servers are. It takes a process-server 10 years to get to his maximum, starting at 25s. and going up to 35s.

53,706. Are many of them in receipt of police pensions?—I have only one or two, I think. I had considerable difficulty only last Friday with regard to the process-servers. They are dissatisfied, because the Treasury will not grant them an increase of wages; an application was made, but it was refused. When that intelligence was conveyed to these men, having regard to the fact that the workpeople themselves all round were granted either an increase or a war bonus, they were very dissatisfied with it, and one or two resigned, and the others gave me to understand—if they did not say so in so many words—that they would resign.

53,707. That is a special circumstance arising out of the war?—Yes. If they did resign it would be a very awkward matter for the Court, because ours is the Executory Department, and it would practically stop the work.

53,708. Apart from those special conditions, do you think that in normal times the salary is adequate?—No; I think the wages of the process-servers are not sufficient. 25s. a week is totally insufficient to keep a wife and family on and bring the children up properly; the increase is so very small.

53,709. You are speaking of the minimum. Do you consider that the maximum is also insufficient in their case?—The maximum, I should think, would be sufficient, provided they reached it quicker. Theirs is very laborious work, on account of the many hours; they have to be out early and late in all weathers.

53,710. You are aware that a claim has been made on account of the County Court staff generally to be made pensionable?—Yes.

53,711. Will you give us your views on that claim, as applied to your staff?—I think it would be most desirable that they should be made pensionable, because old men get kept on when they are long past their work, and it reduces the efficiency of the department. I have had an experience of five men in that state in my time. The course we adopted in their case was that these old men who had reached their maximum were paid a given sum out of it. A man was employed at the minimum salary and the balance was paid to the retiring officer. Even that did not work satisfactorily, because after the man who was receiving the minimum salary had been at it, say, about 12 months he became dissatisfied, because the other men were paid for the same work that he was doing more money.

53,712. Then you would be in favour of some system of pension. Would you combine that with a fixed age for retirement?—Yes, I should.

53,713. What age would you fix in the case of your staff?—I should say 65, because, owing to the nature of the duties of these men, they get old rather early.

53,714. You have heard Mr. Lowe's evidence on the subject of a contributory system of pensions. Do you think such a system would be applicable to your staff?—Yes, I do not see why it should not.

53,715. If they were made pensionable on a contributory system, do you consider that the system of appointment and promotion could remain as it is at present?—That would all depend upon how it was worked out. If they became pensionable I am afraid it would not work in that way.

53,716. Usually pensionable officers are appointed by a central authority, but there is nothing impossible in having pensionable officers who are nevertheless appointed by their immediate superior. It is a question of expediency?—It would be desirable if the registrars and high bailiff could have the power of appointing them.

53,717. You would prefer to retain the power of appointing them and of dismissing them?—Yes.

53,718. Do you, as a matter of fact, ever dismiss a man?—Yes, we have had to do that over and over again.

53,719. For misconduct or inefficiency?—That has been for misconduct.

53,720. Do you think it desirable for the purposes of control that you should retain that power of dismissal in your own hands?—I do, especially in our department.

53,721. Why especially in your department?—Because the risks of the high bailiff are so great. If an officer chooses to misbehave himself and goes and levies a warrant mischievously and purposely on the wrong person the high bailiff is liable in damages. It is always wise not to keep a man in our department under notice for that very reason, because he might create an immense amount of damage by misbehaving himself in that way.

53,722. Do you mean that you can dismiss your staff without notice?—Yes. That is the rule in our department, and it has been for many years.

53,723. They can be dismissed immediately?—Yes; they are engaged on those terms. For instance, 25 years ago my predecessor had three men abscond with 40l. each, and he had to pay the whole of the money.

53,724. Do you take a fidelity insurance from your men?—Yes, they are all guaranteed.

53,725. So that that money did not come out of the high bailiff's own pocket?—Unfortunately at that date it did, because they were not guaranteed then. They have all been guaranteed since.

53,726. Are all your staff whole-time employees?—Yes.

53,727. They are not allowed to do any other work?—At night, after office hours, they may if they choose.

53,728. But they are obliged to attend during the whole of the office hours?—Yes, the whole of the time.

53,729. In the case of the smaller courts, can you say whether the high bailiff's staff are whole-time employees?—I believe in some cases they are not, but I have very little knowledge of that. The whole of my time has been spent in the Birmingham County Court, where they are whole-timers.

53,730. (Mr. Coward.) You have been brought up in the office?—Yes.

53,731. All your life?—Practically all my life.

53,732. Where were you before? What did you start as?—I started in the County Court. My father was chief clerk in the West Bromwich Court for 56 years, and I started there.

53,733. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) I understand that your colleague is unfortunately ill just now?—I am sorry to say that that is so.

53,734. And there is an arrangement by which he receives 250l. a year, and you do all the work and get 750l.?—That is so.

53,735. That constitutes, in effect, a sort of retiring allowance?—Yes, I am afraid it does.

53,736. Was that arrangement purely a personal one between yourself and him, or did it require to be permitted or ratified by some higher authority?—It is sanctioned by the Lord Chancellor.*

53,737. The Lord Chancellor can give or refuse leave for that?—Yes.

53,738. You state in your précis: "Formerly pro" motion was allowed by the Treasury, but has been " discontinued for some years"?—That is, if you dismissed a man, or a senior officer should die, instead of allowing the high bailiff to promote the men up at the salaries of their predecessors, we have to appoint new men at the bottom at the minimum salary. The former system has now been discontinued for some years.

53,739. That is to say, no man goes up unless his years of service entitle him to, and he only gets his increment according to his years of service?—That is so.

* I should have said the judge.—W. E. D.

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-NINTH DAY.

Wednesday, 28th April 1915.

PRESENT:

SIR HENRY BABINGTON SMITH, K.C.B., C.S.I. (Chairman)

Sir JOHN ARROW KEMPE, K.C.B.
 Mr. ARTHUR BOUTWOOD.
 Mr. JOHN ROBERT CLYNES, M.P.
 Mr. CECIL COWARD.

Mr. PERCY EWING MATHESON.
 Mr. GRAHAM WALLAS.
 Miss HALDANE.

Mr. E. W. H. MILLAR (Secretary).

Mr. FRANCIS AUGUSTUS STRINGER (Superintendent of the Scrivenery Department of the Royal Courts of Justice), accompanied by Mr. KEELING (Assistant Superintendent), recalled and further examined.

53,740. (Chairman.) You told us, when we had the pleasure of seeing you before, that you are Superintendent of Scrivenery for all departments of the Royal Courts of Justice?—I am.

53,741. Will you tell us how the Scrivenery Department is managed? Is it under the control of a Board?—Yes, under the control of a Board.

53,742. What is the composition of the Board?—The composition of the Board is one of the Masters on the King's Bench side, the Senior Registrar on the Chancery side, and the Official Solicitor.

53,743. That Board exercises control of the Scrivenery Department through you as superintendent?—That is so.

53,744. Is the management in detail left to you, or does the Board deal with the current questions?—Whenever any question of some importance or some question which requires consideration arises I generally mention it to the members of the Board, and there is a meeting of the Board held for the purpose of disposing of the questions, but as far as the actual management of the department is concerned it rests with me.

53,745. How often does the Board meet?—It depends. We have had questions raised of various kinds which have required attention, and then they may perhaps meet three or four times within a month; but beyond that they probably meet five or six times a year, say.

53,746. How many writers are employed in a department?—At present we have 43 writers and one typist.

53,747. How are they selected?—They are selected by the Board. The method of selection is this: There is a very great demand among men who belong to the scrivenery industry to get on to our staff, and anybody may send an application to me with a specimen of his handwriting and copies of testimonials. All the applications are filed. If I think possibly that an applicant has not done justice to himself by his specimen, for instance, I would tell him so, and that I think he had better send another specimen, and perhaps show him some of the type of work that we want so that he should have a fair chance of being able to put forward the best he could in his application. Sometimes we have as many as a hundred waiting. We had once 175 applicants waiting. I suppose now we have about 70. When we want a new writer, when there comes a time when one of the men dies or we find that the general trend of the work is rather more than we can manage, I mention it to the Chairman of the Board, Master Archibald, and a meeting of the Board is called. I may say that I myself always attend the meetings of the Board. Then we—Mr. Keeling, my assistant superintendent, and I—go through all the specimens we have, even if there are a hundred of them, and we know what we think are the better class of writing and the type of the better kind. Then we sort them out into one, two, or three classes, and we take those to the Board and we leave the whole of the list with the Board. The Board then goes through our class one, our class two, and our class three, and the Board will if they think it desirable take a specimen out of class one, class two, or class three and put it into one of the other classes—perhaps in the first class. They go through every one very carefully and do it separately. Then I see them always, and each one that they have gone through they show me what they are doing with it. We put them into classes, when they finally settle the best class. Afterwards the others are reserved. In the case of the best class, which may number 20 or 30 or something like that, each member of the Board goes through them, and they have a meeting and discuss, after they have carefully gone through and made all their notes, as to which they think is the best, and they look at the testimonials and all that. Of course anything I have noticed with regard to the testimonials or with regard to the work I mention to the different members of the Board, and then they make their selection. As they go through them they number them, and the three of them together make their choice. Then they meet and discuss the different ones, and the one they select as the best is accepted.

53,748. Is there any personal inspection of the candidates?—I see them when they bring in their specimens. They see Mr. Keeling, and see me, and we form our impression of them, and the Board also see the writer who is appointed.

53,749. Do you have any medical inspection or examination? No. I do not think a medical inspection really would apply to a case like a writer because he is being paid piecework.

53,750. I am not asking the question so much with regard to the present position, but with regard to the possibility of a pension system. It has a bearing on that question?—I quite agree, if a pension system be introduced, which I hope it may, it would be then of course necessary that there should be a medical inspection.

53,751. When a writer is appointed, how far is it a permanent appointment?—If you go by experience it is absolutely permanent. I have known the scriveners now as long as I have been in the Service, and in 40 years we have had one or two who have gone, from illness, but that would not make it less permanent; but barring that, there has been no instance of a writer going or leaving, as far as I remember, except that we have one case, I think, in the last 30 years where a man was dismissed.

53,752. Have any of them been appointed to clerkships?—Yes, they have been appointed to clerkships, but there again a difficulty has arisen. They used to be able to do that, but there is a regulation of the Treasury which, in my opinion, is very hard. I do not say that there may not be reasons from an official point of view, but it is a very hard regulation, and I should like very much to see that got over.

53,753. What is that regulation?—The regulation is this: There are certain posts in the courts which we used to be able to get for the writers—for instance, the clerks to the registrars—not the principal clerks to the registrars who assist the registrars in their work, but the clerks who keep their papers for them and make their appointments and do various things of that sort.

53,754. The third class clerks in the Registrars' Office?—They are third class clerks in the Registrars'

28 April 1915.] Mr. FRANCIS AUGUSTUS STRINGER, accompanied by Mr. KEELING.

Office, and they have no right of promotion. They cannot be promoted beyond that. There is no promotion, because there is nothing above them except the posts which have a professional qualification. We have got one or two of the writers appointed there, but of course these writers are married men and have families, and they have to keep their families, and when they are earning, as many of them are, 160*l.* and higher than that—but put it at 160*l.*—they cannot take the clerkship when the chance is open. There are very often writers I should like to recommend for one of those clerkships where they would rise to 200*l.* a year, and which would be pensionable. We used to do it and did it for a good many years. It was done without any question with regard to it. We put the man in and he got his 100*l.* a year and lost then 60*l.* a year by taking the post. We nursed him, as it were, until he had wiped that out by giving him the first year 60*l.* worth of copying. Of course it was paid piecework, and if he had not done it someone else would; so there was no loss anywhere to the Treasury. The next year we gave him 50*l.* worth of copying, because he received 10*l.* increment, and so on; the next year 40*l.*, the next year 30*l.*, the next year 20*l.*, and the next year 10*l.*, and after that, as he had reached his 160*l.* in the permanent post, we let him go on in the permanent post and no scrivenery work would be given to him. A comparatively few years ago an objection to that being done was raised by the Treasury. Of course it was all done in the sight of the Treasury, because any work that is done in the Scrivenery Department is all paid for by the Treasury by Treasury warrant. Therefore they found they paid two warrants to one man. They had not objected to it for years, and it was of very great use, and I think a very advisable thing to help the scriveners; but that was stopped, and now we cannot get the posts for the men because the men who would be likely to have the chance of getting the posts would be our good men earning a very good income, and therefore, as they have to support their families, they cannot afford to take a post at 100*l.* and wait six years before getting up to what they were earning.

53,755. Have you a list of the writers with their ages and length of service?—Yes, of the staff as it stands now. (Handing in the same.)

53,756. I see from this list that the oldest writer is 69 years of age?—Yes. He is a thoroughly prolific writer and a first-rate writer now.

53,757. There appear to be 10 out of the 43 who are over 60 years of age?—Yes.

53,758. It appears also that one writer has served as long as 49 years, having entered the department in the year 1866?—That is so. Of course that is partly explained by this: There is no object in having an age limit. If they are thoroughly capable as young fellows and they are up to their work, well, we are glad to have them young, because we have no means of getting rid of them at all when they get old.

53,759. It appears also that 11 writers have served in the department for 30 years and upwards?—Yes, that is so.

53,760. You mentioned that you employed one typist?—Yes.

53,761. Is that a man or a woman?—A woman.

53,762. Is she paid by salary or piecework?—She is paid the usual rate. I think she is getting 65*l.* a year now—25*s.* a week.

53,763. Will you tell us the rate of pay for the various kinds of work done by the writers?—We pay by the 100 folios, and there was a reason why they were paid in that way instead of by the folio. When you ask me about the formation of the present Scrivenery Department I will be able to explain that payment.

53,764. Will you explain it now?—That goes back to the time when the present Scrivenery Department was formed in 1891. Prior to that time all the different departments of the Law made their own arrangements for the copying of their documents, and when any documents were required—any office copies bespoken, drafts bespoken, and things like that—the different departments made different arrangements. The Central Office had a Scrivenery Department, but it was only doing the work of the Central Office. Then the Registrars Department had a separate arrangement; they had a stationer in it, who was not an official and who was not paid by the Treasury—at least, the supply came from the Treasury, but he was not personally paid any remuneration by the Treasury; he was a law stationer and he employed what writers he liked; he was given certain rooms and employed his own writers, and the payment to him was 1½*d.* per folio for the copying that was done. That was the main payment. There were varying ones with regard to engrossing on parchment, for which I think they used to pay 2*d.* per folio—and that is the ordinary price for it—and 1½*d.* for ordinary copying. He paid his own writers. What he paid his own writers had nothing to do with the arrangement. The sole arrangement was that they gave him room to have writers there, and he paid his own writers. As a matter of fact, I think, he paid his own writers a penny a folio.

53,765. Are you speaking throughout of folios of 72 words?—Yes, all the time; that is our only folio. He paid a penny a folio to his writers, so his writers of course were paid practically what the trade paid them outside; it was all perfectly fair and properly worked. All the Chancery offices in the different chambers had their own law stationers outside, and they paid the law stationer 1½*d.* per folio for the copying; that is to say, the parties paid really, but it was done under them there because it was their own original document on the file, and they kept control over it, but it went out of the office to the law stationer's office to be copied. In 1891 there was a great movement about all kinds of trades in London, and all sorts of disclosures were made about sweating, sub-letting, and farming-out. I ought to mention that the Lunacy department had a similar arrangement to the Chancery Chambers. At that time there was a good deal of excitement with regard to the sweating, and it dawned upon us at the Law Courts generally—the matter was discussed there—that there was farming-out going on to a very considerable extent. I was consulted about the matter and I made inquiries, and found out that what had happened was really extremely bad; it was quite right as regards the Registrars' Office because they had their own stationer there, and they paid him a certain amount, but when it came to these documents sent outside, the law stationers who took them took on a great deal more than they could do and they sub-let the contract; they took the contract at 1½*d.* and they paid their writers presumably a penny; they sub-let a part of the contract to another law stationer at 1½*d.*, who instead of paying a penny a folio paid ¾*d.* a folio to his writers. We really found out it was so bad that in one case—a very small one—a second sub-letting of part of the contract like that had been made, and two writers were actually only receiving ¼*d.* a folio. Once the matter was looked into like that it became necessary that it should be dealt with as a complete scheme. In 1891 Sir George Murray (then Mr. Murray) of the Treasury, and the senior registrar, and the senior master of the Central Office, were created a committee which met together and decided and consulted me with regard to it, and I gave a great deal of thought to what should be done. I came to the conclusion that I would make what was tantamount to an offer—of course, it really was not an offer, but still it was a suggestion I was willing to try to carry out. I said that if the Treasury could give 1½*d.* a folio, less 7½ per cent. for cost of management, a department could be formed which could embrace everything at those rates, and the writers should be paid the whole 1½*d.* a folio, less the 7½ per cent., instead of being paid at the much lower rates that they were paid, which I thought were scandalous in many instances. That is the foundation of our scheme, and that is how the scale came to be arranged, and I may say that we took over many of the writers who had been sweated outside. The 7½ per cent. is reflected in the 100 folio system of payment. The rates we charge for engrossing on parchment at 15*s.* 5*d.* per 100 folios is 2*d.* per folio, less 7½ per cent.; that is how it works out. Then the copying and examining at 11*s.* 7*d.* per 100 folios is the 1½*d.* per folio, less 7½ per cent.

53,766. That is the rate for copying and examining?—That is the rate for copying and examining.

28 April 1915.] Mr. FRANCIS AUGUSTUS STRINGER, accompanied by Mr. KEELING.

53,767. How is the examining done?—One man reads and the other man follows.

53,768. How is the rate of 11s. 7d. per 100 folios divided between the man who writes, the man who reads, and the man who examines?—We pair them permanently; two men work together and they examine one another's work. One man examines the other man's copying for him and the other examines that of the first, so there is no payment really for that examining. Each man who makes the copy includes the examining in his copy. In exchange for that one man gets his copying examined by the other man. They work in pairs and it goes exactly right.

53,769. The pair help to examine each other's work, and each man retains the whole sum of 11s. 7d. per 100 folios for the work which he writes?—That is it. The examining really is not accounted for in the payment, it would complicate the accounts very much, and also that is the better system, because they get accustomed to examine together, and, working in pairs, they give reciprocal facilities to each other for examination.

53,770. Is there also a rate for examining copies brought in from outside for certification?—Yes, that is 3s. 10d. per 100 folios. That represents $\frac{1}{2}$ d. a folio, less $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

53,771. Are there also special payments for special work, such as plans and other work, which differs from plain copying?—Plans, of course, are quite different. We have to get skilled plan copiers. That is quite a different class of work, and is paid naturally at a much better rate. It takes a very long time. We allow those men 2s. 6d. an hour, roughly. The plans are brought in and Mr. Keeling and I together examine the plans with specimens of the plans which have been copied, to see that the charge is fair. We have acquired some knowledge of what time it ought to take a man to do a plan, and we decide if there is any question about it at all, and keep a check upon the amount from time to time.

53,772. You have told us that these rates are substantially higher than the rates prevalent for scrivenery work done outside?—Substantially higher.

53,773. Is the 1d. per folio you mentioned to be taken as the prevailing rate for outside work at present?—I have some prices here of the Solicitors Law Stationery Society.

53,774. Are these the prices paid to the writers or to the law stationer?—Prices paid to the writers. Plain copying, 8s. 4d. per 100 folios.

53,775. Does that include examination?—No; that is the unexamined copies. That is the lowest; we pay 9s. 8d. per 100 folios.

53,776. For plain copying, without examining, you pay 9s. 8d. per 100 folios, and for the outside work you mentioned the payment is 8s. 4d. per 100 folios?—Yes. Then for copying and examining law stationers outside get $1\frac{1}{2}$ d. a folio, and they pay 10s. per 100 folios as against our 11s. 7d. For copying on parchment they pay 11s. $1\frac{1}{2}$ d. per 100 folios as against our 15s. 5d.

53,777. The rates for outside work which you are citing now may be taken as a fair specimen?—Yes; we get a good many men who have worked with these stationers, and we get our information from them.

53,778. Are you acquainted with the rates paid in the Principal Probate Registry?—Yes. Typing is paid, I see, at 1d. per folio of 90 words. That does not apply to us.

53,779. You have no piece-rate for typing?—No piece-typing at all. They have, for examining, 4s. 10d. per 100 folios of 90 words.

53,780. That would correspond to 3s. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. per 100 folios of 72 words?—Yes.

53,781. So that is substantially the same as yours?—I think it is practically the same.

53,782. Is their rate for plain copying 2d. per folio of 90 words?—I am afraid I cannot answer very particularly, but Mr. Keeling informs me that there are only two or three men who do the plain copying, and they are paid so much for the job. They do a certain number of folios.

53,783. In the list of the writers which you have given us, you have added a statement of the average earnings of each writer, based on the last 10 years?—Yes.

53,784. From that list it would appear that the highest rate of earning is 217l. per annum?—Yes, that is the highest average.

53,785. And I see there are some writers who only average a little more than 100l. a year?—Yes. The 217l. applies to the ordinary writers, not the copyists of plans.

53,786. The lowest average, leaving out one writer, who had only been two months in the department, appears to be 95l. 6s.?—Yes.

53,787. What is the explanation of that much lower average?—Of course the output is not so good.

53,788. Would that be due to ill-health, or any reason of that sort?—Yes; he is a man who has had a good deal of ill-health. Of course, generally speaking, the low average may be due to ill-health, and also owing to the lesser productive power of the writer.

53,789. Can you tell us what the general average is?—These are the average earnings of the writers during the last five years: In 1909, 161l. 5s.; in 1910, 161l. 17s.; in 1911, 163l. 12s.; in 1912, 163l. 14s.; and in 1913, 156l. 6s.

53,790. The general average may be taken to be about 160l. a year?—I think so.

53,791. Can you tell us whether, as the men get on in life, their earnings diminish?—They do. Of course it depends very much on health, but, curiously enough, one of our oldest writers now is one of the most productive. They vary very much; it depends upon the length of the hours they work.

53,792. I see the writer who has been longest in the department, who entered in 1866, and is now 65 years of age, earned over 211l. on the average during the last 10 years?—Yes, he is a splendid writer.

53,793. Can you tell us the average hours worked by the writers?—It is quite impossible actually to say that, because the time of the writers is their own, and we do not know what their hours are. We do not know how late they stay.

53,794. No record is kept of the hours?—No record is kept at all, and, in fact, it being piecework, there is no question of attendance. There is only this, that the writers sign on when they come in, because we must know that we always have sufficient staff to meet any emergency that might possibly arise if we wanted to put any sudden pressure on the staff. But as far as the limit for them staying there is concerned, the superintendent of the buildings has raised objections to the writers going away too late; he does not like their staying in the building after a certain hour. He has changed the hour at various times, and I think he has fixed it now at 9.

53,795. The writers told us that they sometimes take work home?—Yes, they do. They cannot take any original documents home, but in the case of the registrar's drafts of the orders, which were referred to in the evidence of the writers as requiring considerable skill, when they have made one copy of the draft, of which they have to make perhaps five or six copies for all the parties attending before the registrar to settle the final order, they may take their own copy home, and, if they sit up and make copies of it, we have no control over their time at all.

53,796. Has that first copy been revised by the registrar?—No, but it is really for the use of solicitors or solicitor's clerks, who come before the registrar to settle the terms of the final order on both sides.

53,797. Are those five or six copies written separately or done by any duplicating process?—Separately. They must be written separately.

53,798. You mentioned the nature of the drafts from which they have to copy. It was stated by the writers who gave evidence that those drafts were sometimes of so abbreviated a nature that it required something approaching legal knowledge to be able to produce a correct copy from them. What is your experience as regards that?—I do not see anything in it requiring legal knowledge. They all have to know the recognised abbreviations which the registrars have accepted for many years.

53,799. (Mr. Coward.) And everybody else?—Which everybody else knows.

53,800. (Chairman.) Do you mean abbreviation of words or abbreviations of formulæ?—Abbreviation of words. They must know the abbreviation of words, and probably they are all recognised abbreviations in the legal profession, but of that I do not speak with knowledge.

53,801. Such abbreviations as “exors” for “executors”?—Yes, and all kinds of abbreviations like that. They have to get accustomed to finding out. I think I may candidly say I should myself find very great difficulty in attacking the drafts, but I think there are two classes of drafts. There is one class to which I have no objection. I should like to show a specimen to the Commission. Of course these are original documents, and I cannot leave them; but any member of the Commission who would like to see them might look at them. If you will just glance your eye through that (handing in a specimen), that is a continuous document, and that is a draft which I do not raise any objection to. But I should like to record the fact that I do object to another kind of draft which I will show you. This is the species I am objecting to (producing another specimen).

53,802. (Mr. Coward.) What is the point about this document?—The first one is the minutes of the order, and from the minutes of the order the order has to be drawn. That document is showing the writer how he is to get the draft out for the registrar. That one is, I think, quite fair and reasonable.

53,803. Is it the minutes of a Chancery order?—Yes, they are all Chancery orders. There are no others done in that way at all. You will see there that it is plain sailing. If the instructions are obeyed, and the pencil marks followed, the writer can very well make out the order at the price that he is paid for it.

53,804. (Chairman.) What is the nature of the documents which you think a copyist cannot fairly be required to deal with?—Here is a specimen (handing in the same). You will see that there are two or three documents together.

53,805. (Mr. Coward.) Are these all Chancery orders?—Yes, it does not apply to any other orders than Chancery orders.

53,806. (Chairman.) What is the point in this document which you think is unfair?—The point in that document is that it says in pencil, “go to this,” and, again, “go to another document.” Altogether it is very confusing. A man, even if accustomed to handling those things, has to study the thing first. The principal clerk to the registrar makes out the order from the registrar’s notes; he is instructed by the registrar to know what the order is, and he makes that draft to go out to be copied. In my opinion, when there is a draft dealing with a great many different documents of a very complicated kind, and difficult to follow from the instructions, the registrar’s clerk ought to make the first draft, and then send that draft to be copied by the writer. I do not think it fair to ask the writers to make the draft out of the materials which in a case like that are handed to them.

53,807. (Mr. Coward.) To make a rough copy from a very rough draft?—It is not a draft; it is two or three documents, and you have to go from one thing to another.

53,808. (Chairman.) Are documents of the kind to which you now refer numerous?—Yes, there are a great many of them. I have once before made a representation to the senior registrar about that, and I understood that the sending of that kind of draft was going to be discontinued.

53,809. You have no information as to the average number of hours worked?—We have not really—8 to 16 hours.

53,810. We were told that the hours worked were much longer in term time than in vacation?—In vacation time the difficulty is to find enough work for them to do very often. The slackest month in the year in the last five years shows a reduction from the ordinary busiest month—July, for instance—of 68 per cent.

53,811. What do you consider a fair amount of copying for them to get through in an hour?—It depends on the writer. We have thought that the average amount is 12 folios an hour.

53,812. That amount was mentioned by the writers who gave evidence?—Yes, that is the average amount.

53,813. Do you confirm that as a fair average?—We have got some men who can do 20 folios an hour, but not continuously. Some of the men can do 16 folios an hour, but that is going fast. We think 12 folios an hour is about the best average pace.

53,814. 12 folios an hour is at the rate of about 14 words a minute, is it not?—Yes, it would be.

53,815. Which, simply as writing, is not a very rapid rate of writing?—No, but then, of course, the pay includes the examining.

53,816. Is any arrangement made as regards holidays or periods of sickness?—As we pay piecework, a man cannot be given so much leave, and paid during the time of his leave, but we have an arrangement after the plan which I suggested to the Scrivenery Board and to which they agreed: during the Long Vacation the men may come there and may get a mere nothing, or nothing at all, for days together, or perhaps two or three or half a dozen folios or something like that. After working it out I came to the conclusion that the proper thing to be done was to take the whole vacation and, massing together the whole of the work for the Long Vacation, the man who came every day should get no more than the man who was away for three weeks. We adjusted the work with regard to that, so the effect of it was that the man who came every day—and I do not say there was any blame about it, but it upset the chances of the other men going away—got no more for coming, so he took his three weeks’ holiday. It made no difference on the whole vacation. Each man had the same amount of work given to him whether he took three weeks’ holiday or not. By that means we have made it practically compulsory on them to take three weeks’ holiday.

53,817. What about sickness?—In case of sickness we have an arrangement which has worked extremely well. We fixed it up many years ago. We limited it to some extent in consequence of the work, but the whole plan is this: When a man goes off sick all the other writers do a proportion of his work for him; a certain proportion is distributed over the whole staff. It is voluntary; they are not bound to come on to the arrangement, and we cannot force them to, but we find as a matter of fact that they practically all come on, although there might be one who would stand outside. The sick man gets nearly half his pay while he is away, but it does not exceed 1*l.* a week.

53,818. That is to say the work that he would have done up to the value of 1*l.* a week is, by a mutual arrangement, done by his colleagues, and the remuneration for it goes to him?—That is right.

53,819. And that works satisfactorily in times of sickness?—Excellent. It has worked splendidly. I feel that we are working something which ought to be continuously under the control of the writers themselves in justice to them, because they are doing it, and if a man is away for a very long time I ask the senior writer to go and consult the other writers, and to tell me whether they wish it to continue, and if so for how long. I feel that in any case affecting that sick provision, it being a sort of provident arrangement, voluntarily made by the writers themselves, they should always feel that it is absolutely under their control.

53,820. Does the Insurance Act apply to writers?—We have a certain number of writers to whom it applies as regards the amount—those under 160*l.*, if they do not exceed that figure, which is the limit of the Insurance Act, I think.

53,821. Are the contributions paid for the writers who earn less than 160*l.* a year?—That is really deducted just the same as any manager of a business would deduct it.

53,822. A certain deduction is made from the writer’s earnings?—Yes.

53,823. And a contribution is made by the department?—That is right.

53,824. How do you know whether a man is going to earn more or less than 160*l.* a year?—We can tell by his average and how his account is going. We keep a separate account for every writer.

53,825. How is it determined whether you pay a contribution in respect of a man or not?—On his past average.

53,826. On the previous year or on his average?—On the previous year.

53,827. But supposing a man is sick during a good part of the year, his earnings for that year will probably be brought below the sum of 160*l.*?—It might, but on the other hand there is the sick arrangement where the others earn money for him.

53,828. But that is only 1*l.* a week?—Yes, it might be so. We have not had a case yet; that is all I can say about it.

53,829. Have you had cases yet in which writers have received benefits under the Insurance Act?—Yes, we had one man who received benefits under the Act. We have another one for whom we have sent in an application.

53,830. It would seem that, in a case like this, where you have a staff upon piecework earning on an average exactly 160*l.* a year, and therefore varying frequently above and below that amount, there must be great difficulty in applying the Insurance Act?—I think there may be, but we drop him out if he goes beyond the limit of the Insurance Act. We keep his account and know exactly what a man is earning.

53,831. That is taking his previous years' earnings as your measure?—Yes. My assistant superintendent tells me that from day to day he can tell pretty well what a man is going to earn. I suppose there would be the same difficulty in the case of every employer of labour who was employing men on piecework. He can tell fairly well what is going to happen, having regard to the way in which a man is working.

53,832. Here is one man who earns 158*l.* 12*s.* in the course of the year, and another man who earns 160*l.* 4*s.* It must be very difficult to know in the course of a year whether to pay contributions for them or not?—Yes, of course, it is.

53,833. How do you arrange that in practice?—The Act, I think, says: "If they are earning at the rate of 160*l.* a year," or some such words.

53,834. How do you interpret that in practice?—We watch the man's account, and if he appears to be doing more than that he would come out. It would always be adjustable, I imagine. It would not be right for us not to try to apply the Act.

53,835. No. I am only endeavouring to ascertain how you apply it, as a matter of fact?—We keep a man under the Act as far as we can, and whenever we have the opportunity. We see how his account is going on, and watch it, and do everything we possibly can to keep him under the operation of the Act.

53,836. Do you consider that the present system of payment by piecework is the right system; and, with reference to that question, have you considered the advantages of it as compared with a system of payment by salary?—Yes; I have often considered the point as to the relative advantages of payment by salary and piecework, but for scrivenery work, it appears to me, that by far the most economical and fairest way of payment is by piecework. When you have salaried clerks, it is not a question of the amount of the work, but the value of the work very often, which regulates the service of the man. It is always work which varies in the time it might take. You could not pay a clerk engaged in issuing writs by the number of writs, or a man engaged in signing judgments by the number of judgments, because they vary enormously in the amount of time they would take. Sometimes half a dozen judgments might be very simple, but one judgment might take a considerable time to settle; so to all those classes of official work piecework is quite inapplicable. After all, the whole thing with regard to scrivenery work is the amount of output. What you have to provide for is the amount of output. What you have to get the men to do is that amount, and it all rests on the amount of work. More than that; you have no guarantee that if you pay a salary the man would turn out the amount of work, nor could you in any way check every hour of the time of a man to see that he did turn out the right amount of work.

53,837. Would not it be possible to have a system under which you paid fixed wages but required a certain amount of work to be performed. If a man was slow he would have to stop longer hours, and if quick he would get away sooner; but in each case he would perform a certain standard of work?—With the varying pressure it would be very inconvenient. If we have a great rush at one time of the year, and a very slack time at another, we can call upon the men for their own profit to meet the pressure and do extra work to meet it, and they are paid for it.

53,838. In fact the piecework system is much more flexible for a varying flow of work?—Yes.

53,839. Do you consider that a system of fixed wages would involve increased expenditure?—A very large increase of expenditure, I think, would be required. If they were paid by salary we should want a great many more writers, I am quite sure, to meet the pressure of work. I have some figures here of the slackest and busiest months during a five years' period. In September 1911, we had 18,300 folios of examining and 34,950 folios of copying; whereas, in July 1910, as against 18,300 folios of examining we had 80,800 folios.

53,840. More than four times as much?—Yes, and as against the 34,950 folios of copying in September 1911, in July 1910 we had 102,100 folios.

53,841. That is three times as much?—Yes. That is how it runs. If you were to manage a scrivenery business with economy, and paid by salary, you would want to take on about twice as many men, if not more than that, at certain particular times in the year, whom you did not want at other times in the year.

53,842. It would not be possible to adjust that by giving leave at the slack period, and having your whole staff in operation at the busy period?—A slack period would amount to about one-third of the year, and the other months vary considerably from month to month. The busy time are when the Courts are sitting mostly, and the slack times when the Courts are not sitting.

53,843. The writers at present are not pensionable? No, they are not pensionable.

53,844. Are they entitled to a gratuity on retirement?—They are entitled to a gratuity on retirement of one week's pay for every year's service. The way that is applied, and I have no doubt necessarily applied by the authorities under the statute, is, I think, really a very, very great injustice.

53,845. In what respect?—The last three years of a man's life are invariably, and without any exception, taken as the test of the amount of his earnings; it is taken as the average of his earnings on which the gratuity is fixed. The last three years of a man's life is the time when he does perhaps sometimes half, and sometimes not more than one-third of the work he has been accustomed to do for 40 years before.

53,846. The figures which you give in your list of writers do not appear in any very marked way to confirm the view that a man's power of earning declines largely as he grows old?—But he has not got nearly to his last three years. The point is that there being no pension, we can never get rid of him. We cannot say to a writer when he has got feeble: "You must go," for the simple reason that it means that he must go into the workhouse.

53,847. The figures you give are based on a ten years' average, and therefore it is not perhaps a satisfactory indication of the last three years?—No.

53,848. But taking the basis which you give, I see that the four men with the longest service, whose ages are 65, 69, 63, and 62, have earned respectively 211*l.* 183*l.*, 155*l.*, and 200*l.*, amounts which are, except in one case, considerably above the average earnings of the writers?—Yes, they are first class men.

53,849. That would not seem completely to agree with the view that during the later years of his service a man's earning powers go off largely?—But the highest age you have there is 69.

53,850. That is the oldest man at present on the staff?—We have had them on the staff until they were over 80. We had one man who had 66 years' service, and he retired because he died.

28 April 1915.] Mr. FRANCIS AUGUSTUS STRINGER, accompanied by Mr. KEELING.

53,851. Have any man received gratuities in the last two or three years?—Yes.

53,852. Can you tell us their ages?—I have not the figures with regard to the particular men, but I should like to send you the figures.

53,853. Will you give us a note of the men who have received gratuities during the last five years, giving the average earnings of the last three years on which they received their gratuity, and making a comparison between that amount and their earning power in the previous period of their service?—Yes, I should like to do that. I might give the average earnings for the whole of their service compared with the last three years.*

53,854. What do you suggest is a fairer system than payment upon the last three years' average?—That the man should be paid on the average of his whole service. The average of the last three years could only be taken as showing that it is a fair test of what a man's average earnings have been. In the case of the writers, I might mention there are not only those who retire from age, but those who retire from illness. We have men who get ill and gradually get worse, who come up and do their work and go on at great difficulty to themselves, but when they get beyond that and get so bad that they cannot come any longer we try to get them a gratuity. They have perhaps gone on working for two years and earned very little, but their gratuity is counted on the last three years which does not in any way represent the real average earnings of the men.

53,855. In the evidence they gave before us, the writers who appeared made certain statements to the effect that their position as regards pension had been prejudiced by what they considered to be a failure on the part of the heads of departments to obtain Civil Service certificates for them in the year 1871. Are you familiar with the circumstances to which they refer?—I am absolutely familiar with those circumstances, because it so happened that I was in the office where this happened. It really occurred in the Record and Writ Office of the old Court of Chancery, in which office I was. They speak about the Civil Service Commission having in 1871 sent in to tell the clerks there that if they would undergo an examination they would get a certificate and be entitled to pension. It is quite true that that was done, and it was really intended for permanent officials, but—I do not know whether it was by mistake or otherwise—it is a fact that it was sent to the writers, who were being paid piecework, in the same building with us who were on the permanent establishment. I suppose it was a mistake, but it was sent. We on the permanent establishment refused to go in for the examination.

53,856. Did you receive Civil Service certificates?—No, never. We refused them.

53,857. Did you become pensionable?—We refused their suggestion.

53,858. That refusal did not interfere with your claims to pension?—No, because we were secure under the arrangement under which we were paid. We were entitled to pensions paid by the Suitors' Fee Fund.

53,859. So the questions of pensionability did not depend in your case on obtaining a Civil Service certificate?—No, we were offered a certificate without examination, but we declined it because we thought it might affect the time of calculating our pension, as we claimed to count it from appointment. That only applied to the clerks. As regards the writers, the same offer was made to them, though they never were on the permanent establishment, and never ought to have received this notice at all. That is how the mistake arose, and a misapprehension was created in their minds.

53,860. So that the question of their being pensionable or not was not determined and was not intended to be determined by the question of whether they were to obtain the certificates or not?—No, it was not.

53,861. The writers put forward a claim or request that they should be made pensionable. Will you give us your views on that question?—I have very strong views on that question. I think that something is wanted, and that the matter should be looked at fairly—I mean seriously entertained. If you take the scriveners and the official writers or Writing Clerks (as they are called in Ireland) in Ireland and Scotland and in England, they are absolutely permanent in every respect, except that they are paid piecework instead of being paid by salary. The fact is that they are paid piecework instead of salary because it is to the advantage of the State that they should be so paid from a pecuniary point of view.

53,862. What is your suggestion as to what should be done?—I myself think that they should be regarded as permanent. I know that possibly some legislation might be required. There has never been any. I can speak with knowledge with regard to Ireland and Scotland. I was on a departmental committee in Ireland and I went to assist the Committee on Scrivenery in Scotland at Edinburgh. Everywhere it is the same, and the same sense of grievance is felt by a very large body of public servants. In my opinion they ought to be brought within the Pensions Act by some means, and it would be only fair to do so. I would like to mention that the departmental committee, of which I was a member in Dublin, recommended that the writers should be made pensionable.

53,863. When was that?—I cannot give the exact date, but about 14 or 15 years ago. I drew up the report myself, because we were divided, but not on that point. The chairman agreed on that point. That went to the Treasury. The Scottish Report was in December 1913. In January 1913 I went to Edinburgh, at the request of the Scottish Office, to give some assistance to the Royal Commission on Scrivenery sitting there. I represented to the Commission my views with regard to the question of permanency, and the Royal Commission recommended that writers should be made pensionable. My point is that it is very important, particularly from the point of view of our writers in England. The result of the work which is done in the Scrivenery Department in England is that the actual work produces a profit of 2,000% a year or thereabouts, and the work which the writers do for the Treasury without payment is 6,000% worth. That all comes within this scheme for the different departments—all kinds of official work.

53,864. Does the question of whether there is profit or not bear on the question of whether they should be made pensionable?—I do not think it does, but I think it throws a sidelight on the desirability of it. The point is, that you have a large and separate class. The scriveners are a separate class, but have never been acknowledged as a class, and I think the time has come when they ought to be acknowledged as a separate class. There is no doubt that they are permanent, and in my opinion it is a very great hardship that they are not allowed pensions.

53,865. Has the question of a contributory pension system been considered?—We have had it suggested that there should be a contributory system. I went into the matter of a contributory pension system with one of the leading insurance offices, too, and the offer by the insurance company was better than the one offered by a contributory scheme.

53,866. What was the nature of the scheme that was proposed by the insurance office?—Really, I cannot remember. I went into the whole matter at the time, and drew up documents about it. I could put my hand on the papers no doubt, but I cannot say now. I did not know that we were going into the question of a contributory scheme.

53,867. Was that scheme ever discussed with the Treasury?—I do not know. There was a scheme put forward by the Treasury, and I remember I went into the scheme and the figures with the actuary of one of the insurance offices, because we wanted to test what it was. It was not anything better than the men could do for their own payments if they insured.

53,868. The suggestion made by the Treasury, I think, was that a fund should be formed by deductions from the men's earnings, to which should be added any gratuities to which they would be entitled under the present law, and that those two contributions together should form a pension fund. Has any serious attempt been made to formulate a scheme on some such basis as that?—No.

28 April 1915.] Mr. FRANCIS AUGUSTUS STRINGER, accompanied by Mr. KEELING.

53,869. Do you think it might be practicable to do something in that direction?—I can only say with regard to that that nothing further was done upon it. The matter was gone into at that time. The writers, of course, saw it and knew what was being offered, and everything.

53,870. Can you say why nothing further was done?—It was not really done, because the offers that we got, I think, from two insurance offices were on better terms. The terms as to the deductions they would have had to pay by way of premiums would have been better than the terms of deduction in the scheme submitted to us by the Treasury; I say "submitted," but I suppose it was done at our request largely.

53,871. Why was not the matter pursued? The Treasury, no doubt, could have no objection to making arrangements with an insurance office for a contributory scheme?—Of course, if the Treasury would let us, it would be even better. If we were to know that in future they would be pensionable in that way, they would have to be paid at a reduced rate, and I think it might be applied to the staff, because we could adopt it with regard to new hands. What I think is the great thing now with the great body of the men—and it does not apply only to us, but to the Probate and other Scrivenery Departments—is, that they are a separate body, are not paid too highly, and they do a great deal of work, and most of it is profitable work.

53,872. Do you think that the hope of being made pensionable without a contribution was the main obstacle to the adoption of any contributory scheme?—I do not think so. I never heard that.

53,873. At present typewriting is hardly used at all in the Scrivenery Department?—Very little typewriting is done.

53,874. Typewriting is more rapid, and, therefore, a good deal cheaper than handwriting, is it not?—Yes, it is cheaper than handwriting, no doubt.

53,875. From the evidence we have had about the Principal Probate Registry, it appears that the cost of typewriting is about half that of copying?—I suppose it would be that.

53,876. Is there any reason why typewriting should not be used for a large part of the work that at present is done in handwriting?—There is a very great reluctance to use typewriting in legal documents. We have had one case where the whole front of an affidavit faded out completely, and we could not identify it, and that was an original document. There is great distrust of the permanency of typewriting inks. The judges are very much opposed to typewriting; they never like it.

53,877. Are you aware that in the Principal Probate Registry, after careful inquiry, they use typewriting for the registered copies of wills?—Yes, I have heard that they do so, and if it is a permanent ink, I do not see why it should not be used.

53,878. That system has been in force now for more than 20 years, and we were told in evidence that there were no signs of fading or any other drawbacks from the use of typewriting for that purpose. Have you any experience that goes against that?—No, I have no experience against it; nor do I myself personally desire to throw any difficulties in the way of typewriting; but I am bound to say that it is very uncongenial to our judges; they do not like it.

53,879. You spoke of drafts of orders being produced in five or six copies for distribution to the different parties for consideration by them?—Yes.

53,880. Documents of that kind would not be the final documents for permanent record?—That is so.

53,881. Can you conceive any objection to typewriting being used for that purpose?—No, I do not see that there is any.

53,882. Typewriting offers, does it not, special facilities for the multiplication of copies within a reasonable number?—Yes, up to a certain number; but for any documents such as office copies or originals, we do not allow any carbon copies to be used. We have a particular order that we are not to have any.

53,883. But there are other methods of copying by typewriting besides using carbon copies?—There is the litho typing, but that does not pay unless there is a large number.

53,884. There are also other methods for producing a smaller number of copies?—Only by litho printing or typing. It does not pay to have most of these reproductive processes where only the first copies are wanted unless you have a good number. The registrar's drafts are the only things we have duplicated at all. There may be five copies, but in most cases only two, three, or four copies.

53,885. At present for the three or four copies you have to pay the ordinary copying rate for each copy?—Yes.

53,886. Is not that an extremely extravagant system?—Of course, if they could be produced by typewriting, I do not see any reason why they should not be produced by duplicating, because they are only wanted for appointments before the registrars.

53,887. Do you see any difficulty, as regards staff or otherwise, in introducing a larger use of typewriting?—Of course we have not accommodation. We have on our establishment now, and latterly have been taking on, writers who could do typewriting as well if required, so we have several men capable of doing typewriting.

53,888. It would therefore be possible gradually to extend the use of typewriting?—Yes, and we do use it for all correspondence and a good many documents which are not permanent documents. As regards office copies of documents, and as regards original documents, there is a strong feeling against it. We will not have our judgments typed. We had directions that no judgments or copies of judgments were to be typewritten.

53,889. From whom were those directions received?—They came to us from our Committee of Control. Those are very special documents, of course.

53,890. If it were found practicable to extend typewriting, would you be in favour of doing it by the employment of women typists or by the employment of men typists?—There is a good deal of our work that there would be no objection to having women to type; but some of our work is work of a criminal kind, and is quite unfit for any woman to type.

53,891. Apart from that question of criminal work, you do not see any reason against the larger employment of women as typists?—No. In fact we have a woman typist at present, and, of course, would put another typist on directly if wanted, whenever we have the demand. We are merely law stationers of the Court. It is not for us to say whether a thing should be typewritten or handwritten; we have to carry out our instructions. We are not the people to decide; it must be the department who employs us; figuratively, it is for the department who employs us to tell us what they want. Now we have had an instruction that we are on no account to have duplicate typewritten copies of anything sent for use in Chancery, and none in violet ink but only in black.

53,892. Are there any other points you wish to bring before the Commission in connection with the Scrivenery Department?—No, I have nothing more I wish to add.

53,893. (Sir John Kempe.) We had in the course of the evidence a statement that there is a certain amount of work done by the third class clerks of the Supreme Court which was purely mechanical. Do you know what that work is? Is it a class of work of the nature of copying, or what is that work? Is it the class of work that might be done by copying clerks or by the Scrivenery Department?—I do not think it has any relation to copying at all. I do not know any official work that has any relation to copying.

53,894. The suggestion is that the work is so purely mechanical that you might have a separate class below the third class—between the scriveners and the third class—who would do this purely mechanical work. You do not know what that work would be?—I do not know quite what would be referred to by that. I do not see any opening for an intermediary class between the third class clerks and the scriveners, because our scriveners, or a great many of them, earn as much as a third class clerk.

28 April 1915.] Mr. FRANCIS AUGUSTUS STRINGER, accompanied by Mr. KEELING.

53,895. This had reference to a class more like what we call assistants. They would be precluded from rising into the upper class, because they are doing mechanical work. The idea was that third class clerks were wasted by doing purely mechanical work. Would it be possible to join the Scrivenery Department with this suggested new class? It seems to me not to be a good plan to create another class still, because it has always failed when you create a class apart like that to take over work hitherto done by the class above it. You cannot tell whether it would be possible to do that?—I know all the work that is done, I think, in all the offices of the courts, more or less; but I cannot think of any mechanical work in a department except that of the third class clerks to the registrars, and theirs is not really mechanical work either. I do not know of any work done that is mechanical.

53,896. It is not part of the question relating to the Scrivenery Department, but you would be against creating a fresh class in between the scriveners and the third class?—Yes. I do not see what possible benefit could be derived from so doing.

53,897. There are some of the third class doing a certain amount of less intellectual work?—Yes, but not mechanical work. I suppose everyone has to do some work—writing down what they have been drafting, and so on, or entering documents and making other entries—which might be called mechanical; but that is only a small part of the work which they have to do.

53,898. The Scrivenery Department is not doing entering or keeping register-books and that sort of thing, and you could not combine that work with the Scrivenery Department?—No. We do not keep books except cause-books, where all copies are entered. When a document comes in and the clerk sees it is right, he enters it in the cause-book. If he takes an appearance, he makes an entry in the cause-book. That is not mechanical in this sense, because that cause-book is the evidence of the existence of that thing; it is always evidence against the man who takes it in, and he is responsible for what is entered in the book, and a great deal turns on it in subsequent proceedings; so you could not class it as mechanical.

53,899. You could not create a new class without it having work which might give it a sort of claim to go up into the third class?—No; I do not think there is anything that a man does as a writer which qualifies him to take the place of any of the third class. We have got some of them appointed, because they have gone to the third class to render assistance in case of illness, as in the one place I mentioned in the Chancery Registrars' Office, where he was able to make himself so useful, and he was doing the work so well that he got the post. I should like to see more chance thrown open of drafting more writers over like that, as I have already said.

53,900. (Miss Haldane.) It has already been suggested to us that the Scrivenery Department is one in which women might be largely employed. I gather that you agree with that evidence?—I agree to this extent: We have every facility for it, and have already begun it; we have started with our one woman typist, and are always prepared and ready to extend the practice of having more women typists in any way we can, but the difficulty we find is this: We are only a department who receive instructions from other departments, and have to carry them out. When we get the chance of using the typewriter we do so, but we do not find it impossible in the case of the judges or other departments.

53,901. But supposing it was agreed that it was a desirable system you would think it a good plan to employ women largely both for copying and for typing?—I do not see any reason at all why we should not have women typists employed whenever we have a demand for typing work and require them, with this exception, that we already have three or four men typists who are never employed.

53,902. You have men typists?—Yes, hardly ever employed.

53,903. Working piecework?—Yes; they are working piecework at writing, and they are never employed on typewriting. We do not get any demand for it.

53,904. Perhaps I do not make myself clear. I was talking both of copying and typing. Why should not women do both kinds of work?—I do not say it would be an impossible thing, but we should have to make quite different arrangements in our working rooms and that sort of thing. We should have to have a room for the women.

53,905. Supposing you had suitable housing accommodation, would you think it possible to have a complete office with women doing this particular work?—There is no reason why it should not be so.

53,906. I gather from you that certain work could be more suitably done by men; but excluding all that, there is work in regard to companies (winding up), and so on, which could be done by women?—There is no reason why women typists should not be employed if there was a demand for typing. They would have to apply; they would have to send in their applications the same way as other writers showing their qualifications.

53,907. Would not you employ them on Civil Service lines and get over the objection as to the pension, which, I gather, is a serious objection in the present office?—I do not know what the Civil Service lines are for women.

53,908. For women typists?—I do not see at present what advantage we should gain by having women. We have men and we strain them and push them on the work, and they take it, and they are paid for the amount of work that they do.

53,909. But I gather that you are not satisfied with the present conditions of employment of the men. You mentioned that, supposing they stopped working when they were beyond doing their proper work, they had only the workhouse to look forward to?—That is so. That is most unsatisfactory, and a system which, I think, ought to be altered.

53,910. I suggest that you should rather have a regular office composed of women to do this particular work just as is done in the Post Office Savings Bank Department?—It might be possible, but then we have a very full staff of writers, and we should have to keep them.

53,911. Yes, that is a matter of the present. Have you had any difficulty owing to the war? Have you had to make any special arrangements in regard to it?—The same as we have everywhere. A good many of our staff of writers have gone out.

53,912. Have you thought of employing women in their places lately?—No, we have no accommodation for them at present.

53,913. Even for piecework?—I should not like to have the women mixed with the men in the rooms for the scrivenery work. We ought to have separate arrangements for the women with regard to writing rooms; they ought to be in separate rooms.

53,914. Of course this difficulty could be got over?—Possibly.

53,915. (Chairman.) In discussing the question of a salaried staff of male writers, you mention that difficulty would arise from the difference in the flow of work at different times of the year?—Yes, the fluctuation of the work.

53,916. That same difficulty would arise, would it not, in the case of a salaried staff of women writers or typists?—Exactly the same.

53,917. (Mr. Coward.) I have already said to one or two of the other witnesses that personally we do employ women typists who are in the position of Waterlows, that is to say, regular law stationers, with most excellent results. However, that is by the way. Now a question or two with regard to this order which you produced: You produced it as showing the difficulty that your scriveners have?—Yes.

53,918. It was not produced with regard to the character or mode of drawing up the order or anything of that kind?—No.

53,919. Can you tell me whose handwriting this pencil note is in?—Of course, I do not know the handwriting. I should not like to say unless I knew the handwriting; but it is one of the registrars, I think.

53,920. This order is one of the simplest orders, is it not? You have looked at it, I suppose?—No, I have not actually, seriously, looked at it. I could follow you if I looked at it.

28 April 1915.]

Mr. FRANCIS AUGUSTUS STRINGER, accompanied by Mr. KEELING.

53,921. I think you will find that the order is of the very simplest kind?—That is so.

53,922. There was a fund in court, and the tenant for life died, and the fund is divisible, subject to her life interest, amongst her children. This is the order that directs its distribution?—Yes.

53,923. So that it was necessary to take out a summons before the judge. It goes before the master, and then before the judge; the judge makes the order, and I understand it goes to the registrar to have the order drawn up. Before it goes to the registrar the master endorses upon it the evidence which has been read upon the hearing of the summons, and this is the evidence put on the back, signed by Master Fox. Then it goes to the registrar's office to have the order drawn up?—Yes.

53,924. What goes before the registrar is this summons that has been issued by the applicant's solicitors?—Yes, of course, the order would be drawn up on that.

53,925. The summons goes to the registrar with these notes of the master as to what documents have been read upon the hearing of the summons?—Yes.

53,926. From that an order has to be prepared?—Yes.

53,927. The ordinary course would be to prepare a draft order?—Yes.

53,928. Instead of doing that, somebody in the registrar's office, who we do not know, has altered this summons in a way that is a disgrace to any office, is it not?—I do not want to express an opinion of that kind at all.

53,929. I ask you really to look at that document and tell us whether that is not a disgrace to any office?—I do not wish to express an opinion with regard to any fault of theirs. It is a system which has been employed, and is carried out, and a good deal of it is done. All I wished to hand this document in for was this: I did not know whose document it was, or where it came from, but I meant to produce it as a type which I did not think it was fair to ask our scribes to make a draft from.

53,930. I quite appreciate the ground on which you produce it, but does not that show the way in which the work is done in some of these offices?—No, I do not think it shows anything that is any reflection upon any office.

53,931. Do not you really?—No.

53,932. Will you kindly look at that summons again. It is a summons, is it not?—Yes; I know what it is exactly.

53,933. It has been altered into an order in pencil?—I do not see any objection to that one document.

53,934. If I had that done in my office, that man would go there and then; it is a disgrace to the office?—I do not think I can follow that at all. I do not see that there is a matter of disgrace attaching to it at all. The document comes in with the endorsement upon it; the registrar puts his writing upon it to show how the draft on which he is going to settle the order is to be made. The registrar knows when he makes these alterations that what will come back to him with this document which is altered will be the draft, which he will then settle, and it will be in consecutive form. I see no objection to that, because he is not sending anything out which will become operative, or anything of the sort. It will come back to him for re-consideration, and, officially, I see no objection whatever to that course being applied.

53,935. I am very sorry to hear it?—I will say this, that I do not think when documents come out like that it is fair to the writers to ask them to make the drafts. That is the only point I am on.

53,936. It is not the point that I am on. There are 28 men other than the registrars in the Registrars' Office, and I suppose one of their duties—the primary duty—is to prepare the orders and draft the orders?—Yes.

53,937. And anybody who knew anything about the work and what was required would easily draft an order from that summons; there is no trouble whatever about it. It is the simplest possible order and that is the way it is done. Here we know something about business and the way things are done, and all I can say is, that it is incredible. I will pass from that to another question. You were good enough, when you were examined on the 17th March, to refer to the judgments drawn up in the Central Office, and you were asked: "Do you consider the work relating to judgments the most difficult part of the work of your department?"—Yes, that and "executions. There again there are a whole number of decisions affecting writs of execution." Now I have taken without selection at all a dozen judgments that were drawn up in the Central Office consecutively. I would like you to look at these and see whether you think—you will find that most, if not all, were drawn up in my office—there is the slightest bit of difficulty in any one (handing documents to witness)?—These are all judgments which are ordinary judgments. Some of them, of course, are only default judgments, which I think I mentioned as being simple.

53,938. And there is not the slightest difficulty about them. One is about recovering the possession of land, and one in which the costs were taxed at 4,000*l.* odd?—There is nothing out of the way.

53,939. They are all judgments of entirely different kinds?—They are. But judgments in default of appearance are not merely handed in signed and sealed, and handed back to the solicitors.

53,940. The whole point of it is that I selected 12 judgments consecutively that have been obtained in my office, and you say there is not a bit of difficulty in them?—There are one or two judgments that require looking at very carefully and examining with the original documents. Do you know the number of judgments that were signed in the year?

53,941. Yes?—Your 12, which you have taken out, does not represent very much out of 20,000.

53,942. No, I only took out a dozen?—And they happen to be rather light ones.

53,943. I do not know whether they are light ones. You do not call Seale v. Turner a light one, do you? However, there it is?—In the case of the default judgments (which are the simple ones) the man has first of all to see that you are entitled to default judgment, and he has to see that the writ has been served.

53,944. There is no trouble about doing that?—You are speaking as if it was an automatic matter, and I demur to your doing that.

53,945. I do not say it is quite automatic, but it is very, very near it?—The clerk who enters a judgment of the simplest kind that you have there—a judgment in default—has first of all to see that there is default, and he has to see—

53,946. That there is not an appearance entered?—He has to find that, and then he has to see that the man was duly and properly served according to the proper method of service.

53,947. Certainly.—That is not automatic. You may say it is the simplest kind.

53,948. But you are paying gentlemen who do this 800*l.* a year?—Nothing of the sort. Some of them are paid 200*l.*, 300*l.*, or 400*l.* a year.

53,949. That is the lowest?—But that is not the only work they have to do. They have very much more important judgments than any you have there.

53,950. I am quite right in what I said, that the first class clerks get salaries up to 800*l.* a year?—The first class clerks get the highest salaries in the office, and the ordinary scale of the first class is to 600*l.*

53,951. We have the scale of salaries here?—Yes; 600*l.* is the highest salary. Those with 700*l.* remain under certain rights they had prior to the Judicature Acts, and some of them remain still.

53,952. I do not know whether it was you who spoke about the correspondence in the office?—I do not remember it.

53,953. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) I want to ask you a question on this draft order. Is not this endorsed in pencil, apparently by the registrar: "Copy this as best you can; I cannot make it out"?—No, I do not think that could have been written by the registrar.

53,954. Will you look at it, and see whether it is not followed, in the same handwriting, by the registrar's name with "R" after it, apparently meaning "Registrar" (handing draft order to the witness)?—It might have been. After looking at it, I do not think any notice should be taken of a little pencil note like that; it is a mere nothing and of no consequence.

53,955. I ask, is there that endorsement on it?—If I had written or made a badly-written or cut-about note, I might have sent it down to Mr. Keeling in the Scrivenery Department, and said: "Let the writer do this; I do not know whether he will be able to read it," or something like that. It was a little observation passing privately. I do not think these documents should be used for any private ends which are extraneous to them, unless for some good purpose. I merely brought them as specimens of the documents which I do not think it was quite fair for my writers to have to copy.

53,956. In that case the scrivener would have, in fact, to interpret the document which bears that endorsement?—He could follow it. They are so highly skilled about these things that a writer could do it.

53,957. In telling us about your rate of payment to the scriveners, did you tell us about the payment for the process called "counting folios"?—No.

53,958. What is the rate of payment for that?—We have very little of that to do. The writer who copies a document is not paid anything for counting it. But we have to count. One of the departments, I think, sends us a certain amount of counting to do. I think the Criminal Appeal Department send us documents to verify the length of them, on which they are paying on their own account for printing; but their account has nothing to do with us.

53,959. It is work of some importance, because on it the ultimate payment by the Treasury is based?—Yes; we only pay the 1s. 11d.

53,960. But the question of how many folios there are in a document is a question on which the ultimate payment depends?—No doubt the counting is to check that.

53,961. At what rate is that paid?—1s. 11d. per 100 folios.

53,962. Is it not the case that that work is, in fact, reserved for scriveners who can do nothing else?—We always give it to such a one if there is anybody like that. Sometimes our writers suffer from writer's cramp and they have a difficulty in writing, and that is one of the things which we are able to give to men like that if they cannot do writing well.

53,963. Do you find it entirely satisfactory that a gentleman in that condition should make that examination on which the actual payment by the Treasury depends?—We should not give it to a man who could not do it, but a man might not be able to write and yet might be perfectly able to count.

53,964. At present one-quarter of your 43 scriveners—that is to say 10 out of 43—are between 60 and 70 years of age?—That is so.

53,965. Therefore, in the course of the next 10 years the difficulty of age, if nobody is dismissed, will be likely to increase?—Probably.

53,966. In appointing scriveners, do you give any preference to the sons or the relatives of scriveners or of officials in the courts in any way?—No. As I described when I was speaking about how they were appointed, they are entirely appointed at an early age—if we have a healthy and good man—on the quality of his specimens of writing. That is the determining factor. No other influence than that is allowed to interfere in the selection of writers at all. I may say it is not infrequent that a certain amount of pressure is brought to bear to get certain particular people on, but absolutely when the specimens are chosen and the writers are chosen, the Board do not know who they are; they might see their names, but they would mean nothing to them.

53,967. We had it in evidence the other day that in the Central Office certain clerks received extra payment for letters of request to foreign countries. Do you know of that?—Yes, one of them is a process-server to the courts—I forget what is the amount he gets, but I think it is an allowance of 20l. He is appointed as process-server to the English Court for the purpose of serving foreign process, which comes over here to be served in England. There had to be a process-server appointed under certain rules passed by the Rule Committee.

53,968. Is there more than one who gets paid under that head?—Yes, an assistant process-server—because there must always be one there—gets 15l., I think, a year. There are two clerks who are given that payment in addition to their ordinary pay.

53,969. Do you know where this appears in the Estimates at all. I could not find any trace in the Estimates of these payments?—I do not know. It is the paymaster's business, but I know they are down there. There is no arrangement for payment of any salary or anything of that sort that is not in the Estimates.

53,970. Is one of the gentlemen who receives this extra payment in your special section of the office?—Yes.

53,971. What is his name?—My son is one of the two, and the other is named Willson, who is at present in the Army. Both had been previously engaged for years on that class of work.

53,972. Then Mr. F. R. Stringer is in your department?—Yes.

53,973. (Mr. Boutwood.) You spoke of some plan that you had years ago for "nursing" scriveners whom you appointed to be clerks?—I called it that, you understand what I mean—nursing them during a period when there was a discrepancy between the salaries and the earnings.

53,974. Why was that dropped? Was any reason given?—No. We have had several letters about it. The Scrivenery Board wrote to the Lord Chancellor about it, and on several occasions we have written to the Lord Chancellor with regard to it to ask that that rule might be relaxed, but it is not sanctioned by the Treasury—that is all.

53,975. And you have not any reason for the rule?—We have not any reason behind it. We have not been informed of the reason.

53,976. Something was said about an intermediate class between the scriveners and the third class. I followed your reply to that, but another suggestion has been made to the Commission that the third class clerks themselves should be separated as a permanently subordinate class and recruited separately?—You mean that the third class clerks might be divided?

53,977. No, that the first and second class should be continued to be appointed as they are now, or in some equivalent way, but that the third class, in view of the character of its work, should be treated and recruited separately as a permanently subordinate class with only exceptional promotion?—I should very much demur to anything of that kind.

53,978. Why?—I do not think it would work. In the first place the moment the third class men come in we shift them about, but we try to train them always to do the more important duties as well and to begin to learn them. We do everything that we can to qualify them for taking up the second class duties when their time comes for that. Some of the men do very well. If you were to have a system by which the second class would be recruited from the outside over the top of the third class, that would practically mean that the third class would be a separate class, not having any promotion. In that case it would be hardly fair—in fact, I do not think it would work well—to utilise the services of the third class on work other than work which would really be third class work, and would always be third class work. I think myself that the whole system of appointing a man to rise up to 200l. and there to stop is a very bad one.

53,979. And that proposal would intensify the drawbacks of the present plan, whatever they are?—I think it would, and make things much worse. A man in the third class, who perhaps has waited (as they do sometimes in that class) for promotion for 12 or 14 years, when his turn came for promotion, would never be secure that he would get his promotion even if he knew perfectly well he would get it on his merits, because the one having the patronage might put somebody into the second class over his head and he would be postponed.

28 April 1915.] Mr. FRANCIS AUGUSTUS STRINGER, accompanied by Mr. KEELING.

53,980. I gather that you think it would be a bad thing to have in an office a grade of men who all their lives were confined to the lowest class of clerical work, with practically no prospect in front of them but that?—I do not say that as a general rule to be laid down, but as applied to our department I think it would be a very bad thing indeed, because you have no lower class of work distinct from the upper class of work; it is all mixed and intermingled inextricably. That being so, you could not have a third class if you had not got a third class of work for the third class men without promotion. If you had, it might be a very good plan, but with us I think it is not workable.

53,981. Then to come to typewriting, do you happen to know whether it is true that typewritten documents are much more easily manipulated and altered?—We have had enormous proofs of that. If you find anything wrong you can take it out. That is one of the great reasons why typewriting is objected to in the law offices; it is so important to us in matters of evidence that it should be something permanent that we are dealing with, which could not be altered without our knowing it. But they can take out almost any typed word and type another in, and you cannot detect it; there is nothing to show you it has been altered.

53,982. (Mr. Coward.) Speaking generally, to-day all wills are typewritten?—I know, but they are kept in a safe place, and they are in your custody.

53,983. I mean original wills?—But they are kept in somebody's possession, and no one is allowed to see them without somebody sitting and watching.

53,984. I say that wills before they are proved at all, when signed by the testators, are typewritten?—Yes, but they are always kept in somebody's custody who is responsible for them. They would not be allowed to be in the custody of anybody who is alone.

53,985. They are kept in exactly the same way as wills written in handwriting are?—But a will there is not the same objection to, because it is a sort of document which is kept absolutely under lock and key, and nobody could get at it to alter it; but many of the documents dealt with in the courts pass into the hands of others, and go about. We have had many specimens of that. We have had great difficulty with regard to alterations.

53,986. You could stamp each page?—We do stamp each page, but they can take out a word and type in another word, and you cannot detect it. They have some means of doing it; it is astonishing; I have seen several instances of it. That is one of the reasons against our using typewriting. As a Scrivenery Department we do not object to using anything wanted by the people who employ us—let me make that clear. I am only expressing the reasons why, generally amongst judges and those responsible in the law, they do not like to work on office copies of documents that are typewritten; they do not trust them. They may be taken away as office copies and altered.

53,987. Did you ever know such a thing done?—No, but we know what we are guarding against. If it is not a permanent thing we are not perfectly certain it is right. We know it can be done, because we have had it done for our own purposes, and it can be beautifully done.

53,988. (Mr. Boutwood.) From what you said about a contributory pension scheme, I gather, though you would like to see some kind of pension scheme started for the future, you thought the present problem ought to be dealt with independently—that is, the problem of the existing men?—Yes, I think the contributory scheme is really not much more than telling every man that he ought to put by. A contributory scheme means that he would put by and pay for his insurance, whatever it was that was offered to him, and probably what he would have to put by would be to carry out the idea of deferred pay being the foundation of pensions.

53,989. But a contributory scheme would be no good for your scrivener of 69; you want some other plan to deal with him?—Yes, we ought to have pensions, no doubt.

53,990. On the whole you are inclined to make them pensionable in the ordinary way?—Yes, and I think there is reason for it, and it is this: I do not know if it applies to other scrivenery departments, but it does to a good many. It is a remunerative department, and after all the men are not overpaid; they have to work very hard for their pay, and it would be very hard to take a contribution out of that and to make the pension dependable only on the contributions. After all the men do earn an absolutely net profit. Our department in the building earns a net profit of 2,000*l.* a year.

53,991. (Chairman.) You bring forward again that argument as to the department being a remunerative one. Would you apply that argument in the reverse direction and say that in unremunerative departments men should not be pensionable?—No, I would not. I put it plainly on the ground of public policy, that where men technically are not permanent, but in reality when over 50 years' past service can be shown by them in England, Scotland, and Ireland, they are permanent officials and have worked officially, and are never known to be anything else but permanent.

53,992. But has the fact of the department being remunerative or unremunerative any bearing whatever on the question whether the staff in it should be pensionable?—I do not think it has.

Mr. ARTHUR OLDHAM JENNINGS (Registrar of the Brighton County Court), called and examined.

53,993. (Chairman.) You are Registrar and High Bailiff of the Brighton County Court?—Yes.

53,994. You are also Registrar of the Brighton District Registry of the High Court?—Yes.

53,995. How long have you held those offices?—Since 1884.

53,996. Before that had you practised as a solicitor?—Before that I was a member of a firm of solicitors in Brighton.

53,997. You are President of the Sussex Law Society?—Yes, I happen to be that at the present time.

53,998. Have you seen the evidence given by Mr. Lowe on the subject of County Courts and their offices?—I have seen a précis of the evidence he was proposing to give.

53,999. Do you concur generally in the views therein expressed?—Yes, generally.

54,000. Your own court is, I think, one with a little more than 6,000 plaintiffs?—Up to the war time it always exceeded 6,000. It dropped a little below 6,000 last year for the first time.

54,001. Are you required to give the whole of your time to the duties of your office?—Yes.

54,002. How is your salary fixed?—I am paid by fees; that is to say, I am paid according to results.

54,003. Entirely?—Entirely. There is a maximum which must not be exceeded, but whether I reach the maximum or not depends on the amount of work done in the court.

54,004. That applies to the District Registry work as well as to the County Court work?—Yes; the district registry remuneration is part of the maximum which I may reach.

54,006. Has your remuneration reached that figure in recent years?—Yes. Generally it has reached that figure. It fell short of it, I think, two years ago, and it has done occasionally in the past.

54,007. Your remuneration as high bailiff is outside that remuneration as registrar?—Yes.

54,008. To what does that amount?—It averages about 150*l.* It varies.

54,009. What is the staff of your office?—In the County Court, that is, in the Registrar's Office, I have seven clerks altogether. There are three clerks in the Bailiff's Office and six bailiffs.

54,010. Taking the clerks first, they have partly a fixed salary and partly remuneration by fees?—Yes, nominally.

54,011. By the Schedule B fees?—They get a certain proportion of them, or one or two do; but I find it so inconvenient that a salary, which is not very high, should vary that it generally comes to my making it up if they suffer from Schedule B.

28 April 1915.]

MR. ARTHUR OLDHAM JENNINGS.

54,012. That is to say, any variation in the produce of the Schedule B fees falls on you and not on the clerks?—Practically it comes to that as a rule.

54,013. Those clerks are appointed by yourself?—Yes.

54,014. Are they practically permanent?—Yes.

54,015. Have you ever had occasion to dispense with the services of a clerk?—Only a very junior clerk. That is to say, the clerk who comes as office boy may turn out to be unsatisfactory and he goes, but a clerk who has really attained an actual position as clerk remains, unless by accident he gets some other work.

54,016. Did you take over from your predecessor the staff that you found there?—Yes.

54,017. The same observations would apply as regards the clerks in the High Bailiff's Department?—Yes.

54,018. Do you consider that the system of payment by results is a satisfactory one?—I do not consider it is for the larger courts. I think it is inconsistent with a judicial office that the salary should depend, even partly, on what particular course may be taken in a particular event. It gives occasion for the attack which has been made, I notice, in one of the statements of the clerks, that a registrar may be guided in a particular decision by a consideration as to whether it will affect his own salary or not. Although I think it is quite baseless as a charge, I think it is a misfortune for an officer who holds a judicial position that he should be even exposed to such an attack. I think he ought to have a fixed salary. I am referring to the larger courts only.

54,019. For the smaller courts do you see any alternative to payment by results?—I do not see any alternative.

54,020. So your observation applies only to the larger courts?—Yes.

54,021. It was suggested by one witness that the system of payment by results had been largely responsible for the great success of the County Courts, especially in the early days, by making it a direct interest to the persons concerned to serve the convenience of the public, and to make the courts useful. Do you concur in that view?—I think it is quite possible that the making of the registrar's salary depend on the amount of work he could attract to the court may, in the early days, have been useful to establish the County Court as one of the institutions of the country. But I still think, as I said before, that it is an undignified position for a judicial officer to hold, that his salary should depend on what orders he may make.

54,022. If his remuneration was entirely independent of the amount of the work it would not have any tendency to make him discourage applications to the court?—It does not in the case of other judicial officers. One may suggest that a judge, for instance—to compare great things with small—does not do his work because his pay depends on the way he does it.

54,023. In fact, you do not attach much importance to the argument as to the effect upon the officers concerned of the system of payment by results?—No, I do not in the case of the larger courts where a man gives his whole time to his work. I think his interest in doing his duty would be quite sufficient in the case of men of that stamp to ensure their doing their work to the best of their ability. Our work is very much the same as that of the masters of the Supreme Court—exactly the same, as far as the district registry is concerned—and they are paid regularly. I rather want to point out that the section of the Act of Parliament under which we are remunerated seems to contemplate a fixed salary for the registrars of the larger courts. Section 45 expressly speaks of it as a fixed salary. I suggest that that was the intention of the Legislature at the time.

54,024. That section lays down that in courts where the number of plaintiffs "have at any time exceeded six thousand, the amount of salary shall be fixed from time to time by the Treasury with the concurrence of the Lord Chancellor, but in no case shall the net salary, exclusive of clerks' salaries and office expenses

"to be allowed, exceed seven hundred pounds a year"?—Yes, it speaks of a fixed salary; and it goes on to say that the Lord Chancellor may require him to do no other work, and in that case he shall be considered to be one of the officers of the Supreme Court.

54,025. It gives power to the Lord Chancellor to prescribe that in certain courts the registrar shall not do any other work—shall not practise as a solicitor?—Yes, that is the case in Brighton. At the same time I do not become an official with a fixed salary.

54,026. How is it that although your court has had, until lately, 6,000 plaintiffs, you have not had a fixed salary as registrar?—I think it is rather an anomaly. The Treasury take the view that when they say "fixed salary" they do not mean to fix a certain amount, but to fix it on a certain scale. Although I am required not to practise, yet I am not required not to practise by an Order laid before Parliament, which this section contemplates. The Lord Chancellor took my personal undertaking not to practise, and therefore the Treasury say they need not allot me a fixed salary under the last part of the section. I will not comment on it, but that is a fact.

54,027. Then it is not the case that all the registrars of the courts with more than 6,000 plaintiffs have a fixed salary assigned to them as registrars?—No, I think there are only about eight or ten—I am not sure of the exact number.

54,028. Your own salary is made up of remuneration for your work as County Court registrar and your work as district registrar of the High Court?—Yes.

54,029. The number of plaintiffs in your court having been more than 6,000 until recently, it would seem that under Section 45 of the Act of 1888 a fixed salary ought to have been paid to you, that salary to be fixed from time to time by the Treasury with the concurrence of the Lord Chancellor?—Yes.

54,030. How, in practice, has that section been interpreted and applied?—The Treasury have issued a minute on which the remuneration of the registrars in courts over 6,000 plaintiffs is based, and that minute provides that the salaries of those registrars shall vary in accordance with the number of plaintiffs issued in the Court. So if I issue 6,000 plaintiffs my County Court salary is one amount, and if I issue 7,000 plaintiffs my County Court salary comes to a different amount.

54,031. That amount is always subject to the limit laid down by the section, that the net salary must not exceed 700*l.* a year?—Certainly.

54,032. Where you have a salary for a joint office, as in your case, that is subject to the total limit of 1,400*l.* a year?—Yes.

54,033. Towards that 1,400*l.* a year can the County Court work contribute more than that maximum of 700*l.*?—No.

54,034. Except so far as you may have Schedule B fees added to the 700*l.*?—Yes.

54,035. Your suggestion is that that system is unsatisfactory, and that a freer use should be made of the power which Section 45 gives of assigning to registrars of the larger courts a definite fixed salary?—Yes.

54,036. Not varying according to the number of plaintiffs?—Yes, particularly where the registrar also has High Court and Bankruptcy jurisdiction.

54,037. Turning now to the question of your clerks, you are aware that claims have been put forward on behalf of the clerks that they should be given an established Civil Service status, or, at any rate, that they should in some form be made pensionable?—Yes.

54,038. What is your view as to those claims?—I think it would be extremely difficult to give them a Civil Service status in a court of the size of Brighton, or most courts. I thought it possible that Birmingham offered the best chance of it where there is a staff of about 60; but in Brighton, where I have only seven clerks altogether, I do not know quite how I should grade them, or arrange promotion, or anything else. The clerks remain an extremely long time in the County Court without change; they get there and, as I suppose is the case with many other clerks in offices which are not Government offices, the clerks go on for a very long time. The pay is very small and about the same rate as solicitors' clerks get under the same circumstances. I do not see how I could possibly arrange to grade them, or arrange for promotion of them. I should myself be very glad if some scheme of pension—a contributory scheme of pension—could be arrived at, helped by the Government, because I see the great difficulty of clerks remaining in the office for a long time after they are past work.

MR. ARTHUR OLDHAM JENNINGS.

54,039. Have you had such cases in your experience?—When I first went to Brighton I took over two clerks as legacies, one of whom, I think, was over 70 years of age, and quite past his work; but he had made no provision for old age, and it requires great strength of mind or hardness of heart, or something of that kind, to get rid of a man whom you know you are turning into the workhouse, and he was retained on that ground. My own clerks have not at present arrived at that stage, although I have many who have been there a very long time, and I should be very glad if some system of pension could be arrived at.

54,040. Dealing first with the question of a graded service, the introduction of a system of that kind would, I presume, imply some freedom of transfer between the offices of the different courts in order to equalise promotion?—It seems to me inevitable.

54,041. Would such a system be workable?—I do not think it would. First of all there are so many local differences in the administration of the different courts—small differences of practice and differences arising from the nature of the locality in which the court is situated—that I do not think it at all convenient to transfer clerks from one court to another. I do not know whether it would be possible, but it seems to me, at any rate, it would be attended with very great inconvenience.

54,042. Would it also imply appointment by some central authority and not by the individual registrar?—I am afraid it would.

54,043. Would that be attended with any great inconvenience?—Great inconvenience and great danger, if I may say so. Where the clerk for whom the registrar is responsible is not appointed and dismissible by the registrar, it seems to me full of difficulties, and I do not see how it could work at all in practice.

54,044. Do you apprehend that the registrar would not have sufficient control over his clerks if their appointment and dismissal were not in his own hands?—I do. So long as the registrar is held responsible for the clerks, as at present he is, financially and otherwise, it seems to me impossible to take away from him the appointment and dismissal of the clerks. There must be control by one man in an office like a country registrar's office. If that is taken from the registrar I do not see what system you would substitute for it.

54,045. In some departments of the Government, such as the Inland Revenue and Post Office, you have local offices all over the country with a graded service and centrally controlled?—I believe so. I am not quite sure how low down the clerks are counted as Civil Service clerks. For instance, are they all graded? I have no information about that nor about their pay.

54,046. At any rate you attach great importance to the personal control which the present system gives the registrar?—Undoubtedly, very great importance.

54,047. Do you consider that the present system of fixing the salaries of clerks is satisfactory?—The system by which the registrar himself fixes what proportion the clerk should have of the total amount?

54,048. First of all a fixed sum is laid down for clerk hire?—Yes.

54,049. That total sum is distributed by the registrar among the clerks in his office entirely at his own discretion?—Yes.

54,050. The clerks, in addition, receive certain sums out of the produce of the Schedule B fees?—In some cases. That is also discretionary at present.

54,051. Can that system be employed in your own court, for instance, in a satisfactory manner as regards the remuneration of the clerks?—I think so. I do not see on what other principle you could well allot a sum of that kind when the payment is made in that way.

54,052. The complaint has been laid before us that a system of that kind does not provide for any progressive increase in the clerks' remuneration, that any advancement in their pay depends on the occurrence of vacancies, and that consequently a clerk who is getting on in life and has acquired the responsibility of a family may remain fixed at a comparatively low salary. Do you think that criticism is a just one?—I think it is to a large extent just; but I think it is unavoidable where you have an amount from the Treasury which you may not exceed. The alternative of increase of salary according to a scale would be very expensive. We should be very glad if the Treasury would enable us to increase our clerks' remuneration, but that the allocation of the increase, or whatever the nature of the amount is, must remain with the registrar is imperative; he alone knows the merits of the clerks, and what their deserts are. His only interest is to reward them according to their merits, or I presume so.

54,053. Taking the remuneration all round, do you think it is adequate?—It is very difficult to say. It has not been increased in accordance with the increased cost of living. One knows that those workmen and men who can agitate for increases are doing so. The clerks, not only in County Courts, but most clerks, are still kept to a scale of pay which has become much less than it was when they were first appointed, and from that point of view it is unsatisfactory; but it is an experience they share with other clerks who do similar work in similar localities. The work my clerks do is very much the same work that solicitors' clerks do who make the same kind of complaint.

54,054. How does their remuneration compare with that of a solicitor's clerk?—It is about the same, but men prefer the work in the County Court because it is not such onerous work as solicitor's work. The kind of man who takes the work is about the same with the same qualifications.

54,055. The chief need, you think, is for a system of pensions?—I do. I think it is very hard on the older clerks.

54,056. Would it be practicable to introduce a system of contributory pensions?—It would; but it would require careful working out. It has been suggested in the case of teachers under the Education Committees, and other similar bodies, who are finding the same need of starting a contributory scheme.

54,057. The first difficulty would be in dealing with the older men on the first introduction of the scheme?—Yes, there always would be difficulties.

54,058. Some contribution could be arranged to meet those difficulties?—That could be arranged.

54,059. You think a satisfactory scheme could be devised?—Yes, I think so. I do not speak as an accountant; but I think it is possible.

54,060. Do you think that any reduction could be made in the number of the smaller courts?—I think so. It leads at present to a most deplorable waste of time. Only last week a judge took six or seven hours travelling to a remote court where there was not a single case for him when he got there. One knows that at the larger courts there are people waiting impatiently for the judge's services. That is not an isolated instance. I know many such cases every year when there is either very little or nothing for a judge to do in a smaller court. When one knows the grievance expressed by suitors who are waiting, it seems to be an absurd waste of judicial time, apart from the expense of maintaining the smaller courts. Of course, it is not an easy thing to do. The locality of the smaller courts would not like it, and, naturally, the registrars do not like being abolished, and I suppose due consideration would have to be given to those who hold the office.

54,061. Apart from the question of individual interests, would the public convenience suffer by the abolition of the smaller courts?—I do not think so. The system dates from a period when communication was not easy between different towns in the same county when there were hardly any railways. It is so entirely different now, that I think there would be no real grievance in asking a suitor to travel a short distance by train as compared with the old days. Of course, any power of the kind would have to be exercised with caution.

MR. ARTHUR OLDHAM JENNINGS.

54,062. Taking the circuit in which Brighton is situated, there appear to be some courts where a very small number of complaints are entered?—Undoubtedly there are.

54,063. At Midhurst, for instance, there are only 150 complaints?—And Midhurst is a fearful place to get at, whereas it would be perfectly easy for the Midhurst people to get to Chichester or Horsham. To get to Midhurst from wherever the judge may be living is a very difficult thing. I have frequently heard judges say that they had gone to Midhurst, and that there was not perhaps work to keep them ten minutes when they got there. That was not the court I had in mind at the moment, but I think that takes 2½ hours to get to by train, and you have to wait until you get one.

54,064. In some cases two of the smaller courts have been joined together under the same registrar?—Yes.

54,065. Would it be desirable to extend that system?—Yes. It requires a little care in working out. The point is, I think, that the larger court ought to be the place of trial, which the judge can easily reach. There is no objection to one of the smaller places being the place where the complaints issue.

54,066. The main objection to the very small courts is the waste of time of the judge?—That is the main objection, and also there is the objection that you are continuing a useless organisation that is not wanted—useless machinery, rather—but that is not a very serious thing, because the pay the registrar receives is something very small in the small courts; at the same time, it seems to me quite useless in many cases.

54,067. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) Have you ever considered whether the work in the Probate Registry in the provinces could be more largely, than is at present the case, combined with that of the County Court Registry?—Yes.

54,068. Do you think that would be practicable?—I think, quite practicable.

54,069. Taking the more closely populated parts of England, do you think it would be possible, if you concentrated the Probate Registry, the County Court Registry, and, where that was practicable, the High Court Registry in one office, to cover all the outlying parts of England with a set of whole-time registrars?—Yes; I think it would make it much easier to appoint whole-time registrars.

54,070. You told us that one of the disadvantages of the existing system where there are part-time registrars is, that the registrar feels—although it is not likely to influence his judgment—that his remuneration depends upon the line of action he takes and the policy he adopts on certain proceedings?—Yes.

54,071. Would you mind giving us a few instances of the kind of questions on which the remuneration of the registrar depends upon the line of policy?—Let me give one instance: The issue of a summons outside his own district depends on the discretion of the registrar. We have to exercise that discretion on an affidavit and make up our mind about it. I see one of the clerks suggests that the reason we give leave for the issue of a summons out of the district is, that it will increase the number of complaints on which we are remunerated. I think it is an absurd charge; but it is one of the kind of remarks that I personally resent as a judicial officer, that it should be assumed that I am exercising my discretion as considering how far it will affect my own salary. Another more absurd instance arises under the Courts Emergency Powers Act, under which no creditor may enforce any remedy against a debtor unless he gets the leave of the County Court Registrar. I have some 20 or 30 applications a day. The creditor has to pay a fee before he gets before me, and that fee goes to me personally. The rules provide that the registrar may, in any proper case, waive that fee; that is to say, that I may be allowed to give 2s., or whatever it may be, to the man before me out of my own pocket. I suggest that it is absurd that a rule should be passed that I may be allowed to give somebody 2s. by way of charity. I am of opinion that that is a kind of absurd instance.

54,072. Those instances are interesting. Could you consult your memory to give us another?—There are several instances in bankruptcy in which precisely the same considerations arise—leave to issue a petition, and things of that kind, but I would rather not give a particular instance without being sure of it. Those two I have given occurred to me when you were speaking.

54,073. As to pensions, do not you think some alteration would have to be introduced into the conditions of appointment and dismissal of officials if they are to be made pensionable?—It has not been done with regard to teachers; they are still appointed in the same way, locally. There is a scheme of pensions for secondary school teachers.

54,074. The scheme of pensions for secondary school teachers is not yet a Government scheme?—It has been thought out but not adopted, as it would have been probably, but for the war.

54,075. The scheme of pensions for elementary school teachers requires that a man should be a certificated teacher, and that involves an examination, a medical inspection and other things?—Quite so.

54,076. You agree that it would be impossible to admit anybody to a State-aided pension scheme unless he submitted to a serious medical examination?—I agree.

54,077. Do you think there is any other consideration or condition?—I think the appointment might still be left to the registrar subject to the one question with regard to health. One is burdened by the misfortunes that one sees, and one is so anxious to think of some method to avoid the worst part of that particular grievance. I agree that there may be difficulties, but I do not think them at all insuperable.

54,078. If you have a couple of clerks who are only very partially efficient you have to appoint other clerks to do their duty?—Yes.

54,079. And, since the amount of the sum allowed you for clerk-hire is fixed, that means that the other clerks get less than they would have because they have inefficient colleagues?—I agree; but I cannot conceive the registrar appointing a man he knew to be inefficient.

54,080. But if you have two clerks who are over 70 or 80 years of age who cannot do their work, they nevertheless get a portion of the sum assigned for clerk-hire, and the clerks who have to do their work get less than they otherwise would for the work they do?—That is quite true, and I have heard that view expressed by clerks before.

54,081. (Mr. Boutwood.) You spoke of the importance of the registrar's control over his clerks?—Yes.

54,082. Would you still think that control important if the financial responsibilities of the registrar were taken away?—I should still think it important, but I should not resent it so much if I were not financially responsible for the men. It appears to me that in all establishments you must have one individual who can be got at, and who can control the men under him. That is the view I hold.

54,083. (Mr. Coward.) There is no District Probate Registry at Brighton?—The District Probate Registry is at Lewes for the Brighton district—not in Brighton.

54,084. Lewes is a very much smaller place than Brighton?—Yes.

54,085. And one would have thought, if it were for the benefit of the people, the Probate Registry should be at Brighton rather than at Lewes?—Yes, I have heard that view expressed before. It is a common view, I think.

54,086. You indicate, as I understand, that there would be in your view no difficulty whatever in the Probate Registry being attached to the County Court Registry at Brighton?—I see no difficulty.

54,087. Supposing you had the assistance of one competent clerk from the Probate Registry, for instance, at Brighton, do not you think the work would be quite efficiently done. Can you form an opinion?—I can hardly form an opinion because I do not know the exact number of wills proved in Lewes. Those figures are not before me. I do not know how many clerks they use at Lewes for the purpose.

54,088. I can tell you, but it is not worth looking at. It would be a great economy to have all the work centred in one office?—I certainly think it would.

28 April 1915.]

Mr. ARTHUR OLDHAM JENNINGS.

54,089. (Sir John Kempe.) I want to ask you a question that I asked Mr. Lowe. You attach great importance to the responsibility of the registrar, and you consider that you somehow guard against the responsibility by appointing your own clerks. I cannot follow the difference between appointing your own clerks and finding a clerk already appointed at your hand in the office. You get to know a clerk after a time, and surely can control a clerk so as to lessen your responsibility as far as possible; he is known in the office, whether appointed by yourself or by anybody else?—I should know him, but if I have not the power of dismissing him I do not see why I should be held responsible for what he does.

54,090. Why should the power of dismissal make the difference? A clerk in the Civil Service works very hard if he wants to get on, and he may get dismissed if he is a bad worker; but he is controlled simply by the desire to get on, and by a proper discipline held over him by the head of the office. Cannot you do the same thing in your office without appointing the man yourself?—If I had either an incompetent clerk or a clerk whom I suspected of gambling, or anything of that kind, I would send him away at once, not only in view of the public interest, but because I am responsible for any mistakes that he makes; but if I were held responsible for any clerk I cannot get rid of I should feel myself badly treated. I am financially responsible for any mistake my clerk makes; I have to make it up. I know that a registrar in a neighbouring court to mine had to find a large sum of money which a clerk misappropriated. The Treasury suggestion is: "You appoint that clerk and can get rid of him, and it is not unfair that we should hold you responsible." A registrar would very much resent a clerk being saddled upon him whom he could not get rid of.

54,091. But do you think if you took on a clerk appointed for the public service you would be more liable to get a clerk who would get into gambling habits than you are now?—I do not know that I would be more liable to get that, but now I can send him away directly I find it out.

54,092. In the Civil Service such things happen sometimes, but they are very rare?—The smaller salary a man has the greater temptation he has to go wrong. Gambling is an instance. I know several instances in my own circuit where that has occurred with clerks, and where the registrar has been required to replace sums which a clerk has not for some reason accounted for. I say it would be hard that the registrar should not be able to get rid of him directly he had a cause to suspect him.

54,093. (Chairman.) Do you take any fidelity guarantee from your clerks?—Only from the chief clerk. The chief clerk himself keeps a very close eye upon the others. I only get one from the chief clerk. The practice varies in different courts.

54,094. (Mr. Matheson.) Have you taken any clerks into your office who have not had experience before in a solicitor's office?—Yes. A large proportion of them come in originally merely as junior clerks or office boys, to use a common expression.

54,095. You find no difficulty in teaching them the work?—No, if they are intelligent they come on. My own view is that the best and most satisfactory clerk is the one who has come on in that way from the very beginning.

54,096. At what sort of age?—Fifteen.

54,097. Have they generally been at a higher school of some sort?—Very often. One generally tries to get a boy who has been at a higher school, and I generally try to insist on their further equipping themselves by attending evening classes. I encourage them as far as I can.

54,098. You said their work was not so onerous as the work of a solicitor's clerk. Is that in the hours or the quality of the work?—It is mainly a question of hours. They are fairly reasonable hours and it is not difficult to get away on any special occasion; one is fair to one's clerks. The hours are the main point; they are not required to work overtime in the same way that they are in solicitors' offices very often. I think I ought to add that I, myself, am under great obligations—and I think we all are—to our clerks, and I should not like it to be assumed that I am making any attack upon them in what I have said. I do not think we should be able to go on if we had not extremely efficient clerks, particularly the chief clerk. I am very much indebted to my clerks for helping me. My own time is taken up with judicial work; I can do nothing with the book-keeping; I have not the time, and therefore I could not oversee the clerks in that way at all.

Mr. GURNEY COOMBS (Registrar and High Bailiff of the Thrapston and Oundle County Court), called and examined.

54,099. (Chairman.) You are Registrar and High Bailiff of the County Court at Thrapston and Oundle?—Yes.

54,100. Those two courts were joined together not long ago, I think?—About seven years ago, I think it was.

54,101. Before that you had been registrar and high bailiff of the Oundle court?—Since 1892.

54,102. Are you a solicitor?—I am.

54,103. Do you practise as a solicitor in addition to your work as registrar?—Yes, and I hold several other public appointments.

54,104. Are your headquarters at Oundle?—Yes.

54,105. First, what is the amount of work done in the two conjoint courts? Has the average number of complaints in recent years been between 600 and 700?—That is so, until last year, when there was a decided falling off which we attributed entirely to the Emergency Powers Act.

54,106. That has been the experience everywhere, I suppose?—I believe so.

54,107. Your remuneration depends upon the number of complaints?—It does, in the aggregate. As, perhaps you are aware, every registrar has a fixed salary of 100*l.* a year, and then he is paid fees of 4*l.* for every 25 complaints beyond 200.

54,108. In addition to that, you receive certain remuneration as high bailiff, and from Schedule B. fees?—That is so. Shall I explain to you the system on which the high bailiff's salary, where he is acting also as registrar, is calculated?

54,109. Yes?—It is done in this way: A deduction of one-third is made from the salary of the registrar, exclusive of his fees, and then he is allowed one-fifth of the balance.

54,110. What has been your total remuneration in the last three years from all those sources?—In 1912, from the two sources—registrar and high bailiff—it was 250*l.*; in 1913, 225*l.*; and in 1914, 193*l.* That is, of course, without any deduction being made for income tax.

54,111. That is the net amount remaining to you after providing for the salary of your clerk and your assistant bailiffs?—That would be so.*

54,112. Have you one clerk?—I have one clerk. He is, I might say, exclusively employed in the County Court work, but at Oundle my other clerks assist him when required. I have a most experienced County Court clerk, who is not now doing County Court work as his ordinary duty, but he assists the regular County Court clerk, and, to a certain extent, supervises his work, and, if occasion requires, he is sent to the other office to assist.

54,113. Have you two assistant bailiffs?—Yes, one at Oundle and the other at Thrapston. The assistant bailiff at Oundle has other occupation. The assistant bailiff at Thrapston is wholly employed on the court work. I do not know whether at this stage it would be of interest to the Commission to know the area and the population of the two districts: The Oundle district consists of 35 parishes with a total acreage of 69,516, and a population of 10,936. The Thrapston district consists of 31 parishes with an acreage of 51,714 and a population of 15,385, so that the number of parishes in the combined district is 66, the acreage is 121,230, and the population is 26,321. I ought perhaps to add to that, that the district, particularly that of Oundle, is mainly agricultural. In the Thrapston district we run into the shoe-making industry, and also into considerable ironstone works; otherwise it is agricultural.

54,114. Dealing first with the question of your own remuneration, we have had some expression of views from other witnesses on the system of fixing the remuneration as applied to the larger courts. We should like to have your views on the system as applied to the smaller courts. Do you think it works satisfactorily?—I think it does on the whole, and I am really not able to suggest a system which I think would give greater satisfaction or would be any better in the public interest.

54,115. In the smaller courts you have very large variations in the amount of work?—We do.

54,116. And therefore, in the amount of time the registrar is required to give to it?—Yes.

54,117. It would, therefore, appear to be inevitable that there must be some system of adjusting the salary to the amount of work that the registrar is required to do?—Quite so.

54,118. You think a system which makes it directly dependent on the amount of work in any year is as satisfactory or more satisfactory than a system under which he would have a fixed salary modified from time to time according to the variations in the work?—Yes I do, and perhaps I may add this: I am a magistrates' clerk, and the system in that case is that the standing joint committee of the county fixes a salary and has power, with the consent of the Home Secretary, to revise that salary from time to time. I have held that office now 23 years, and in my experience it is extremely difficult to get any revision when there is any change in the volume of business.

54,119. Does that apply in both directions?—The standing joint committee has its eye upon reductions and perhaps the magistrates' clerks have their eyes upon increases, but certainly the standing joint committee have revised the salaries, I am bound to say, in cases, and where the courts have shown a large increase of work they have endeavoured to meet the claims of the magistrates' clerks, but in cases where there has been a decrease in the amount of the work I think their revision has been somewhat drastic. So certainly, speaking for myself, and I think perhaps I could also speak for the registrars, I say that the registrars of the smaller courts generally are not at all dissatisfied with the present system on which they are remunerated. I have never heard any complaint, and, so far as I am aware, the Association of County Court Registrars has never taken any action in the matter or made any suggestion—I may be in error here—with a view to the adoption of some other system.

54,120. Speaking for yourself you prefer the automatic system?—I think so. I think it is fairer, and, if I may say so, I think it is also fairer to the public purse.

54,121. Turning now to the clerks and the high bailiff's staff, your clerks and assistant bailiffs are appointed by yourself?—They are.

54,122. Do you attach importance to that method of appointment, and also the power of dismissal, as bearing on the question of the registrar's control over his officers?—Speaking now, of course, of the smaller courts, I think that inasmuch as the registrar is the paymaster of the clerks and bailiffs they should be appointed by him and be answerable to him. I do not see that it would be possible in the smaller courts to get officials appointed by the central authority, because local knowledge, so far as the bailiffs are concerned, is of the greatest importance in the discharge of their duties. If you sent a man down to a district such as mine, with a very large area, from another district entirely without any previous experience of the actual working,

I am afraid it would cause a great deal of trouble and confusion.

54,123. In the case of the smaller courts, are the clerks very often only part-time officers?—I think I may say, mostly so.

54,124. Is not your case somewhat exceptional in having a whole-time clerk employed upon the County Court work—I mean exceptional as regards courts comparable with yours in size?—I think it is, and it arises from this: A considerable part of his time is spent in travelling. Although Oundle and Thrapston are only some eight miles apart, in going backwards and forwards by train a good deal of time is occupied.

54,125. In the case of part-time officers, there would be obviously difficulties about any system of central appointment?—Yes, it is obvious that there would be.

54,126. Do clerks often move from one court to another?—In my experience three of my clerks have passed from mine to larger courts.

54,127. They saw an opportunity of bettering themselves?—Exactly. They have been principal clerks to me, and have secured appointments as principal clerks in a much larger County Court office.

54,128. A good man has in that way an opportunity of rising into a better position?—Undoubtedly.

54,129. At present there is no system of pension for the clerks?—None whatever.

54,130. Do you think it would be practicable and desirable to establish some system of pension?—I think it would be most desirable, but whether it is practicable in a case where the clerk's time is partly employed in the private work of his master, I rather doubt, because I think it would be somewhat difficult to get the Treasury to sanction a pension scheme which would meet the case.

54,131. In the case of a contributory pension scheme, it would be more possible to meet cases of that kind?—Yes, it would, I think, certainly. Personally I should only be too glad to see a pension scheme established, and I would suggest that it should be on a very similar basis to that which obtains with regard to the clerks and other officers employed in the administration of the Poor Law.

54,132. Is that a contributory scheme?—It is.

54,133. The clerks makes a contribution and the authorities makes a contribution, too?—That is so.

54,134. Does that apply solely to the whole-time employees, or does it apply to part-time employees as well?—Frequently clerks to the guardians of the poor hold other appointments.

54,135. It is practicable to have a contributory pension scheme of that kind to include part-time officers?—It is. The Poor Law scheme is a voluntary one; the officer is not bound to put himself under it unless he wishes to do so.

54,136. But the principle of the scheme would be equally applicable even if compulsory?—Certainly.

54,137. You would be in favour of the adoption of some scheme of that kind?—Entirely.

54,138. Your functions apply to two courts united together?—Yes.

54,139. Is that a common arrangement?—It is not common. Do you mean as registrar and high bailiff, or as registrar of two courts held at different places?

54,140. I am speaking of your being registrar and high bailiff in two courts at different places?—With regard to the first part of your question, the Treasury invariably allows and wishes the registrar to act as high bailiff in the smaller courts.

54,141. We have heard in evidence that that system is being introduced in all except the very largest courts?—That is so.

54,142. That, I presume, is a convenient system in the smaller courts?—It is, and I imagine that there is some saving to the Treasury.

54,143. Then, as to the question of the union of the two courts at different places, how does that work?—I cannot say that it is common, but there are a large number, and, I think, an increasing number, because the idea is encouraged by the Treasury and by the Lord Chancellor's Department, as I understand. The judges, I have been told, have been asked in filling up vacancies to consider the question of the amalgamation of smaller courts.

Mr. GURNEY COOMBS.

54,144. Is it an economical arrangement?—The Treasury saves the salary of one registrar.

54,145. That is to say, the Treasury saves that part of the salary which is in addition to the proportionate scale payment?—That is so.

54,146. Which is not a very large part?—No; it is 100*l.* a year.

54,147. 100*l.* a year, representing 200 complaints?—Yes.

54,148. The scale being 16*l.* per 100 complaints, the saving is the difference between 32*l.* and 100*l.*?—That would be so.

54,149. Are there expenses to set against that?—Yes, but not in all cases. In my own case the Treasury have been obliged to provide, furnish, and equip an office at Thrapston. My predecessor was a practising solicitor there, and he merely gave the County Court accommodation in his own office. Of course, a small allowance was made to him for that of 10*l.* a year, but now the whole expense of the Thrapston office falls upon the Treasury.

54,150. Is the arrangement a convenient one for the public?—I think so, on the whole, now that they have got accustomed to it. The offices are open for three days in each place.

54,151. A suggestion has been made to us that some of the smaller courts might with advantage be abolished, the argument being that the great improvement in means of communication which has taken place since the County Court districts were laid out, has rendered a good many of those small courts unnecessary now. Are you prepared to express an opinion on that point?—Of course, that depends entirely upon the districts themselves. If the railway facilities are good, no doubt some of the smaller courts might be taken to a centre; but in my own district, where the railway facilities are bad, I am afraid it would be a great hardship to a good many people. For instance, supposing my two courts, or one of my courts, were transferred to Peterborough, it would be taking it 13 miles away, and from the extreme limit of my Oundle district, which is the district nearer Peterborough, people would have to travel some 27 miles each way to get to the centre. A great part of that distance, all but 13 miles of it, would have to be travelled by road, there being no railway communication at all.

54,152. Then you say it depends entirely upon the local conditions whether it would be advisable?—I think so—on the facilities for getting to what would be made the centre of the administration of justice.

54,153. You told us that in the case of the registrar you thought the system of remuneration by results was satisfactory. Does that observation apply also to the system of remunerating the high bailiff?—No, I do not think it does, having regard to the great responsibility there is on the shoulders of the high bailiff, he being answerable for every act of his officers, and a very simple and apparently harmless mistake may involve him in very serious consequences, if an action is brought against him for the mistake of his officer. It seems to me that, having regard to the responsibilities and the amount of supervision that the work of the bailiffs requires, if it is to be efficiently done, the remuneration awarded to high bailiffs is small.

54,154. Your criticism applies rather to the amount than to the particular system by which the amount is arrived at?—Yes, the amount. I do not see any objection to the system.

54,155. Does it often occur that the high bailiff has to meet claims of the kind you mention?—I am very glad to say, after 23 years' experience, that I have not had an action brought against me, though I have been threatened with actions many times; but friends of mine holding similar positions have been less fortunate, and actions have been brought, and are frequently brought, against high bailiffs for alleged misconduct or some slip on the part of their officers.

54,156. Have you known any case in which the action has been successful?—Yes, I have.

54,157. The high bailiffs have had to pay sums of money?—They have had to pay damages and costs.

54,158. (Mr. Matheson.) Are you satisfied with the kind of men you get as clerks?—Yes. Of course they are my own selection, and, speaking generally, they have started, so to speak, at the bottom of the ladder in my office, and whenever I have seen a clerk who was promising and a good worker, I have kept my eye upon him and promoted him to the County Court office when opportunity arrived.

54,159. And you train them yourself?—So far as I can. I have had occasion to go outside my office, but it is usually to get a junior clerk or a clerk who has had experience in another court.

54,160. How do their pay and prospects compare with those of ordinary solicitors' clerks?—I should think they are quite equal to, if not somewhat better than, those of ordinary solicitors' clerks.

54,161. Are their hours much the same or shorter?—They would be shorter. Nominally, we are supposed to keep the hours of 10 to 4 in the County Court office.

54,162. An ordinary solicitor's office hours would be considerably longer?—Yes. My own clerks are frequently there until 7 in the evening.

54,163. Do your County Court clerks find anything to do in their spare time?—Yes. The clerk whom I now have with me happens to be a very efficient shorthand writer, and he takes, with my approval, pupils, and he also gives instruction at a County Council evening class.

54,164. Supposing by any arrangement the County Court clerks became Civil servants, do you think that the improved status would produce a better class of men?—It is, of course, impossible to give a definite answer to that question, but I doubt it myself.

54,165. (Sir John Kempe.) You say that in the larger offices, "You see no great objection to the appointments being made by the Treasury and being open to a limited competition, provided that the examination of candidates is made entirely a practical one, and that the officer appointed is placed entirely under the control of the registrar." Do you mean by that, that he is to have the power of dismissal of the clerks?—Perhaps I ought not to go so far as that, because I think that if the registrar proposed to dismiss a clerk employed in that way, it would be only fair and right that the registrar should have the authority of the Treasury—that he should report the matter to the Treasury, and that if the Treasury approved, he should be at liberty to dismiss him.

54,166. You would not be satisfied with the ordinary regulations of the Civil Service if a man were appointed by competition under the Civil Service Commission. Would not you like the ordinary regulation of the Civil Service and be satisfied with that?—Perhaps I am not quite familiar with the ordinary regulation.

54,167. A clerk cannot be dismissed off-hand except, of course, for misconduct and that kind of thing. Do you see any great difference between appointing a clerk yourself and accepting a clerk appointed under guarantees by the Treasury? Do you not think you would get an equally good man in both cases?—I think so.

54,168. A clerk appointed by the Civil Service Commission would be liable to lose his pension and to lose promotion. A good registrar would have perfect control over his office, and ought to be able to keep his responsibility and control without having the power of dismissal?—If one got the right class of man who realised that he has a duty, not only to the hand that pays him, but to the person who is answerable for his work, I think, perhaps, there would be no great objection.

54,169. There would, no doubt, be lapses in both systems occasionally, but you would not in effect get worse men under the Civil Service system than under the present system?—No, I do not feel any apprehension of that.

Mr. C. C. CARTWRIGHT (Second Class Clerk, Bankruptcy Department), called and examined.

54,170. (Chairman.) You are a second class clerk in the Bankruptcy Department?—That is so.

54,171. When did you enter the department?—In November 1896.

54,172. What had been your experience before that?—Before that I was in the Revenue Department for about two years, and before that I was at South Kensington for a few years engaged in temporary work at the South Kensington Museum. Then I passed the examination and got into the Customs, and from there I was transferred to the Bankruptcy Department.

54,173. As a third class clerk?—As a third class clerk.

54,174. How long have you been in the second class? Eleven years next month.

54,175. At present you are one of the clerks to registrars?—I am attached to Mr. Registrar Hope.

54,176. What is the point you wish to bring before the Commission on behalf of yourself and your colleagues?—The great point is that, considering the nature and the responsibility of the work, we reasonably think that the scale under which we work is not adequate.

54,177. Are you speaking of the scale of pay applicable to each class of clerks?—I am speaking more now of the second class.

54,178. You are speaking specially of the second class?—Yes. Mr. Carr is here, and he will speak as to the third class.

54,179. The scale of the second class is 250*l.* rising by 15*l.* a year to 400*l.*?—Yes.

54,180. That is the same scale as the second class scale in other offices of the Supreme Court?—It prevails in all the offices.

54,181. Have you any special points to bring forward to support your claim that there should be a different scale in the Bankruptcy Office from that which prevails in the other offices?—Yes. If I may give you the work I do, which applies to the registrar's clerks especially: In yesterday's work, for instance, I was sitting in chambers, and one of the most important duties I have to do is to issue bankruptcy notices. A bankruptcy notice, left at that, conveys nothing; you would probably know if you were a lawyer what it meant, but I have to look out for certain things to see that the bankruptcy notice is in order. For instance, the first point is, that before issuing the notice I have to be satisfied that the debtor resides in the jurisdiction; that is simple. Another point is, that I have to see that the judgment on which the applicant is asking me to issue the notice is not more than six years old, or if it be more than six years old that he has had leave to issue execution.

54,182. (Mr. Coward.) Or that it has been renewed?—Yes, an Order of Reviver. If the debtor is a married woman we have to be satisfied that she is a trader. If the applicant cannot satisfy us in all cases where we have to be satisfied we refer the applicant to the registrar. Again, we have to see that leave to issue execution has been obtained under the Courts Emergency Powers Act, and in the case of a judgment against a firm, if the applicant is asking to issue a notice against a member of the firm, and if that member has not been personally served with the writ, or appeared, or has admitted that he is a partner, then the bankruptcy notice cannot be issued against that individual.

54,183. (Chairman.) I think it will take us some time to go through the whole of the particulars which you have to examine before the issue of a bankruptcy notice; putting it generally, may we take it that before issuing such a notice you have to examine a number of points in order to see that it is in order?—That is so; points which we say are very important.

54,184. (Mr. Coward.) And which are very familiar?—After a considerable time.

54,185. (Chairman.) Taking that as one item of your work, what is there in that which is more responsible or more difficult than, say, the work of second class clerks in Chancery chambers?—My great point on that would be this: that bankruptcy is penal, and we have to exercise a great amount of care, and therefore it is very responsible work.

54,186. Does not that apply to all legal work?—No doubt it does.

54,187. Serious consequences may ensue from any carelessness?—Especially serious consequences in Bankruptcy, I submit.

54,188. Would the consequences be more serious than in the case of an important Chancery Order?—May I read what a Lord Justice said on that? Lord Justice Moulton, in a case of re a Debtor, 1910, II King's Bench, where it was decided that a petitioning creditor could not obtain an order for interrogatories or discovery to prove the allegation in the petition, said: "In my opinion the principles on which discovery and interrogatories have been allowed in actions in the High Court show that when the real issue is of a penal nature neither discovery nor interrogatories will be allowed. Now proceedings in Bankruptcy are, of course, not actions, but in my opinion what the petitioner seeks by his petition is in the highest degree penal in its consequences. It amounts to a loss of civil status carrying with it grave disqualifications," and so on.

54,189. (Mr. Coward.) Nobody denies that?—I am urging that in support of our responsibility.

54,190. (Chairman.) Your representation on that point is, broadly, that the work of the second class clerks, and particularly of the clerks to registrars, is of a more responsible and more difficult nature than the work of second class clerks in other departments of the Supreme Court?—I do not wish to compare our work with the work of other departments at all. I say that in our department the work is of such a nature.

54,191. I should like to be clear as to your attitude in reference to other departments?—I do not base my claim by comparing the work with other departments at all.

54,192. Then how do you arrive at a standard on which to base your claim?—I rely to a great extent on what our own registrars said with regard to this. They know what the work of other departments is; they have seen us, and have gone into our scheme, which is before you, and they have unanimously agreed that we have a very fair case, and our application is very reasonable.

54,193. What is your suggestion or application?—My suggestion is that the second class should not be barred at 400*l.*, but should go to 500*l.*

54,194. I gather from the paper you have submitted that your suggestion is that there should be a larger number of clerkships of the first class in the Bankruptcy Department?—Yes. We ask you to recommend that the clerk to the judge should be a first class clerk, and that the senior clerk to the four registrars should also be a first class clerk, and that the others should go automatically to 500*l.*

54,195. Beyond the ordinary maximum of the class?—100*l.* beyond the maximum of the second class.

54,196. Do you base the claim to have more first class clerks on a comparison with the other departments of the courts?—We do, coupled with the work.

54,197. Will you give us some facts in relation to the departments with which you wish to compare your department as regards the proportion in the different classes?—I can give you the figures. We are relying more on the Central Office. The number of first class clerks there is 11; the number of second class clerks 28; and the number of third class clerks 28, making a total of 67—that is, about 1 in 6.

54,198. What is the proportion in your department?—At present our proportion is 1 in 17, including the Taxing Office.

54,199. (Mr. Coward.) No; 1 in 13. There is one first class clerk, 7 second class clerks, and 6 third class clerks, and therefore there is 1 in 13?—But surely you cannot exclude the one first class clerk; you must total the whole.

54,200. (Chairman.) In putting it as 1 in 17 are you including the three clerks in the Taxing Department?—Yes, otherwise it is 1 in 14.

54,201. Taking the Bankruptcy Department alone it is 1 in 14?—Yes, eliminating the Taxing Office.

28 April 1915.]

Mr. C. C. CARTWRIGHT.

54,202. You submit that that proportion is smaller than in the other departments?—I do.

54,203. And in particular, smaller than in the Central Office, where it is about 1 in 6?—Yes. As regards the other departments it is infinitely smaller.

54,204. Is the work of the clerks to registrars distinctly more responsible and difficult than the work of the other second class clerks?—Undoubtedly.

54,205. Out of seven second class clerks, four are clerks to registrars?—Yes.

54,206. And one is clerk to the judge?—Yes, besides the four.

54,207. What is the nature of the work of the remaining two?—One has charge of the Filing and Record Department. The other is in Room 28, as I call it, for the sake of fixing the man, who takes in the petitions and files them. He is responsible for that, and he has been there a number of years.

54,208. That work is less responsible than the work of the clerks to the registrars?—I do not like to say that, really; but I must admit it, because the registrars' clerks have to examine the petitions after they have been filed for the registrars, so I think I am not saying anything against my colleague in saying that ours is more responsible work.

54,209. (Mr. Coward.) What does he do? He takes in a petition and files it?—He examines it.

54,210. (Chairman.) You suggest that the senior clerk to the registrars should have a better position than the other clerks to the registrars?—Yes.

54,211. Has he any special work or responsibility to justify discrimination in his favour?—The only thing I can urge in favour of that—I happen to be the senior clerk, so that possibly it might personally affect me or not—is that the senior man is supposed to be (I will not say he is) better up in the work, and as a rule when solicitors come in, as they often do, and want to know any points of practice or procedure, they go to the senior clerk. I think that is a fair observation to make.

54,212. Are there any other points you would like to put forward in support of your claim?—I do not want to keep you if you think you have heard enough; but we do feel that we really have a reasonable case based on the work. May I be permitted to put in an order? I have here a vesting order which has been through our department. It is brought in drawn, and then it comes to us, and we have to go carefully through it. It has been altered in that style. That is not an unusual form of order. (Producing same.)

54,213. Is it drawn by a solicitor?—Yes, as you see it, it was originally drawn.

54,214. And you have to go through it and revise it?—We get them to bring the various documents to the office, and we give them an appointment to settle or arrange that they shall come. We do not make an official appointment in the sense that we book it.

54,215. Do you settle this with the solicitor or does it go to the registrar?—As a rule we settle that, and if there is any point on it then it goes to the registrar to settle it; but I may say that we rarely have any points on these orders.

54,216. As a rule the order would be settled between yourself and the solicitor?—Yes, as a rule, but any point on them is taken to the registrar.

54,217. Part of your duties consists of sitting in court when the registrar is sitting?—That is so.

54,218. What do you have to do there?—I was sitting in court this morning. I have to see that the papers are in order, and that proper notices have been given as to discharges, and see that the proper times have been carried out generally. In the case of anything wrong I point it out to the registrar. I swear the debtor who comes to read the transcript of his public examination of the previous week—the clerk does that. I take notes, if necessary. On discharges one sometimes has to take a long note, because they are not officially taken down by a shorthand writer.

54,219. Do those notes of yours serve as a basis for a subsequent order?—Certainly. My notes on discharges or schemes form the basis, with the registrar's notes too, of the order which I might draw up in court.

54,220. Who draws the order?—We draw the orders. The rule says, if an order of discharge is not drawn up within seven days the registrar shall draw it. The practice seems to have become common now, that in the seven days the solicitors do not draw it, so we draw it.

54,221. You leave the matter for seven days for the solicitor to bring it to you?—Yes, that is what the rule says. A solicitor cannot always stay and attend to the order; he has other work to do, and he might probably come in on the seventh day.

54,222. (Mr. Coward.) The whole of the work, practically, of your department is done by the second class clerks to-day. You have only one first class clerk?—That is all.

54,223. So the second class clerks do the work?—We do the work.

54,224. Then the suggestion is that it is work that can be done, and is done, by the second class clerks?—They do it now, yes.

54,225. Then your suggestion is that they are not paid properly for what they do?—I humbly submit that. I think the class of work is such that, to ask that we should go to 500*l.* is not unreasonable. We are not asking that the whole of us should go to 600*l.*

54,226. There would be no possible reason for making more first class clerks if the second class clerks can do the work?—I would not like to answer that by a "yes" or "no," because you might say that a third class clerk could do it really if it came to that—that any clerk could do somebody else's work. I think a man should be paid for the class of work he does.

54,227. The whole of your work is within a very little ambit?—Unfortunately for us it is so; but even then we are only asking to be treated on a similar scale to that on the Common Law side.

54,228. Take this order which you put in: All you do here is to recite the deeds which show the title of the person in whom the property is to be vested, and then there is a very short order at the end: "It is ordered that the property do vest in them"?—Even doing that is a very important part of the work; but it is not limited to that.

54,229. I am only taking the order you show us. We do not want to see any more. I will take it that it is an important order. It has very important consequences for those who are going to be benefited under it; but as to the importance of drawing it, you surely do not suggest to me that that is an important order in the sense that it involves any great amount of legal acumen or skill on your part in drawing it?—I will not put it like that at all.

54,230. (Mr. Matheson.) What age were you when you entered the public service at South Kensington?—Originally, 23, as a Civil servant.

54,231. Was that at South Kensington?—I was at South Kensington before I was 20, but I was not a Civil servant then.

54,232. Then at 23 you went to the Customs?—Yes. Before I leave, may I say that Mr. Roper, who is clerk to the judge, has expressly wished me to hand this in to you. He has endorsed it stating what it is, and I shall be very pleased if you will let me do so? (Handing in documents.)

Mr. H. J. CARR (Third Class Clerk, Bankruptcy Department), called and examined.

54,233. (Chairman.) You are a third class clerk in the Bankruptcy Department?—Yes.

54,234. When did you enter the department?—In November, 1907. I obtained my certificate in December the following month.

54,235. What was your age then?—Twenty-three.

54,236. What work had you done before that?—I was for over nine years with the official solicitor, Mr. Winterbotham, in the Official Solicitor's Department.

54,237. You have heard Mr. Cartwright's evidence on behalf of the second class clerks?—Yes.

28 April 1915.]

Mr. H. J. CARR.

54,238. What are the points that you wish to put before the Commission with special reference to the third class?—Mainly this, that we are asking that our maximum salary should be increased to 250*l.* instead of 200*l.* as at present.

54,239. What are the grounds you put forward for that request?—The opportunity for promotion for the majority, in fact all, of the third class clerks is remote, and we ask, as there seems very little prospect of promotion for many, many years, that that increase should be given to us as an alternative scheme. The men who have gone before have all reached the second class and many of our men see no prospect of promotion, or at least not for 20 years.

54,240. You base that unfavourable expectation on the present ages of men in the second class?—Yes, I have a table showing their ages, if you wish to see it.

54,241. The Commission have their ages before them. Can you assign any special cause for that prospective block in promotion? Were the clerks at present in the second class appointed at one time or what was the reason of it?—I believe it happened in this way: In 1884, when the department was taken over, there were a number of men of the same age; they were all comparatively young men. Subsequently they all died or retired within a very short time and the third class clerks succeeded to their positions, with the result that the same thing will happen again as happened in 1884, that is to say, in 20 years' time approximately there will be a number of men retiring, and in the meantime those who are thirds will have no chance at all.

54,242. If the requisition put forward by Mr. Cartwright for an addition to the number of first class clerks were granted, it would to some extent meet the prospective slowness of promotion?—No, not so far as we are concerned, because I do not understand that they ask for these first class clerkships in addition, but merely ask that certain of the second class clerks should be made first class. It would not benefit us at all. It would not make any vacancies.

54,243. It would not create any vacancies in the second class?—No, it is no advantage to us unless it followed that two more second class clerks were made.

54,244. None of the third class clerks have at present reached the maximum of their class?—No.

54,245. So that the difficulty is a prospective one and not an actual one?—Yes, we have no grievance at present.

54,246. Your suggestion is that if promotion is unduly slow the case should be met by increasing the maximum of the third class?—Yes.

54,247. (Mr. Matheson.) Did you get any improvement in salary by entering the office?—No, I suffered a decrease at that time of 10*l.* and six months' seniority towards a further 10*l.* That is to say, I was receiving 110*l.* when I entered this department, and I should have received another 10*l.* in another six months, so I lost 18 months by doing so.

54,248. Was your other post a Civil Service post?—Partly so. We were on the temporary staff as personal clerks to the official solicitor, Mr. Winterbotham, who employed us with the concurrence of the Treasury.

54,249. But you were not entitled to pension?—No, that was my reason for leaving partially.

54,250. The pension was an attraction. Was any definite prospect held out to you of promotion?—Yes. That and the pension were my reasons for the change—the prospect of getting, or the hope of getting, a second class clerkship eventually. The former position held out at least the prospect of reaching the maximum of the third class and possibly more.

54,251. (Mr. Coward.) Are you an admitted man?—No.

54,252. How long were you with the official solicitor?—Nine years and some months.

54,253. What was your salary when you left?—110*l.*

54,254. I should like you to compare the work that you did with the work you do now. You must be a hard-working man. You must have seen some hard work?—I had to work very hard with the official solicitor.

54,255. Your work now is very very different—I mean in the hardness of the work?—It is different in a way. I had to run about a lot more there.

54,256. And had very long hours?—I could please myself. I always had to work until 6 there, and if I chose to work later I could, but I got nothing extra for it.

54,257. But you generally did stay later?—Once a week.

54,258. If there was work to be done it had to be done; you could not go off at 6 o'clock merely because 6 o'clock had sounded?—No, not always.

54,259. And now your work is very different?—We cannot always go away when we like even now.

54,260. But you can go at 4 o'clock?—Not as a rule.

54,261. At what time do you generally get away?—Between 4 and 5—very often towards 5.

54,262. At what time do you get there in the morning?—10 o'clock.

54,263. With a quarter of an hour's grace?—The book says that the line must be drawn at a quarter past 10, but in practice I may say that grace is not allowed. The chief clerk sits in the room and the book is signed in his presence, and if we are late he tells us of it, for this reason: As you know, the time a petition is presented has to be recorded, and more than one man must guarantee himself to be there in case of illness or accident. If two men come in with two petitions at the same time, trouble will ensue because of the question of costs. It has happened two men came in together. So we are always there at 10 o'clock.

54,264. Somebody is. Now about vacations. What vacations do you get?—We take no vacations. We have so much leave in the year. The office is never closed except on the day following Easter Monday—on the Tuesday.

54,265. What holidays do you have?—Six weeks. May I be allowed to say that the men feel, as an argument in favour of the increased maximum, that all of them have had legal experience before they entered the office. That was a point which I was asked to bring forward. They feel that is an argument in their favour, inasmuch as in days gone by men did not have that experience. Three of the men have been in solicitors' offices.

ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTIETH DAY.

Thursday, 29th April 1915.

PRESENT:

SIR HENRY BABINGTON SMITH, K.C.B., C.S.I. (Chairman).

Sir JOHN ARROW KEMPE, K.C.B.
Mr. ARTHUR BOUTWOOD.
Mr. JOHN ROBERT CLYNES, M.P.
Mr. CECIL COWARD.

Mr. ARTHUR EVERETT SHIPLEY, F.R.S.
Mr. GRAHAM WALLAS.
Miss HALDANE.
Mrs. DEANE STREATFEILD.

Mr. E. W. H. MILLAR (Secretary).

Mr. CHARLES WILLIAM KENTISH (Managing Clerk to Messrs. Williamson, Hill & Co.), called and examined.

54,266. (Chairman.) You are managing common law clerk with Messrs. Williamson, Hill & Co.?—Yes.

54,267. How long have you served with that firm?—Altogether, just over 40 years.

54,268. What age were you when you went into their service?—About 18.

54,269. Your experience enables you to speak specially with regard to the Central Office, the Taxing Office, and the Bankruptcy Office?—And the Commercial Court, in which we do a lot of work.

54,270. In the first place, as regards the Central Office, the masters at present are all barristers?—Yes, and I do not think you could alter that in any way.

54,271. You think that that system should be maintained?—I think it is absolutely necessary.

54,272. Does your work bring you into contact more with the masters or with the clerical staff?—Principally with the masters. I very seldom have been, lately at any rate, to the offices. To the Order Office or the Writ Office now and again I go.

54,273. Your juniors mostly do that work?—Yes.

54,274. Do you frequently appear before the masters?—Nearly every day.

54,275. Do you think, from your experience, that the present method of recruiting the clerical officers produces the right class of man?—I think so. They all seem to know their business very well. Of course, there is not very much business to know in some offices. For instance, in the Writ Office it is simply looking at the writ, sealing it, putting a number on it, and afterwards entering it into a book.

54,276. When you speak of looking at the writ, does that mean it has to be examined as regards any important points?—To see that the plaintiff's and the defendant's names are in, and the endorsement; not to see whether it is a good endorsement or a bad one, but that there is an endorsement on it.

54,277. If the writ is irregular in some respect, do you expect it to be corrected in the office?—No.

54,278. Or the irregularity to be pointed out?—No.

54,279. Then you consider that their scrutiny merely applies to the form of the writ?—That is all.

54,280. That is not a difficult matter?—There is no difficulty at all about it.

54,281. As regards the other departments of the Central Office, do you consider that the work there is of greater difficulty?—I think probably it is in the Order Office. A man has, I think, to get some experience before he can get into the Order Office. Of course, he would have to get some experience before he went into any office—I mean he would have to learn something. With regard to orders, a man does require some little experience which he would soon pick up. Of course, if he had been in a solicitor's office before, there would be no difficulty; he could almost go into that office straight-away.

54,282. Do you think it desirable that men going into the Central Office should have had experience in a solicitor's office before?—I think so, at any rate with regard to the Order Office.

54,283. If they have not had such experience would they have any difficulty in picking up the work?—It might take them a few months longer, perhaps. Some would pick it up quicker than others.

54,284. But it is work which could be learnt in the office?—Oh, yes.

54,285. Which are the departments of the Central Office where you consider the work is more responsible and difficult?—I should think the most responsible office is probably the Crown Office.

54,286. What about the Associates Department?—You mean the associates who sit in court? They are, of course, in court and take down a note of the judgment when it is delivered—a short note—but, as a rule, if any special terms are endorsed on counsel's brief, they practically only have to copy them into the order.

54,287. Speaking generally, how would you compare the work of the clerks in the Central Office—leaving aside now the junior clerks and speaking of the senior clerks in the Central Office—with the work of a managing clerk in a big solicitor's office?—I think there is hardly any comparison.

54,288. Will you enlarge that opinion a little?—A managing clerk in a solicitor's office has to deal with every kind of dispute, almost.

54,289. (Mr. Coward.) Every kind of order?—Every kind of order. He takes statements of witnesses, he has to peruse documents, inspect documents, and they are of a different kind every day; the work is not the same on any one day; he has to have a very large experience and has to be very careful. Whereas, if you go into an office where the orders are drawn up, the only thing you are doing all day is drawing up orders, and they are all more or less the same.

54,290. (Chairman.) You would say that the work of a solicitor's managing clerk is much more varied?—Very much more varied.

54,291. And therefore requires a wider extent of knowledge?—Absolutely.

54,292. (Mr. Coward.) Would not you say it is more responsible?—Certainly, more responsible as well. There is very little responsibility in these offices, because if a clerk makes a mistake it has to be put right. If a solicitor's clerk makes a mistake in going through correspondence it is a very serious mistake which cannot be put right afterwards, except at great expense to the client, probably.

54,293. (Chairman.) How would the Central Office compare with a solicitor's office as regards hours of work, holidays, and so forth?—The hours of work in the Central Office are not very long. The hours in a solicitor's office are very long very often.

54,294. What are your ordinary hours of work?—I get there at 9 o'clock and usually leave at 6, but that means that I very often—once or twice a week—take work home, and that sometimes keeps me up till 1, 2, or 3 o'clock in the morning. I do not say it is often 3 o'clock in the morning, but two or three hours once or twice each week.

54,295. Would those be the usual hours for the whole of the staff?—No; the juniors leave at 6 or half-past 6; it depends upon the work. We close at 6, if we can; but if there is a lot of work to be done, of course, the office has to be kept open.

54,296. For the juniors the ordinary office hours would be 9 to 6?—Yes, except the shorthand writer, perhaps, who would have to stop on, and the typists. The ordinary clerks who go out and do the work during the day—go to the different offices to issue writs or summonses, or draw orders—leave at 6.

54,297. How do you consider that the scale of pay of the clerks in the Central Office compares with the scale of pay habitually in use in solicitors' offices?—I am not certain that I know what the scale of pay in the Central Office is.

54,298. The clerks are divided into three classes. The pay of the third class begins at 100*l.* a year and rises to 200*l.* by annual increments of 10*l.*; the second class rise from 250*l.* to 400*l.* by annual increments of 15*l.*, and in the first class the pay rises from 500*l.* to 600*l.* by annual increments?—My experience is that a junior clerk in a solicitor's office gets a little more than 100*l.* a year, but not very much.

54,299. He would not get as much as 200*l.*?—Certainly not.

54,300. And the higher posts in the scales I have mentioned would, I suppose, be considerably better paid than the best paid clerks' posts in a solicitor's office?—The first class clerks certainly would be, and I should think in most offices they would not get anything approaching the maximum salary of the second class clerk. They may in some very big offices. There are big offices and small offices. In a small office I do not suppose the managing clerk would get more than 150*l.* or 200*l.* a year, if he got that.

54,301. What is the position in your office as regard pensions? Have the clerks any right to pension?—No.

54,302. As a matter of practice, are pensions ever given?—Yes, I think they are.

54,303. At the present moment are there any pensioners who served formerly in your office?—No, not at the present moment. Some of the clerks have been pensioned at different times, but none are drawing pensions now; they are dead.

54,304. That would be as a matter of grace and not as a matter of right?—Simply as a matter of grace.

54,305. Would it usually be the case that a clerk who had served well for a long time and became past his work would be pensioned?—I think it varies in different offices. Some offices, I think, do it and some do not.

54,306. You could not say that there is any general practice?—I am certain there is no general practice.

54,307. We have been told that there is a provident fund among solicitors' clerks?—There is the Law Clerks' Society.

54,308. Do most of the clerks in your office belong to that society?—I think only about two or three.

54,309. Do you contribute to it personally?—No.

54,310. It is not in very general use among clerks in your profession?—I think a good many have joined since the Insurance Act came in.

54,311. Why has that induced them to join?—Because they get a better pension, and they get more money when they are ill.

54,312. That would apply, I suppose, to the junior clerks with salaries below 160*l.* a year, who are eligible for insurance benefits?—Yes. There are some clerks who have been members for years. I know people who have been members for, perhaps, 20 or 30 years, and, of course, their salaries would be more than 150*l.* a year now.

54,313. Turning now to the Taxing Office, what is your estimate of the work done by the clerks there? Do you consider it better work or more difficult work than that done by the clerks in the Central Office?—It does require a good deal more experience. It would probably take anybody two or three years to pick up the work in the Taxing Office.

54,314. Would a man who had served as a clerk in a solicitor's office be more capable of picking it up quickly?—Very much more so.

54,315. He would have had some experience of the kind of work?—He would have had experience with regard to what we call scale items, and would know a scale item directly he saw it.

54,316. At present the clerks are recruited from the bottom; that is to say, they enter the third class and are promoted to the higher classes in the Taxing Office?—I do not know whether they are first and second or second and third in the Taxing Office, because very few taxing masters have more than two clerks. I do not recollect any taxing office where there are three.

54,317. The Taxing Office clerks are, as a matter of fact, divided into first, second, and third class, for the purpose of fixing their scales of pay; but I think it is the case, as you say, that two clerks—one higher clerk and one lower clerk—are attached to each taxing master?—That is so. I do not recollect any taxing master who has three clerks. There may be one, but only one.

54,318. The first clerk attached to a taxing master would in some cases be a first class clerk, and in some cases a second class clerk, according to his scale of pay; but probably you, from your contact with them, would not see any distinction between the two?—I do not see any distinction.

54,319. Do you think that there would be an advantage in recruiting the higher clerks in that office from outside, or would the experience of the lower clerks qualify them for the higher work?—I think it would be an advantage to have someone from outside. A solicitor's managing clerk, I think, would make a very good first class clerk. For instance, he knows the work so well and knows all the scales of costs well. That is all they have to do. They have no discretion; they very seldom act as taxing master. Now and again they do, and all they do then is to go through the bill of costs and pick out the scale items, leaving the other items for the taxing master to deal with when the parties come before him.

54,320. Is not that work which third class clerks would have learnt from their experience?—They could learn it, no doubt, but it would take them a long time, I think, if they came from right outside.

54,321. But that is the work that they are doing all the time?—Yes, that is the work that they are doing.

54,322. Do you find that the work of the taxing office is done satisfactorily?—As a whole, yes.

54,323. With expedition and with equity?—Yes, the work is done very well. There is nothing to complain of.

54,324. The taxing masters are, I think, almost without exception solicitors?—I think so.

54,325. Is that the right source from which to appoint taxing masters in your opinion?—I think it would be if they could get anybody with experience. Most of the appointments, I think, have been, lately at any rate, of solicitors with very little experience of costs.

54,326. Why is that?—Because they have never had to deal with them. They have never had to tax bills, probably.

54,327. But they must have had bills taxed?—But they would not tax them themselves. A solicitor very seldom attends to tax a bill of costs in my experience. I have now and again seen a solicitor in attendance, but it is only one with very small work who ever attends and taxes a bill of costs.

54,328. You mean it would be done by the managing clerks?—Always.

54,329. But he would be acquainted with the results of the taxation?—Probably the totals only—how much the bill was made out at, and how much was taxed off the bill.

54,330. He would not go into the details of it?—No, I do not think so.

54,331. What is your inference from that?—My inference is that he has to learn the business.

54,332. I meant rather as regards the source from which taxing masters should be drawn?—I think solicitors' managing clerks would make very good taxing masters, for this reason: A managing clerk in a large office has to take statements of evidence; he knows exactly the difficulties of getting up a case with regard to "Instructions for brief," and an item of that kind.

54,333. (Mr. Coward.) That is the only item really?—That is the only item really, and that is a very important item, to solicitors at any rate, on which they should get a proper allowance as "Instructions for brief." It is all very well to be wise after the event. Speaking of a taxing master of any very great experience he says: "Well, you had so many witnesses and "there were so many documents to peruse; I think a

Mr. CHARLES WILLIAM KENTISH.

"fee of 15 or 20 guineas would be ample," but it does not always follow that that is all you do. You have to go and search about for witnesses, and there is the difficulty of getting hold of them. A witness is a very important person when you want him. You have to study him in every way. Sometimes you go and get him straight away, but sometimes you wait two or three hours for him, or go two or three times to see him, and it takes a very long time, which is not taken into account.

54,334. You might perhaps explain that you do not get paid for all that work in getting up the case, which involves going to see witnesses and doing all that class of thing?—That is what I mean.

54,335. That goes into the "Instructions for brief" as one item?—Yes, and a solicitor who has not had experience of that kind does not know really what it is.

54,336. (Chairman.) Your suggestion is, that in estimating what would be a proper charge under that head, a managing clerk's experience is more valuable than a solicitor's experience?—Yes, that is what I mean.

54,337. And that, therefore, it would be desirable to select the taxing masters from among managing clerks?—Yes.

54,338. Do you think if that was done the managing clerks appointed taxing masters would command as much confidence and respect?—I think so.

54,339. I am not reflecting on the position of managing clerks, but the solicitor is the principal and the managing clerk is not. You think the managing clerk would command sufficient confidence and respect?—I think so.

54,340. Turning now to the Bankruptcy offices, have you any special observations to make upon them other than those you have offered on the other offices?—The clerks in the Bankruptcy offices are very, very competent men. I do not know where they get them from, but they seem to pick up the work, and it is complicated work, too, in Bankruptcy very often. They are all men who do know their work thoroughly, and they are always willing to help you, too.

54,341. Do you say that the work there is more difficult than the work in the other offices of which you have spoken?—As a rule, I think so. It requires more picking up.

54,342. You find it very well done?—Very well done, and the clerks there are very willing to give you assistance if you require it.

54,343. Do not you find that in the other offices?—I should not like to say. I think you get very fairly dealt with. As a matter of fact, a solicitor's managing clerk knows his work so well that he does not require any assistance.

54,344. (Mr. Coward.) Is not the real answer, perhaps, that with Bankruptcy you go there very rarely, comparatively, and you do not know the practice there as well as you do the common law; whereas in common law you are with the masters every day, and many times a day?—I think, probably, that is the best way of putting it.

54,345. (Chairman.) For that reason you require more assistance when you have to go to the Bankruptcy offices?—Yes, you require more.

54,346. Do you consider that in any of those offices the staff is more than sufficient?—I am not quite certain that I know how many there are. I think there are about three clerks in each Writ Office to issue writs. I think that is too many.

54,347. Your impression is that there are more clerks than is necessary?—Yes.

54,348. Have you anything to say as regards the hours during which the offices are open? Would there be any advantage in having them open during longer hours?—No, I do not think so. It would be disadvantageous to solicitors and their clerks.

54,349. You prefer that they should be limited to the present hours?—Yes. I think the hours are long enough, and I think they can get through the work in the hours.

54,350. What about the arrangements in vacations? Are those adequate?—I think, with regard to the Taxing Office, that if they kept two masters, say, for about three weeks after the vacation commenced, there would be some advantage. Cases are tried sometimes, at the assizes at any rate, right up to the end of July, and it generally takes some few days before you can get your bills of costs ready for taxation.

54,351. Have you read the report of the Commission on Delay in the King's Bench?—No.

54,352. You are not familiar with the suggestion that they made in that sense?—No.

54,353. (Mr. Coward.) There is difficulty sometimes in getting costs taxed in cases that have been tried at the assizes?—Very great difficulty.

54,354. It sometimes goes over the vacation?—Very often, and you have to go and tell the taxing master that there may be a risk of losing the money.

54,355. (Chairman.) In cases of urgency of that sort, can you get the business attended to?—Yes, they would tax a bill then; but as there is only one master, if there are a good many bills to tax, you would not get yours taxed sometimes for perhaps a month.

54,356. The suggestion has been made by one witness that a wider and more liberal interpretation should be given to the term "Vacation business," and that at present the line is drawn somewhat too tightly. Do you agree with that?—I think there is enough scope. I do not think it should be extended in any way. I think there are enough masters. I only ask that the Taxing Office should be kept open a little longer, or, instead of having one master, that there should be two in attendance.

54,357. Another question on which the Commission have had evidence, is that of fixing an age limit for retirement, both in the case of masters and registrars, and also in the case of the clerks. Are you prepared to express an opinion on that question?—I think, with regard to clerks who enter very young, say, at 18, as a third class clerk, he should be at liberty to retire if he likes after 30 years' service, and he should have so much of his salary at 30 years, so much more perhaps at 35, and so much more at 40 years; but I do not think it would be well to fix any hard and fast rule that a man should have to retire at a particular age.

54,358. Have you known any cases of men stopping on when they are past their work?—I do not think I have recently. I have in years gone by.

54,359. Your suggestion that a man should be entitled to retire after 30 years' service may mean that he should be entitled to retire at 48, if he entered at 18?—Yes, but on a reduced retiring pension.

54,360. Is not that rather an early age for a man to have the option of retirement?—I do not know. Supposing a man is not very well, and after he has had 30 years' service may have a little money, he might think, if he could have a very small pension, "I will retire and make room for somebody who can do the work better."

54,361. A man who can obtain a medical certificate that he is incapacitated can retire?—I did not know that.

54,362. The ordinary Civil Service rule is that a man, apart from cases of invalidity, may retire at 60, but must retire at 65 on pension?—I should feel inclined not to fix any particular age.

54,363. Have you any suggestion to make with regard to the Commercial Court?—The only suggestion I should like to make there, would be that they should have somebody appointed who would draw up the orders and issue summonses.

54,364. How is that work done at present?—It is a little bit complicated. When you issue a summons in the Commercial Court, you have to take it to the Summons and Order Department of the Central Office and get the stamp cancelled. Then you have to go to the judge's clerk's room to get an appointment. Sometimes, and it very often happens, the judge's clerk is engaged with the judge. You then have either to wait for perhaps a quarter of an hour or 20 minutes, or, if you have not the time, you go away and come back again, and very often have to wait. If there was one clerk appointed to do the work, he would be always in attendance.

54,365. (Mr. Coward.) And in vacation you cannot get a summons at all?—No; and you cannot issue a summons in the Commercial Court on Saturdays, because there is no judge's clerk there.

Mr. CHARLES WILLIAM KENTISH.

54,366. And the want of ability to issue summonses in vacation is very inconvenient and very troublesome sometimes?—There is no judge. You cannot issue commercial summonses in the vacation at all.

54,367. You cannot issue the summonses at all?—You cannot.

54,368. And I say it works very harshly sometimes, and is very troublesome. Do you agree with me?—Yes, I do agree with you.

54,369. (Chairman.) How does that differ from the procedure in the other courts. You say, with regard to the Commercial Court, if you want to take out a summons for directions you have to go to the Central Office first to get the stamp cancelled, and then you have to get an appointment?—Yes, you have to go to the judge's clerk.

54,370. What have you to do in another court?—If you issue a summons for directions you simply go to the clerk who cancels the stamp and he puts it in the list at once.

54,371. The difficulty is that in the Commercial Court you have to go to another clerk to get your appointment?—Yes, with the result that sometimes the clerk is in court with the judge and you have to wait for him.

54,372. (Mr. Coward.) The reason is because the Commercial judge deals with his own summonses?—Yes.

54,373. (Chairman.) He deals with his own summonses and has a separate list of them?—Yes, there is a separate list.

54,374. Then your suggestion is that the summons should be taken out with the clerk who gives the appointment?—Yes.

54,375. That would be a departure from the system which prevails all round in the Supreme Court of taking out your summonses in one office?—In the case of the Central Office before the master you take it out in one office, but in the case of the Commercial Court you have to go to two offices. You first go to the Central Office and get your stamp cancelled and leave a copy, and then you have to go to the judge's clerk to get a day appointed for the hearing of the summons. That clerk could draw up the orders; he would be always there, and would be there on Saturdays and all day long, and if you wanted to issue a summons you would be certain to find him there and would not be delayed. It might happen two or three times that you might say, "I will come back in a few minutes," and you go back, and the clerk has been back and gone somewhere else. I am not saying they keep out of the way purposely, but they have duties to perform for the judge which necessarily take them away from the room.

54,376. Would your junior clerks, if they had the chance, all be glad to get an appointment in one of the offices of the court?—I think so.

54,377. They would regard that as an improvement in their position?—Yes, the work is not so hard.

54,378. (Mr. Coward.) The vacations are longer?—The vacations are longer and the berth, as long as they behave themselves, is there for them.

54,379. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) The more mechanical work of the office is confined to a few rush hours when the business comes in?—In the Writ Office I should think the hardest time is from 2 to 4, when they have more writs to issue than at any other part of the day.

54,380. Supposing this were a private office and you had to deal with a rush of work of that kind during two hours of the day and had the staff which is there, do you think you could arrange that that work should be run off rather more rapidly than it is at present?—I do not think so, because they have nothing to do until they have issued a writ. They might have 20 or 30 come in just at ten minutes to 4.

54,381. But could not you turn the whole staff on to it for a couple of hours?—You could, but you have to put a number on to each writ and there is only one list of numbers.

54,382. But if you were doing it in a solicitor's office you could get over that difficulty by one man numbering from one hundred and another numbering from another hundred?—I dare say, but supposing they had 20 or 30 writs coming in at ten minutes to 4, it would only take them to twenty minutes or half-past 4 to complete the whole of the work, and they would shut the door at 4 o'clock and let no one else in.

54,383. Would it be convenient to the public that the purely mechanical work should be done as quickly as possible so that nobody should be kept waiting, and the door never shut on rows of people waiting?—I do not think you will ever find anybody waiting. Now and again at five minutes to 4 there might be a rush, but I do not see how you can help that.

54,384. Supposing you were organising a big private office, consisting of various kinds of work, some of which had to be done practically between 2 and 4, and some other which could be put off, do not you think you could arrange to fill a rather longer day than is usual in the Central Office?—I dare say you might in a private office, but I doubt whether you could in a public office like the Supreme Court.

54,385. Do you in your own office use typing very much for important documents?—Yes.

54,386. Which do you believe to be on the whole the more satisfactory, a typed document or a written document?—A typed document.

54,387. It is easier to read, is it not?—Yes.

54,388. And easier to detect mistakes?—Yes, and generally it is more correct.

54,389. Because a man copying with a machine copies more correctly?—Yes, I think so.

54,390. Do you see any reason why the documents in the Central Office should not be typed more largely than they are at present?—No, none at all.

54,391. Do you believe that there is a greater possibility of fraudulent changes in documents in the case of typing than in the case of written documents?—I do not think so—I have never considered it, but I do not see why there should be.

54,392. In your précis you tell us that in cases of inefficiency it is rather difficult for the profession to complain. If you notice that a clerk or anybody else is inefficient it is not quite your business to complain to anybody. Do you feel that?—Yes, I do feel that.

54,393. Do you think it would be an improvement in the Central Office if some experienced and able clerk were made what is called in other offices chief clerk; that is to say, it should be his main business to manage the discipline of the office, to report upon everybody's efficiency, and prevent any case of inefficiency occurring or remaining?—It could be done, but I do not know that there would be very much benefit from it. I do not think he would be able to detect inefficiency very well unless it was pointed out to him.

54,394. Supposing you were appointed to such a post with your long experience of governing men, do not you think if it was your main business to see that nobody in an office was inefficient, you would in the course of a year or two be pretty sure on that point?—I should not like to have to do it, and I doubt whether it could be done really; it can be only the public who can find out these things, because the man would be quite efficient when this chief clerk went round to look and see what he was doing; he would know him and would say, "Now I must do my work well."

54,395. I should have thought the resources of civilisation were not exhausted of the ways of finding it out?—I do not suppose they are, but I think it would be very difficult.

54,396. About what proportion do you think of experienced managing clerks in London are solicitors?—I do not think I could tell you.

54,397. (Mr. Coward.) You would have to discriminate between Common Law and Chancery for that?—I should have to.

54,398. There are many more in Chancery than in Common Law?—Yes.

54,399. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) Do you think, if the Government desired to appoint managing clerks to some important posts, but said that the Government would only do so in case they were solicitors, they would be leaving out, as possible candidates, some of the very best men?—I think they would.

29 April 1915.]

Mr. CHARLES WILLIAM KENTISH.

54,400. Do you think the question whether a man is a solicitor or not is, in the position of a managing clerk, any indication of his professional ability?—I do not think so.

54,401. In other Government offices the more mechanical work is done by a set of people who are appointed very young, and expect to be kept at the more mechanical work all their lives, and learn to do it more quickly and more promptly. The higher work is done by people starting rather later and with rather better education?—Yes.

54,402. Do you think that would be a good principle to adopt in the Central Office?—I think so.

54,403. That, as a rule, the first class clerks should be admitted at a later age with rather more extended education?—I think so.

54,404. Instead of passing 10 years as third class clerks?—Yes, all the work in these offices is more or less mechanical, and while they are engaged in one office they do not learn the duties of another.

54,405. And a man who is kept for 10 years at purely mechanical work is apt to be unfitted for the higher work requiring judgment afterwards?—I do not know that that would be so in every case, of course, but in the majority of cases I should think so.

54,406. (Mr. Coward.) I should like to ask you a question with regard to the work that is done in the Central Office, if you will be kind enough to tell us about it. The first thing you do at the commencement of an action is to issue the writ?—Yes.

54,407. Where is the writ prepared?—In the solicitor's office.

54,408. What do you do with it then? Do you send it up by a boy to the Central Office?—Yes.

54,409. What happens next?—The first thing he has to do is to get a 10s. stamp impressed upon it.

54,410. He goes to one pigeon-hole and gets that done?—Yes, and then he goes upstairs to the division out of which it is to be issued, whether A to K or any other part of the alphabet; he simply lays it on the table, the clerk takes it up and just looks at it, turns it over, and he has a lot of numbers in rotation at the side, and he simply strikes that number out, puts it in the writ, and seals it.

54,411. That is the number of the action?—Yes.

54,412. And that number goes through the action?—Yes.

54,413. What has the clerk in the department to do with that writ? He will seal it?—He seals it, that is all.

54,414. He has got nothing to do with what is the claim on the writ nor anything of that kind?—Nothing whatever.

54,415. Nor anything to exercise any judgment upon?—No judgment at all.

54,416. (Chairman.) I thought you told us he had to see it was in proper form?—They will not issue a writ in the name of, say, C. W. Kentish; they would want one christian name if they could not get the two. That is all he has to look at. He has to look at the bottom of it to see whether or not the plaintiff's address is put in at the end. That is the only thing he looks at.

54,417. (Mr. Coward.) There is nothing to be done?—Absolutely nothing you could not pick up in five minutes.

54,418. Now go to the next step: Supposing you are acting for a defendant, and at the expiration of eight days you have to enter an appearance, what do you do?—We fill up a form in the solicitor's office. My junior would fill up the form with the names.

54,419. Your boy would do it, I suppose?—Yes, he would simply fill in the names of the plaintiff and the defendant, enter an appearance for the defendant, put a date in, take it up to the Stamp Office, have a 2s. stamp put on for each defendant, take it to the appearance office, and the clerk takes down the writ-book and simply enters that So-and-so have appeared for the defendant. He then seals one of the notices of appearance and gives it back to him.

54,420. What is the matter of difficulty about that as far as the clerk in the Central Office is concerned?—There is absolutely none, and I never could see why the man who issues the writ should not also enter the appearance.

54,421. The next thing is your summons for directions?—Yes.

54,422. What do you do with that?—The summons for directions is filled up in our office. We take it up and put a 10s. stamp upon it.

54,423. By a boy again?—By a boy again. He takes it to the office where you issue summonses, and the clerk there who has a list in front of him puts the name of So-and-so v. So-and-so. He has a book with 11 o'clock summonses in it, and when the 11 o'clock book is full up he goes to the 12 o'clock book. He puts down the number of the summons and "11 o'clock, Thursday, 16th May," or whatever it may be.

54,424. Is there anything in all that?—Absolutely nothing. You could get a boy straight away from school to do it.

54,425. Now the next step. That summons goes before the master?—Yes, it goes before the master.

54,426. The master makes an order?—Yes, on the original summonses, which he gives you back. You take it back to the City and we ourselves draw up the order that the master has made. That is taken up to the Order Department and the same thing is gone through.

54,427. What is the trouble about that further than to see that the order you have drawn up accords with the order which the master has signed?—That is all.

54,428. That is not a very troublesome proceeding?—Not a very troublesome thing.

54,429. Is there any trouble about it at all?—Absolutely none.

54,430. Or any difficulty of any sort or kind?—No difficulty of any sort or kind.

54,431. The last step is that the case goes to trial?—Yes.

54,432. Either before a judge alone or before a judge and jury?—You enter the action with the associate. You tie up the pleadings in book form and take them there with a 2l. stamp on, and the clerk in the Associates' Department takes it in and enters it in the list. He does nothing more than that; he never looks at the pleadings.

54,433. Is there any trouble about that?—No trouble at all.

54,434. You go to trial, the trial is over, and judgment is given?—Yes.

54,435. If it is tried before a jury there is the certificate of the associate to be obtained?—Also when it is before a judge, you get a certificate. The associate gives the certificate and writes down what the jury find.

54,436. The questions put and the answers the jury have given?—Yes, if there are any.

54,437. Sometimes it is only verdict for the plaintiff or defendant?—Yes.

54,438. Then what happens?—We get that from the Associates' Department and take it back and draw up a judgment in our office. Again the same thing is gone through; we get a stamp put on and the boy takes it up and takes it into the Judgment Department; they seal it and you give it to them.

54,439. Now we have gone through the whole process?—That is the whole process.

54,440. What is the matter of difficulty requiring such extraordinary skill and knowledge on the part of anybody in the Central Office who has to do that work so far?—I have never been able to find out what the skill or knowledge required was.

54,441. Of course, the master who hears these summonses and make orders upon them is doing very different work?—Very different. He must be a lawyer, and he must have a good knowledge of law.

54,442. Is there anything in the Central Office that we have been discussing now that could not be learnt in a very short time by a man who had been in a solicitor's office for five years?—I should think he would be able to do it straight away.

54,443. Now, as to the Taxing Office. The master who taxes the costs has one very responsible and difficult duty to perform, because there is such a thing as having briefs prepared by people who are not too skilful, and who perhaps make far more of it than they need. Is that right?—That is right. They put in a lot of padding which is unnecessary.

Mr. CHARLES WILLIAM KENTISH.

54,444. I did not like to call it padding. The taxing master, if he is efficient, would perhaps deal with that a little with the pruning hook?—In this way. If I had to tax a bill which was sent to me, and I found in the bill of costs of a simple action that a solicitor had drawn a brief of 300 or 400 folios, I should want to know what was in it, and I should ask the master to go through and look at it and see whether it was a proper one, because I should not be able to conceive that 300 or 400 folios were necessary to tell the story.

54,445. There the taxing master no doubt has to exercise considerable discretion, and also as to the documents that he allows to be copied and delivered?—Quite so.

54,446. Because that acts and re-acts; if you have many documents delivered to counsel you have to pay many more fees?—Quite so.

54,447. Therefore the taxing master himself has a very serious responsibility to perform when he comes to that item?—Very serious.

54,448. But, up to the point of the determination of those questions, you want somebody to go through the bill. All the items in a bill of costs, other than that class of item, are all scale charges?—Absolutely.

54,449. Somebody who knows that business can very soon determine what they are?—Quite so.

54,450. I do not mind admitting to you that you would know far more what are the scale charges than I should, but when it comes to the other point—that is, the determination of how much is to be allowed—I should not allow my judgment to bow down to you?—Quite so. I do not think I should ask you to, either.

54,451. Is there anything that is done in the taxing master's office before the master has to exercise that discretion that really calls for any serious knowledge or experience?—I do not think so. Of course, the clerk who goes through it ticks off the scale items, and the master sees the ticks, and knows that he need not deal with them. There is a query put against "Instructions for brief" as to the length of it, and the documents. Then the witnesses are an important matter.

54,452. You would agree that the real serious matter on the taxation of a bill of costs is that which the master has to do in order to do justice between the parties?—Quite so.

54,453. It had to be left to him, and he does it?—Yes.

54,454. You were asked about typing. It would be an immense advantage to everybody, would it not, if everything were typed?—I think so.

54,455. I do not know whether I was right in thinking that you were rather smiling at the suggestion of fraud?—I was.

54,456. You think it would be absurd?—I think so.

54,457. (Chairman.) In your précis you mention that "all difficult questions are taken to Mr. Stringer." From your answers to Mr. Coward I rather gathered that you think there are no difficult questions. What are the difficult questions to which you refer in that passage in your précis?—Sometimes orders for particulars are rather difficult to draw up and sometimes orders made by the judge are rather difficult to interpret. Then very often we go to Mr. Townesend to assist us. We take all drafts to him to see whether he agrees that that was the order made by the judge. There may be some little question of practice which Mr. Stringer deals with.

54,458. Questions of the interpretation or the application of the Rules of Court?—Yes, of the rules.

54,459. On questions of that kind Mr. Stringer would be an authority?—We should go to Mr. Stringer on any difficulty arising on any order. It does not often arise. I do not have one difficulty, perhaps, arise in two or three years. Then I should go to Mr. Townesend.

54,460. (Miss Haldane.) About what age do the lads come into your own office?—About 14.

54,461. Immediately they leave school?—Immediately they leave school.

54,462. Then do they carry on their education in any way after that time?—I think some of them may go to night schools, and, perhaps, they might go to shorthand or typewriting classes.

54,463. You do not urge them to do so or take any steps in the matter?—No.

54,464. I suppose you would say that the third class clerks might come in much younger than they do at present?—Very much. They might come in at about 16, I should think, or between that and 18.

54,465. About the close of their secondary course of education, you mean?—Yes.

54,466. (Sir John Kempe.) You know that the clerks in the Supreme Court are all on the same scale in the different branches, except that here and there some addition is given. There are three classes all on the same scale?—Yes.

54,467. The work of the different branches is very different in the degree of difficulty, is it not?—I do not know that there is any difference.

54,468. Is not Chancery different?—I have never had to do any Chancery work, and I could not say.

54,469. So far as you are aware is the plan of the same scale for all the different branches of the work a fair one? Do you think that the clerical class is not so varied that the same scale would not cover it?—I think so.

54,470. In your own office now, I suppose, you deal with different classes of work. You do not have Chancery work?—I do not have Chancery, but I do Common Law, Divorce, Bankruptcy, Admiralty, and Commercial work.

54,471. Do not you vary the scale of salary paid to your clerks who deal with these different branches or do they have the same kind of salary?—The juniors probably get a rising salary each year.

54,472. With no reference to the particular class of work they do?—No.

54,473. You do not have a Chancery branch and a Common Law branch?—We have a Chancery branch in our office.

54,474. But you do not pay them any higher?—No.

54,475. If you had a managing clerk in each branch would he get a different salary?—I do not think so. Sometimes I think Chancery clerks would get a higher salary, but I do not think it will continue very long because the Chancery work is falling off very much.

54,476. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) Do you think that a rather larger use might be made of the Post Office in legal business and that more or less formal work could be done by sending in documents through the post instead of delivering them through solicitors' clerks?—I think we do utilise the post a good deal, although, perhaps, under the rules, we are not entitled to do it. Our business in the City is with very few firms, and we invariably send summonses by post because we do not object to receiving them. If we have a firm in regard to whom we do not know whether they would like it or not, or would take objection to it, we serve them personally, but as our business is principally in the City we send the summonses by post.

54,477. Supposing it was more the custom than at present to send documents by post to the Central Office, and the Central Office used the post in replying to you as other departments do, do you think it would be in some cases a convenience?—Instead of taking the papers up?

54,478. Yes?—We want it done at once if we issue a writ.

54,479. But there is a post every hour in the City?—I do not think there is now. The clerk goes up and perhaps he has to issue a couple of writs, and he may have to enter two or three appearances at the same time and issue a summons or two and draw up an order. We send them up when ready. We get them ready in the morning, and that is why there is more work in the Central Office, as a rule, in the afternoon, because, in the case of solicitors in the City, the orders made the day before are drawn up the next day, and as a rule they are prepared in the office in the morning and taken up to the Courts in the afternoon.

29 April 1915.]

MR. CHARLES WILLIAM KENTISH.

54,480. You think that in the case of solicitors whose offices are near the Courts the present arrangement of sending in documents by messengers is the best?—I think so. I do not think the post would do.

54,481. Do you think that, in the case of solicitors not so conveniently situated, it might be an advantage if they were allowed to use the post?—I do not think so. The chances are that if you posted something in the City at 12 o'clock it might reach there by 3 or 4, and you would not get it back the same day when you want to use it. When we issue a writ we get it served as quickly as we can.

54,482. (Chairman.) In the case of putting in an appearance that would not apply?—No, because you must enter the appearance on the last day, otherwise judgment might be signed against you the next morning.

54,483. But you can put in an appearance before the last day if you like?—You can.

Mr. LEONARD SARTORIS (Superintendent of the Royal Courts of Justice Staff), called and examined.

54,488. (Chairman.) You are the Superintendent of the Royal Courts of Justice Staff?—I am.

54,489. How long have you held that post?—Since February 1894.

54,490. What had been your experience before that?—I was a civil engineer.

54,491. You had not been in the Government service before?—No.

54,492. What are the duties of your post?—I have the general supervision and entire responsibility attaching to the various duties of the staff. A reference made to me in connection with any complaint arising in the building has to be dealt with by me, and, in fact, the duties are very numerous. Anything arising in connection with the conduct of the staff or the building is referred to me.

54,493. We have before us a paper which, I think, you have supplied, headed "Regulations for the Royal Courts of Justice Staff." It is stated at the beginning of the paper that the staff is for the purpose of keeping order, and the care, cleaning, and other incidental requirements of the Royal Courts of Justice (including the High Court Offices in Bankruptcy Buildings). That, I suppose, we may take as a general description of the work of the staff?—That is so.

54,494. You have two assistant superintendents to assist you?—Yes.

54,495. I understand there are 44 first class attendants; 127 second class attendants; 2 boy messengers; and also 4 female attendants?—That is so.

54,496. What is the scale of pay of the first class attendants?—The first class attendants get 100*l.* a year?

54,497. The first class attendants include the ushers of the court and certain principal attendants?—Yes; the principal attendants are as stated in the regulations. For instance, the two night foremen and the stationery storekeepers count as first class attendants.

54,498. They receive some allowance in addition to their ordinary pay?—They receive 140*l.* a year, rising by increments of 10*l.*

54,499. What is the scale of pay of the second class attendants?—The second class attendants on appointment start at 24*s.* a week, rising by 2*s.* a week a year to 30*s.* After nine years' service they rise a further 1*s.* a week a year to 35*s.*, the maximum. That is in the event of their report sheets being perfectly clear of any records.

54,500. What is the arrangement as regards the appointment of attendants?—The general appointment is made by the Lord Chancellor, with the exception of those as stated in the regulations. That is to say, the Lord Chief Justice appoints to vacancies in the King's Bench Division; the Master of the Rolls in the Court of Appeal alternating with the Lord Chancellor, and the President of the Probate Division in that division.

54,501. Then which are the posts to which the Lord Chancellor appoints?—Practically the whole of the second class attendants and the first class attendants, with the exception of those stated in the regulations.

54,484. Would not it be a convenience to do that by post?—I do not think so. We are there every day.

54,485. (Mr. Coward.) You would not like to trust it?—Not in the post. Supposing something went wrong with it—things do go wrong in the post occasionally. Supposing you posted an appearance to the Central Office and it went wrong?

54,486. Put it into a wrong envelope?—Yes, or something happened to it.

54,487. You might get into great trouble?—You might have judgment signed against you, and you would have to set it aside and have to do that at your own cost. I do not think it would do, and I do not think it would facilitate the work at all, because the clerks at the Central Office would have to address the envelopes, and it would put a good deal more work on them, although I do not think they would be overworked then. The postage would also have to be provided for.

54,502. When you speak of the Lord Chief Justice and the Presidents of the different divisions having the power of appointment, does that refer only to promotions from second to first class?—Only to promotions from second to first class.

54,503. I see it is stated in the printed regulations that each vacancy caused by the promotion by the President of a second class attendant shall be filled by the appointment by such President of a new second class attendant. Is that the practice?—That is the practice.

54,504. So that in some cases the Presidents do appoint the second class attendants?—Yes, with a vacancy occurring. They promote from the second class to the first, and fill the vacancy caused by the promotion by appointing a new second class attendant.

54,505. Then the occasion on which the Lord Chancellor appoints a second class attendant is when the promotion has been made by the Lord Chancellor which creates the vacancy?—Or vacancies among the second class attendants without any promotion.

54,506. Does that mean that in practice the greater part of the appointments are made by the Lord Chancellor, or by the other authorities?—By far the greater part are made by the Lord Chancellor.

54,507. From whom are the attendants generally selected?—From among ex-soldiers.

54,508. Will you give us some figures to show what proportion of them are ex-soldiers?—I know the present proportion is about 60 per cent. of the whole staff.

54,509. Is it the case that in the last 10 years out of 73 appointments, 61 have been ex-soldiers, 4 ex-Royal Navy men, and 8 men who have not served either in the Army or the Navy?—Yes, that is correct.

54,510. So that with very few exceptions the men are ex-soldiers or ex-Royal Navy men?—That is so.

54,511. Are many of them pensioners?—Among the present members of the staff there are 15 ex-soldiers, 1 Navy man, 1 marine, and 1 metropolitan policeman who are pensioners—total, 18.

54,512. 18 only out of a total of 171?—Yes.

54,513. Are the attendants pensionable?—No.

54,514. Is there any age limit for their retirement?—65 is the age at which they retire, subject to a report from me to the Lord Chancellor as to the possibility of their staying on. It is not actually fixed at 65; that is to say, on a favourable report the Lord Chancellor can authorise me to keep them on another five years.

54,515. Seventy is the final limit?—Yes.

54,516. I see you have at the present moment a certain number of attendants who are over 70. Is that owing to the war?—That is owing to pressure. They are practically only temporary attendants now. They would have retired before had not the war occurred.

54,517. What happens to them when they retire?—They receive a retiring gratuity.

54,518. A gratuity calculated at what rate?—One week's pay per year of service.

54,519. But that does not amount to very much?—No.

29 April 1915.]

Mr. LEONARD SARTORIS.

54,520. Have you found hard cases arising from the retirement of men at the age of 65 or 70?—Occasionally, but not usually.

54,521. What means of maintenance have they usually?—We have a pension fund of our own.

54,522. Have you a contributory pension fund?—Yes.

54,523. Do all belong to that?—Not all, but by far the greater number.

54,524. What is the basis of that?—It is a contribution per week out of their wages, and subscriptions from outside provided by the judges and members of the Bar.

54,525. What is the amount of contribution?—I think now it is 3*d.* per week.

54,526. Does that fund work satisfactorily?—Yes. It is entirely the fund of the men; it has nothing to do with any Government support whatever.

54,527. It has no Government assistance?—None whatever.

54,528. What sort of pension does a man get from that fund?—On the last actuarial calculation I think it worked out at 7*s.* a week.

54,529. What are the limits of age for the appointment of attendants?—22 to 40; and for ex-soldiers 45.

54,530. What is the usual age for appointment in the case of ex-soldiers?—If I can obtain them, I prefer them between 20 and 30.

54,531. Do you find that the ex-soldiers and sailors perform the work satisfactorily?—Yes, under the supervision that there is.

54,532. Are you in favour of continuing that system of appointment?—Yes.

54,533. You find that the results are satisfactory as regards the performance of the work?—Quite.

54,534. What is the scale of pay of the female attendants?—They have a guinea a week, with a gown and working dress.

54,535. That is a fixed amount?—Yes.

54,536. Speaking generally, you think the present system of appointment and control works satisfactorily?—I do.

54,537. You have no alterations to suggest?—No.

54,538. (Sir John Kempe.) I see in the regulations that you attend to all the cleaning not undertaken by the Office of Works. Do they do the whole of the fabric cleaning?—Yes, all the skilled work.

54,539. What about the dusting?—The Office of Works do not do that. Our men do it all.

54,540. (Miss Haldane.) With regard to the mode of selection, how do the men get on the waiting list?—They write to the permanent secretary at the Lord Chancellor's office and ask to be put on the list of candidates for employment. They then receive a reply directing them to call on me. Then I examine them as to their qualifications, and report again to the Lord Chancellor.

54,541. Do they know when there are vacancies, or do they write simply on chance?—Simply on chance.

54,542. So that you never advertise a vacancy?—Never.

54,543. You say as to the distribution of patronage, "No difficulties actually arise from present system, but they might." What does that mean?—I mean that in the event of an appointing authority having some particular nomination that he wishes to put forward it might not be the sort of man who would be suitable for the work.

54,544. What do you think would be the best mode of getting over that difficulty?—The present mode works perfectly well. I may say that it has not occurred for a number of years. It occurred once in the time of Lord Russell, the Lord Chief Justice, when I had to explain that a man was not entirely satisfactory; but, as a rule, the present system of keeping a list and putting forward the names of the candidates to the different appointing authorities works satisfactorily.

54,545. That is to say, you do that?—Yes, I do that.

54,546. You examine the candidates?—Every one.

54,547. Then do you get their records, and so on?—Yes, everything connected with them.

54,548. And I suppose in the case of soldiers and sailors you have their records?—Yes, their service records; and further, if I possibly can, I write to the commanding officer and get any private information I am able to.

54,549. But you feel that it is possible for the appointing authority to appoint disregarding this waiting list?—Yes.

54,550. And it is occasionally done?—It has not been done for 12 to 14 years to the best of my recollection. It is a little difficult for me to remember, but I have cases in my mind. But it never occurs now.

54,551. Then with regard to the women, are they appointed on the same principle?—On the same principle, by the Lord Chancellor.

54,552. That is to say, they apply to the Lord Chancellor's permanent secretary, and then the candidates are sent down to you?—Yes, and I report on them. The vacancies for women are very rare, I have only had two during the time I have been there.

54,553. Are they usually widows?—Two have been widows. One, who is there now, is a spinster. We still have one to appoint. There is a vacancy now, but by arrangement it is being kept open against the possibility of the widow of some deserving attendant who may be killed in the war. We have a number who are serving, of course.

54,554. Do the women come under the pension scheme also?—No.

54,555. They are not allowed to contribute to the fund?—No, they do not contribute.

54,556. Of course they would come under the National Insurance Act—naturally they must?—Yes, the whole staff does that.

54,557. (Mrs. Deane Streetfeild.) What sort of qualifications do you consider are necessary for the attendants? Have you any particular qualifications for the attendants?—That they should be strong (they have a medical examination) and intelligent, capable of doing what they are told to do, and that qualification which is a little difficult to describe—general fitness.

54,558. What age are they generally?—22 to 40 for non-soldiers and 45 for ex-soldiers.

54,559. Have you any age limit for the women?—None.

54,560. Do you require the same sort of qualifications?—In the case of women they are fit as long as they are strong and clear-headed and can attend to witnesses who faint and become hysterical, which does occur occasionally.

54,561. Is that the sort of duty they are called upon to carry out?—That is so. If a witness becomes hysterical she is taken down to the female witnesses' room and looked after by one of the female attendants.

54,562. What age are the women attendants?—The age of the present ones I am not quite sure about; but I do not think there is one over 60.

54,563. Are they eligible for the Old Age Pension?—I am not sure.

54,564. Do you know what becomes of them when they leave?—At present there has been only one who has retired since I have been there, and that was on a pension because she came from the old courts at Westminster, but it is a very small pension. She was appointed before this staff was created.

54,565. Is there any particular reason why they should not contribute to the pension scheme?—No, none. I think they might if they liked.

54,566. It is a voluntary thing?—Quite.

54,567. (Chairman.) You did not mention good character as one of the requirements, but I suppose it is?—Yes, I can get at that.

54,568. Sobriety, and so on?—By personal inquiry one can get at that very well.

54,569. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) Are there any charwomen doing the cleaning in the offices at all, or is all the cleaning done by men?—It is all done by men.

54,570. Do you find that satisfactory?—Quite.

54,571. Supposing, instead of reporting your recommendation to a high judicial official who changes from time to time, there was a general committee of appointment in the Law Courts having continuous familiarity with the problem to whom you could recommend, do you think that that might be a safer and more satisfactory plan?—I should hardly say that it possessed any advantage over the present system. Personally, I should not mind as long as I got the right men.

54,572. (Mr. Boutwood.) When you were speaking of these pensions, you used the word "actuarial." Sometimes, an actuarial estimate is one thing and an actual pension is another. Are there any pensions at present being paid?—Yes.

Mr. THOMAS MILLIKIN (Third Class Clerk, Chancery Registrars' Office), called and examined.

54,575. (Chairman.) You are a third class clerk in the office of the Chancery Registrars?—Yes, and here is my appointment if I may hand it in. I have served 26 years in June next.

54,576. You were appointed by the Lord Chancellor?—I was.

54,577. What had been your experience before you were appointed?—I was for 13½ years in various solicitors' offices; latterly as a managing clerk for three and a half years before I was appointed, by reason, no doubt, of that letter, which I may ask you to read, which was sent to me by Mr. Hawkins, who was then termed a chief clerk (now master). I was temporary clerk, 30 years ago, in October 1885, when the Lord Chancellor appointed me, with the sanction of her then Majesty Queen Victoria's Treasury, at 3*l.* a week, and I went through the whole of a vacation.

54,578. A temporary clerk in which office?—Master Hawkins's Chambers; then Mr. Justice Chitty's Chancery Chambers in October 1885.

54,579. What is the point you wish to put before the Commission with regard to the position of the third class clerks?—If I may limit the number to the elders, it is on behalf of three of my colleagues and myself. The reason for that I will give you presently, or I will give it at once if you prefer it.

54,580. You speak on behalf of three members of the class, and not on behalf of the whole class?—That is so, because the remainder have been so recently appointed that I cannot give evidence as to their qualifications or how they were appointed.

54,581. What is the point you wish to put before us?—The point is this: My colleagues and myself have had a legal training, having been in solicitors' offices for a great number of years, and were appointed many years ago with the idea of promotion, having had that legal training.

54,582. That is to say, you thought you were improving your position by accepting this appointment?—I had 160*l.* a year myself as a managing clerk, and I forfeited 60*l.* a year to take this position in 1889. My colleagues, similarly, were solicitors' clerks of experience, and for some unknown reason we have been overlooked, and the younger members who have come in in the last 15 years through some wonderful influence, or perhaps some predilection of the officers under whose control they were, have been transferred to chambers in less than ten years, and, notwithstanding the service of myself and my colleagues of 26 and 29 years, they have been promoted to second class and first class clerks.

54,583. First of all, as regards the department itself; You knew when you were appointed that you had no prospects of promotion in that department?—That is a very poignant question. I humbly submit that, being a married man then getting 160*l.* a year as managing clerk, I did not forgo 60*l.* a year without I had prospects of promotion. In fact, I told Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie at the time what I was losing, and he said, "Of course, I am in hopes of a man like you being "in a better position."

54,584. But in the Chancery Registrars' Office itself you knew there were no prospects of promotion to the superior classes in the office?—No.

54,585. Did you, when you entered, know that you had no prospects of promotion in the Chancery Registrars' Office?—Absolutely.

54,586. Then what was the prospect of promotion that you say you had when you entered?—Of trans-

54,573. What are they? Are they 7*s.* a week?—I could not tell you off-hand. The secretary of the fund is one of the ushers in the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division, a very clear-headed man, and he practically runs the whole scheme with any assistance that I, or other members of the committee, may be able to give him in the matter of advice.

54,574. You do not know what the actual pensions at present are?—No, not straight off.

54,587. But you knew it was a cul de sac?—True.

54,588. What is your point about that: that others have been appointed to other departments of the Supreme Court and you have not?—That would be rather personal. I would speak generally.

54,589. I want to hear what your case is?—In answering your question I would say that, in view of the fact that these younger members could not have had the experience of we older ones, it was most unfair to us that they should be transferred as third class clerks to a department where there was undoubtedly promotion to be had.

54,590. In a former answer on that point you mentioned influence. Have you any facts to put forward in support of that suggestion?—It would be somewhat invidious, and I am rather disinclined to mention names at all. I humbly submit that the permanent secretary has been the great influence in regard to these younger members, ignoring these older ones. When we have applied we have had the stereotyped reply that there is no proposal of a transfer to be made at present, or some such letter as that; and in a month or two a young man, who possibly has not been two or three years in our department, has suddenly disappeared, and he is in chambers, and, forsooth, a second class clerk in a few years, with no experience of the law, and never having seen the inside of a solicitor's office.

54,591. Can you say how many transfers there have been since you entered the office?—In the last 15 years about a dozen.

54,592. To which department have they been transferred mostly?—The majority to the Chancery Chambers, one to the Court of Criminal Appeal, two to the Associates' Department, and two to the Taxing Office.

54,593. Is it the case that the greater number of the third class clerks in Chancery Chambers have been transferred from the third class in the Registrars' Office?—I do not say that, because I have been 40 years next January in the legal profession, and when I was a solicitor's clerk I had an opportunity of meeting a great number of officials who are still there. The places of those who have died off and those who have retired have been filled up by these transfers, or the majority of them.

54,594. There are 12 third class clerks in Chancery Chambers?—Yes.

54,595. Can you say how many of those have been transferred from the Registrars' Office?—Four at present in the third class; but some of those transferred some years ago are now second class clerks, and that is one of our grievances.

54,596. Of the present third class clerks in Chancery Chambers four have been transferred from the Chancery Registrars' Office?—That is so.

54,597. Of the second class clerks in Chancery Chambers how many have been transferred from the Registrars' Office?—Three second class clerks.

54,598. How many of the first class?—One.

54,599. Was the one in the first class junior or senior to you?—He was a small boy in knickerbockers when I was appointed.

54,600. He was junior to you?—Very much.

54,601-2. What is your point? Is it your point that you personally have not been selected for transfer, or is it a question of the system?—It is not a personal grievance.

29 April 1915.]

Mr. THOMAS MILLIKIN.

54,603. Then what is the point?—My great point is equality of opportunity. I submit we all ought to be entitled to equality of opportunity.

54,604. What do you mean by equality of opportunity?—These young men have had the opportunity to be transferred. I believe in transferring a third class clerk to different departments and letting him gain knowledge by those means.

54,605. But is not that a personal grievance, that you personally have not been transferred?—I humbly submit not. I have three other colleagues in exactly the same position, and I am here to give evidence on behalf of my colleagues and myself—not personally.

54,606. You were eligible for transfer?—I humbly submit so, if I was chosen by Sir Kenneth as a 3rd class clerk in vacation 30 years ago, in 1885, and I was managing clerk in a solicitor's office, as I have the testimonials here to show. I have one from Master Hawkins at the time, in 1885.

54,607. (Mr. Coward.) Who were you with in the City?—I was with taxing master Ryland's firm—Woodcock and Ryland, of Lincoln's Inn Fields—and with Simpson and Palmer, the solicitors to Sir Edward Clarke at his election in 1882. Then I was for three and a half years with John Arthur Parry, in Clement's Inn, where I conducted the whole of the litigation as managing clerk. I was also with Master Ridsdale's father in Gray's Inn Square, when a youth, as assistant Chancery clerk.

54,608. (Chairman.) Is your grievance a question of the system or a personal question?—Emphatically the system.

54,609. What is the system you suggest?—Equality of opportunity.

54,610. All clerks in the third class in the Chancery Registrars' Office are eligible for transfer?—According to my appointment that is my submission. I was appointed as a third class clerk to the Supreme Court.

54,611. But, as a matter of fact, you, and two of your colleagues for whom you speak, have not been selected for transfer?—That is so.

54,612. Is not that a question not of the system but of the particular selections that have been made for the purpose of transfer?—I humbly submit that those selections savour of predilection.

54,613. That is another matter. That is a question of the way in which the selection has been exercised, not of the system, is it not?—Again I say what I ask for is equality of opportunity which exists in Chancery chambers. It does not exist with us because it is a cul de sac as regards promotion for a third class clerk if he is unfortunate enough to be in the Registrars' Office. It is a very good preparatory school for promotion for protégés with great patronage, if I may say so.

54,614. You again suggest by your last answer that there is protection and influence in the matter of transfer?—Emphatically.

54,615. But you are not prepared to give facts in support of that allegation?—Except my interviews with Sir Kenneth and the persons who I know have been transferred. I was told that promotion was quite hypothetical.

54,616. You are not prepared to do more than make that general statement. You are not prepared to support it in detail?—I have no documentary evidence, but I submit promotions after even a few years, as they have occurred, are obvious. I can give names.

54,617. Will you tell us now what the nature of your work is?—The minutiae are multitudinous, and I do not say that the duties are onerous; but if you will allow me to give you a typical case, may I give my own case as typical, or shall I give that of one of my colleagues? It is quite immaterial.

54,618. I ask you what your own personal work is in the office?—But, to enable me to do that, will you allow me to state a typical case?

54,619. I wish you would answer my question. Describe generally the nature of your own work in the office?—Again I say that the minutiae are multitudinous, the duties are not onerous; but if a man is ambitious he makes himself conversant with the whole of the working of the office and the orders, which are very numerous. He must, as of necessity, if he performs his duties properly, know what papers to take in, and the particular orders that are made in court. He must have some legal training to know a motion for a receiver, for instance, and he must know what affidavits are.

54,620. Will you apply yourself to answering my question, and not to describing the qualities of the work. I wish to know what the actual work is which you have to do?—After an order is made by a judge, or by a master in chambers, the papers are brought to us. We ask them the number and the solicitors in the matter, and take a note of that. We have to transcribe the registrar's notes of what took place in court to enable the principal clerk to draft the order. Before that we enter every order in a book, the name and when it was bespoken, the name of the judge and the date of the order; in other words, keep a proper record of the various motions and the orders, or the stage of them. We hand them out to solicitors, and, if I may humbly say so, a great number of the profession who do not practise in the Chancery Division require assistance. We are always having the public before us, and they are grateful for our assistance. They do not know the modus operandi sometimes as to the drafts, and we tell them. Then in its last stage we have to see that the proper stamps are on the orders, especially Inland Revenue stamps, such as Foreclosure Orders, although that is conveyance duty. It is our duty to see that it is properly stamped if it is not adjudicated at Somerset House. A man may elect to put his stamp duty on according to the mortgage money, principal interest, and costs, and we have to take it whether or no. It is his risk, but we, in the execution of our duties, should see the amount in the order, and that the stamp is properly put on. Then the percentage is an important matter with regard to the stamps.

54,621. Then your work consists of receiving papers, making the necessary entries with regard to them, and copying certain documents?—No copying.

54,622. I thought you said you copied the registrar's notes?—Yes, we transcribe into a book the registrar's notes for the guidance of the principal clerk in drawing the Court orders.

54,623. What is the difference between transcribing and copying?—I beg your pardon; of course, it is the same thing.

54,624. Then you also have to give out the papers to solicitors, and to see that proper stamps are affixed?—And give them appointments.

54,625. You have nothing to do with the actual drafting of the orders?—Not at all. Sometimes the queries made by the registrars require some difficult answering, and we then assist the solicitors to enable them to answer the queries.

54,626. Do you put forward any claim to promotion in the Registrars' Office itself?—I am so conversant with the statute under which the principal clerks are appointed that, of course, we never aspire to such a position. We were always given to understand that they must be solicitors or barristers.

54,627. Then your point comes to this: that the only opportunity of promotion of the third class clerks in your office is by transfer to the other offices. The third class clerks are eligible for such transfer, but you complain that the system has not been fairly worked. Is that what it comes to?—Exactly. Of course, we have a fewer number of clerks now.

54,628. (Mr. Boutwood.) Have those men who were transferred from the Registrars' Office to other parts of the court any particular qualifications that you and your colleagues do not possess?—I boldly and emphatically say, no. Some of them have never seen the inside of a solicitor's office to my knowledge.

Mr. G. A. HUNT (Third Class Clerk, Bankruptcy Taxing Office), called and examined.

54,629. (Chairman.) You are a third class clerk in the Taxing Office of the Bankruptcy Department?—That is so.

54,630. How long have you served in that office?—About eight and a half years—nine years in October.

54,631. What age were you when appointed?—25.

54,632. Had you had any legal experience before that?—I had, but not immediately before. I had three years in a solicitor's office immediately after leaving school.

54,633. What was your occupation immediately before you were appointed?—I was in the Secretaries' office at Somerset House. I had charge of a section of the registry of income tax claims.

54,634. In what class of clerks were you there?—I was assistant clerk.

54,635. You entered the third class in the Supreme Court with the object of improving your position?—That is so; I had in mind the obtaining of a nomination, I may say, all along.

54,636. What is the point you wish to put before the Commission with regard to the Taxing Office of the Bankruptcy Department?—I think the chief point with regard to our office is that the Treasury Classification Order of May 1886, 29 years old, ought to be revised, because it does not provide for a first class clerk for our department, and I think ours is the only one which has not a first class clerk.

54,637. At present the staff is one second class and two third class clerks?—Yes.

54,638. Your suggestion is that there ought to be one first class clerk to assist the taxing master in that department?—Yes, I think there ought to be.

54,639. The reason you give is that it is the only department without a first class clerk?—I think that is so. I am not quite sure—certainly the only taxing department.

54,640. Have you any reasons to give arising out of the nature of the work in favour of a first class clerk being appointed in your department?—Only that it is just the same kind of work as would be done in any other taxing department where they have first class clerks.

54,641. What is the work you personally do in connection with taxing cases?—I take an intermediary position there. We have three clerks. The chief man does most of the vouching work; that is to say, after the master has looked at the bills and settled the principle of them, the chief man goes into details and examines them as to relevancy and also as to quantity. Very often the bills are lengthy and perhaps we might have two or three at the same time, and it is necessary for another man to assist him. I assist him with that work. That is part of my work, but it is not the whole of it. I also keep the statutory books of record, and assist in answering the correspondence, because that is divided between the two of us. There are numerous inquiries made in the office with regard to different points in Bankruptcy, because in Bankruptcy there is a lot of detail work. I answer many of those inquiries.

54,642. Do you do the casting of the bills?—Not much. The junior man does most of that, but I help him if he has too much.

54,643. Is it the vouching work that you think ought to be assigned to a first class clerk?—Yes, certainly. I think the vouching is appropriate to a first class clerk—not necessarily as regards myself, but I think in the classification of the office.

54,644. Are there any other points you wish to put forward in support of your claim?—No, I do not think there are any particular points. Our point is simply that we seem to be different to any other department in not having a first class clerk, and, of course, there is no opportunity for either of the third class clerks to rise to the second class.

54,645. As regards promotion, are you limited to the Taxing Department, or are you considered as eligible for promotion in the other branches of the Bankruptcy Department?—I believe on paper we are considered eligible, but when application was made it was refused to Mr. Scott before he was made a second class clerk.

54,646. On the ground that his experience in the Taxing Office was not a qualification for the work in the other departments?—I do not think it was that quite. He applied to the senior registrar, Mr. Brougham, when there was a vacancy there at the time Mr. Chandler was promoted, and although he had twice the service that Mr. Chandler had had, Mr. Brougham said to him: "I know Mr. Chandler very well; I know he can do the work, but you have not been in this department; I do not know whether you can do it."

54,647. I see he got his promotion to the second class very soon after that?—Mr. Scott did, yes, but that was on a rather peculiar ground. He was transferred as a third class clerk from the Central Office to the Taxing Office in Bankruptcy, and his junior in the Central Office was promoted to second, over in that office, and I think it was on that ground he was made a second in the Taxing Office.

54,648. Before that had there been no second class clerk in the Taxing Office?—Yes, Mr. Clark was one, but he was about to retire at that time.

54,649. (Mr. Boutwood.) Are you eligible to be transferred to any of the other taxing offices?—Yes, I think we are eligible.

54,650. But it has never happened?—I do not know of any case where it has happened.

Mr. J. S. STEWART-WALLACE (First Class Clerk, Land Registry), Mr. E. OWEN BYERS (Third Class Clerk, Land Registry), called and examined.

54,651. (Chairman.) (To Mr. Stewart-Wallace.) You are a first class clerk in the Land Registry?—Yes.

54,652. How long have you been in the Land Registry?—Since 1900.

54,653. You went there as a second class clerk?—Yes.

54,654. Before that, had you been in the public service?—No.

54,655. When were you called to the Bar?—I was called in 1900.

54,656. So that you went to the office very shortly after your call to the Bar?—Yes.

54,657. Were you a Vinerian scholar at Oxford?—Yes.

54,658. (To Mr. Byers.) You are a third class clerk in the same office?—Yes.

54,659. When did you enter the office?—On the 10th March 1902.

54,660. You are not a barrister, I think?—No.

54,661. Had you any legal experience before entering the office?—I was eight years a solicitor's clerk, including two years as assistant managing clerk, with Messrs. Crowders, Vizard, and Oldham, a well-known firm of Lincoln's Inn Fields.

54,662. (To Mr. Stewart-Wallace.) You wish specially to represent the views of the first class clerks in the Land Registry?—Yes.

54,663. Do you also speak for the staff generally?—Yes.

54,664. What are the points you wish to put before the Commission with reference to the position of the staff?—I should like to have an opportunity of explaining to the Commission that in this department there has been a strong feeling of discontent for some years, and of endeavouring to show the grounds on which that discontent is based.

54,665. Will you explain to us the grounds for that discontent?—We appeal for an alteration in the conditions of service in the Land Registry quite apart from the individual merits of the present members. Our case is based on the broadest grounds. We submit that the conditions which have obtained are not such as to encourage and develop a not inconsiderable body of public servants, or to promote that energy, initiative, and zeal essential for the best service. For years there has been a strong feeling of discontent and disappointment in the Land Registry. This has not been confined to a few disappointed or discontented individuals. Be the conditions of service what they may, a percentage of these will probably be found. The feeling of discontent is universal. At times it becomes specially acute, and has led to a constant series of protests to the registrar and appeals to higher authority. As the men who are responsible for the daily administration of the department, and dealing with the personnel, we can certainly say that these protests would have been very much more frequent and more acute in expression had we not, out of a feeling of loyalty to our chief and the department, felt it our duty to discourage them.

54,666. I think the most convenient course would be if you would explain in more detail now what the grounds of discontent are?—Yes. I believe the Commission is aware that we are supposed to be a self-supporting office, and in consequence of that there are certain harsh features peculiar to it. That is rather important. I would wish the Commission to bear that in mind.

54,667. When you say that the office is supposed to be self-supporting, that is to say, is it not, that the fees are supposed to be fixed on a scale which will provide for the expenses of the office and for such insurance fund as is considered necessary?—Yes.

54,668. Do you suggest that that has had a direct bearing on the scales of salary or other conditions of service fixed for the staff?—Yes; so far as we can understand it has, directly, in the sense that it has been admitted that the work being performed was of a superior sort and was inadequately paid, but that owing to the fact that there was not a large surplus we could not obtain an increase; it has been very difficult to show it precisely and accurately, because we have nothing in writing on a matter of that sort.

54,669. Has that argument been actually put forward by the Treasury as a ground for refusing claims that would otherwise have been admitted?—For instance, when in a body the then second class clerks were promoted in 1911 to be the present body of first class clerks, to our surprise, when we were promoted to first class clerks, though we had always understood that the first class clerks would begin at 500*l.* and go to 600*l.* a year, we were told that as seven of us (necessary for the work of the office) were promoted, because there were those seven our salary would have to begin at 450*l.* It was reduced, not because our work was inferior to the work of the Law Courts, but because there were seven of us.

54,670. How many were there in the first class before that?—Two.

54,671. At that time the first class was increased from two to nine?—Yes. I am speaking of the Registration of Title under the Land Transfer Acts and not for the Middlesex Registry or the Land Charges Department.

54,672. Was it at that time that those departments were merged with the Land Registry?—No; in the administration of the office the one is quite distinct from the other. We do not interchange.

54,673. But the number of the first class clerks that you mention is nine?—There are seven of us engaged in the administration of the Land Transfer Acts, and it is only for those seven that I have permission to speak.

54,674. The total number of the first class clerks is nine?—It is nine, but that includes one in the Land Charges Department and one in the Middlesex Registry, whom I am not representing.

54,675. At the time when the seven clerks for whom you speak were put into the first class, were those new posts in the first class that were created at that time?—They were not new posts in a sense. There had already been two first class clerks, but it was felt that for years we had been discharging the superior duties, and the time had come when we must receive some recognition.

54,676. But what exactly happened? What became of the two clerks who were previously in the first class?—One of them has been transferred to the Law Courts since, and the other is dead. They were still there at the time.

54,677. Besides those two there were seven additional posts in the first class created?—Yes.

54,678. Then the nine posts which then existed have since been reduced to seven?—Yes. At that time the two first class clerks already in existence were on a scale of 500*l.* to 600*l.* When we were promoted to discharge not only the same duties as those two gentlemen were discharging, but considerably more responsible duties, our remuneration was cut down from 500*l.* to 450*l.*, and, so far as we could ascertain, the reason was that the Treasury felt that there being seven of us it would be too heavy a charge otherwise.

54,679. To have a complete statement of the changes made at that time, was it at that time that two acting assistant registrarships were created?—One acting assistant registrarship.

54,680. And one assistant registrarship?—No, they were already in existence.

54,681. The two assistant registrarships were already in existence?—Yes.

54,682. Then at that time one acting assistant registrarship and seven additional posts in the first class were created?—Yes.

54,683. The acting assistant registrarship still remains, but the nine posts which existed in the first class, after the creation of those seven additional posts, have since been reduced to seven?—That is substantially correct. I spoke of one first class clerk having been transferred to the Law Courts, but he, in fact, had been transferred prior to our promotion, and was already removed from the establishment of the Land Registry.

54,684. So when the seven additional posts were created, that made eight, apart from the first class clerk in the Middlesex Deeds Registry, and the one in the Land Charges Department?—That is so.

54,685. Have you an actual statement from the Treasury that the reason why the minimum of the class was fixed at 450*l.* and not at 500*l.* was because the cost would be too great?—No, we have not that.

54,686. It is an inference which you frame and not a statement by the Treasury itself?—We understood that the registrar was doing his best to obtain what we believed we were justified in having—a higher scale—but was unable to obtain it from the Treasury.

54,687. But the point I want to get at is this: Was the reason given that the revenue arising from the fees paid to the registry was not sufficient to provide for the larger charge?—My colleagues support me in saying that that was certainly what we were given to understand, but there was nothing in writing on such occasions to which we have access.

54,688. There is nothing in writing to support it?—Not to which we have access.

54,689. Will you continue your statement?—Might I say that a second respect in which the Land Registry differs from other departments is that since its inception it has been persistently opposed by a great and powerful profession, and frequently and bitterly attacked. And this not because of the maladministration of the system by the present officials; on the contrary, the fair, reasonable, and even able administration of the department is, I think, commonly recognised. Objection is taken to the system of registration of title under the Land Transfer Acts, and to the State having founded the department at all. This reacts severely on the staff.

54,690. The question which you touch on there is hardly one which directly affects the question of the classification of the staff and the scale of pay?—My point was to bring out that there is a strong feeling of discontent, and we feel that our work from day to day is carried on in a very difficult and uncompromising atmosphere.

54,691. It appears to me that it is hardly within the functions of the Commission to examine the question of how the system of land registration is regarded by the legal profession. That may make some difference, as you describe it, to the atmosphere in which your work is performed, but it is hardly a point to be taken into account in considering the work which you do and the scales of pay or the classification of the staff appropriate for that work?—With very great respect, the Lord Chancellor Loreburn apparently had this in his mind when, after the late Royal Commission had reported, he took the opportunity of thanking the staff and saying that their work had been specially difficult and had been carried on under circumstances which required great tact, courtesy, and good temper. I think he did so because it was in his mind that we might reasonably expect some recognition from the State for that. What he meant to convey, I think, was, that a superior class of man was required to conduct this particular work with success. If we were a very narrow-minded or red-tapish body of men we could practically stop the administration of the Acts from day to day, and he said: "Therefore these men are doing a higher class of work" because it requires that particular kind of ability."

54,692. You put that forward as showing that those conditions make your work specially difficult and require special qualities in the staff?—Yes. We feel that the conditions of service do not afford to members of the staff a reasonable prospect of a career commensurate with that offered in other branches of the Civil Service to men holding similar professional qualifications and discharging analogous duties. Barristers of long standing are engaged in discharging the most responsible administrative duties of the department, yet they are graded and paid as though their duties were of a purely clerical and routine character. And this though the registrar himself has for years told us that he has urged a higher scale of pay, and has recently recommended a change in nomenclature from that of first class clerks to that of acting assistant registrars. I may say that the first class clerks in the Registration of Title Department are all Oxford and Cambridge University men and members of the Bar of many years' standing. May I mention what our duties are in support of that?

54,693. You have supplied us with a table* showing the staff of the department?—Yes.

54,694. Did the gentlemen who are at present in the first class enter mainly in the second class or in the third class?—I think every one of them in the second class. There are no men who entered as third class clerks who are in the first class.

54,695. The first class clerks are all barristers?—The first class clerks are all barristers.

54,696. And they entered for the most part in the years between 1899 and 1902?—Yes.

54,697. When was the Land Registry formed?—For the administration of the Land Transfer Acts. The last Act was passed in 1897, and our branch followed on the 1st January 1898. We are administering the Acts of 1875 and 1897. The present Land Registry on the present scale was formed from 1898 onwards, extending gradually.

54,698. Then the numerous appointments which took place in those years from 1899 to 1902 were due to the extension of the work under the Act of 1897?—Yes. We took in London gradually; first a small group of parishes, and then, when we became familiar with the working of the Act in a parish, the area coming under the Act was gradually extended; and as the additional parishes, and finally the City, were taken under the purview of the Act, the staff was, of course, increased accordingly.

54,699. You say that all the gentlemen in the first class are barristers?—Yes.

54,700. Had many of them actually practised at the Bar before they entered the Land Registry?—Yes.

54,701. How many of them?—I think six out of seven.

54,702. Will you tell us the nature of your work?—Our duties consist partly in examining and deciding on the sufficiency of titles, and partly in administering the system of registration of title throughout the county of London and, so far as it is in operation, in the provinces. We have complete discretion to grant or refuse absolute titles in accordance with the opinion we have formed, subject, of course, to the over-riding power of the registrar, and he has, in effect, drawn up certain general rules to guide us based on an experience of some years; but he will not absolve us from personal responsibility by quoting to him his own rule. He insists on our being responsible although he has made certain rules to guide us, so that we each have to form our opinion on a title.

54,703. Does it depend on you whether you give a decision on a title or whether you refer it to the registrar or assistant registrar?—We should refer it to the registrar direct in cases of doubt.

54,704. You do not refer to the assistant registrar?—Always to the registrar.

54,705. If you consider that a title is clear you decide on it and pass it, and that does not go to the registrar at all?—No.

54,706. Nor to the assistant registrar?—No. There is one over-riding consideration, and that is, that in dealing with land of really high value—over 10,000*l.*, I think it is—all such cases are referred to the registrar personally. I should go into his room and say, "I have a title to land here of over 10,000*l.*," and he would say to me, "Have you any points arising on it? Is it absolutely clear?" I should give him a very brief statement of the facts, and he would say, "That is all right," or if any point did arise he would go into it further. But that is done also by the assistant registrars.

54,707. What class of case goes to the assistant registrars?—The same in the general course as goes to the first class clerks. I think the registrar explained that the assistant registrars are wholly engaged upon the absolute titles, together with two or three first class clerks, who take turns, generally doing a period of a year, and then we go back to the possessory titles under the compulsory clauses.

54,708. When you are dealing with an absolute title are you doing exactly the same work as is done by the assistant registrars?—Exactly.

54,709. For the purpose of deciding on titles you have to have a wide knowledge of conveyancing law and land tenure?—Yes. I would venture to remind the Commission that if we did make a mistake the consequence would be that the Insurance Fund would have to pay. We have been doing it for many years now, and we submit that the immunity of the Insurance Fund from any claim for indemnity shows that none of us have made a mistake, and proves our competence to discharge the very responsible duties entrusted to us.

54,710. Have there been any claims on the Insurance Fund?—One, on a very technical point regarding a charge, not on an absolute title. No absolute title granted by the Land Registry has yet been challenged.

54,711. (Mr. Coward.) Probably it would not have arisen yet?—Possibly not; but I would venture to say it probably would, because we are very carefully looked after by the solicitors, and if we had passed one wrongly I think we should have heard of it some time ago.

54,712. If you had passed one that the solicitors had thought you were erroneous about, then you would have had the fat in the fire?—Yes.

54,713. (Chairman.) Do you claim that that work entitles you to be regarded as on the same footing as the assistant registrars?—Yes. I should also say that when the present Lord Chancellor became Lord Chancellor and visited the Land Registry, my colleagues and I were introduced by the registrar to him as the responsible heads of the department and as the men who, in the event of the Land Transfer Acts being extended throughout the country, would be called on to administer the Land Transfer Acts in any part of the provinces, and who would be able to do it without even the assistance of the registrar in person. All of us were so introduced; and the Lord Chancellor spoke to us on the understanding that we were the men so qualified if he saw his way to extend the Act, and of whom he would be able to say, "Here are half a dozen men ready at once to go and administer the Act in such and such a county."

54,714. You ask that the title of your post should be changed to "acting assistant registrar"?—Yes, that has been approved by the registrar and by the Lord Chancellor; but before doing it the Treasury suggested that as the question of nomenclature would come before this Commission they thought it advisable to wait and

* Vide Appendix CII.

29 April 1915.]

Mr. J. S. STEWART-WALLACE and Mr. E. OWEN BYERS.

not make any change until the report of the Commission had been published.

54,715. Do you attach importance to the question of the nomenclature?—Yes.

54,716. Or is it the substantive position to which you attach importance?—This question arose just at the outbreak of the war. We did not wish to appeal for any rise of salary during the war, but we did ask that we should get the title given to us because we found that in dealing with solicitors—we having to deal with them absolutely directly, and see sometimes the very leading men of the profession—it is advisable that we should have the substantive name as well as the actual work to do. We feel it is rather important, and I think the registrar shares that view.

54,717. The term “acting assistant registrar” does not seem very appropriate for a permanent class?—Of course any other title that would suggest our real status we should welcome; but we feel that it is certainly not conveyed at all to a stranger coming into the Land Registry by the term “first class clerk,” as we have to take the responsibility of advising a solicitor many times on delicate matters regarding the Land Transfer Acts, and our decision is binding on him, save in so far as he formally appeals to the registrar. I think the registrar indubitably agrees to that and has recommended to the Lord Chancellor that we should be known as “acting assistant registrars” for that reason, but he does not attach over-importance to the actual title provided it conveys our real position. We agree that the word “acting” may sound temporary, but we thought it still worse to say “deputy assistant registrar,” and they could not make us assistant registrars without giving us the pay, and during the war we did not wish to take up any position in which it seemed that we were pressing for an increase of salary. What we were really getting at was that we felt that we should be personally protected if called “acting assistant registrars,” and that when the positions of the assistant registrars become vacant in time, if we were acting assistant registrars it would be regarded that we were competent to fill the posts and prevent what, to my mind, was a very serious danger of outside appointments being made after we have borne the burden and heat of the day for some fifteen or twenty years. We are very nervous about that. We have no guarantee that it will not be done, and it has caused very acute apprehension that it might be done. The registrar agrees with us that it would protect us if we had a superior title conveying our real status and work.

54,718. Apart from the question of title, what is your suggestion as regards the position and remuneration of the first class clerks?—One of my colleagues reminds me that the term “Acting Assistant Commissioner,” according to “Whitaker,” is used in some other department for permanent officials.

54,719. In what department?—The Charity Commission.

54,719A. (Mr. Boutwood.) It may be in “Whitaker,” but it is not so in the office?—We have already one official in the Land Registry known as an “Acting Assistant Registrar,” and he is permanent. Provided any name is given which conveys the status it is not the word we stick to, but the title describing our functions.

54,720. (Chairman.) Will you deal with the suggestion you wish to put forward concerning salary?—The scale of pay of the first class clerks is 450*l.*, rising by annual increments of 20*l.* to 600*l.* per annum. We understand that the various grades of clerkships were created by way of analogy to those existing at the Royal Courts of Justice, but the responsibilities of the first class clerks in the Land Registry have been very substantially increased since the grade was created, and I submit that our qualifications, and the administrative and quasi-judicial character of our duties, place us in an entirely different category from the first class clerks at the Royal Courts of Justice. If I might be permitted, in support of that, I should like to refer to the evidence of Master Romer, which I had the opportunity of reading this morning, describing the first class clerks in the Royal Courts of Justice, to whom we are supposed to be analogous. I was very much impressed by this phrase: “At present the registrars are independent “ officers. They are under the judge, and they are not “ in any sense under us. They are men of the same “ social position as we are, and, as I need not explain, “ the consequence is that the relations between the “ masters and the registrars are quite different from “ the relations between us and our clerks.” That is a phrase which would never be used by Sir Charles Brickdale regarding us. We are invariably introduced by Sir Charles Brickdale to any solicitors or counsel who may be appearing in his department as his colleagues. We, of course, belong to the same schools, the same universities, and the same clubs in town. I actually read this passage to Sir Charles Brickdale to-day, and I said: “I hope I have your authority for saying “ that you are good enough to regard us as friends and “ colleagues,” and he said, “ Most distinctly; ” and he added: “ The safest way is, if I invite you to dinner to-night.”

54,721. Are you acquainted with the work of the first class clerks in Chancery Chambers?—I cannot say that I am acquainted with it, but I have read the evidence of Master Romer, and it is quite clear from that evidence, I submit, that the men there are always acting under the direct personal supervision of the master; that they decide nothing on their own, but the responsibility is invariably taken by the master. They prepare the groundwork of the cases, and then it is submitted to the master for final decision. The position occupied by the masters in that regard, or by the registrars in the courts, is exactly the position occupied by the first class clerks in the Land Registry; it is prepared by the third and second class clerks and goes to the first class clerks, and is finally decided by us. Our initials are the initials on which the register is typed, and the insurance fund made responsible for the correctness of the entries. There is no reference to the assistant registrars. I do not think the registrar would ever talk about “our clerks.” In the Law Courts, I understand, the clerks are attached definitely to assist one particular master, and he would give them definite orders. With us there is no such thing as that. The whole administration now of the Land Transfer Acts in London is handed over to us. We deal with the staff personally; we arrange times, we initial leave, and do the other administrative duties that arise, and we would be consulted by the registrar in the event of men junior to us being promoted. He does not know the men as we do, nor see their work; he would ask us about them, and we should endeavour to assist him.

54,722. In the organisation of the office are particular clerks in the lower classes attached to each first class clerk?—No.

54,723. The work is not specialised in that way?—No.

54,724. How is the work distributed between the first class clerks?—We take the cases more or less as they come. One absolute title may come along and take a great number of hours—possibly in a very big matter a few days—and another case may be very simple and it can be passed in an hour.

54,725. The papers come in and the case has been prepared up to a certain point by the clerks of the lower class?—Yes.

54,726. How does the clerk who has prepared that case know to which first class clerk to bring it?—That will go to the Central Office, and the Central Office will distribute the work, and it is our duty, knowing that the work must be done—and we are always in touch with the state that the work is in and what cases are undone—to stay till it is done, and it is sent to whatever man may be free.

54,727. Then the distribution is merely according to the position of each first class clerk as regards his current work. If he is coming to an end of what he has he is given some more?—Yes, and it is his duty and business—and he is responsible to the registrar for the statistics showing that the work has been done reasonably fast.

54,728. Have you any definite suggestion or claim to put forward as regards the salary of your class?—May I read a rather striking statement as to the first class clerks of the Land Registry? Our average age is 46 years; our average professional standing 21 years;

29 April 1915.]

Mr. J. S. STEWART-WALLACE and Mr. E. OWEN BYERS.

our average public service is 14 years ; our average service before promotion to our present rank was 10 years, and our average present salary is 540*l*. The opportunities of promotion, should present conditions remain unaltered, are for many of us practically absent, and for all of us quite indefinitely postponed. We do feel that those are conditions under which it is very hard indeed to maintain a constant keenness for a department of the public service.

54,729. Do you merely put forward a general case for improvement of your position, or do you wish to put forward any particular claims?—The point I should like to bring out is that we are not here as a body of men saying we are extraordinarily able persons and require promotion. We are endeavouring to show that we are asking for the work that we have done for years to be recognised, and that we should be paid and get the name and status according to the work that is done.

54,730. You have mentioned that you wish for a change of designation, and that you thought there was no ground for the reduction in the minimum salary of the class which was made at the time when the numbers in the class were largely increased. Is there any other definite point you wish to bring forward as regards the present scale of pay?—We should like to say that we are doing the work of assistant registrars, and that the work of doing the absolute titles and administering the Land Transfer Acts in London could not be conducted by the registrar and the two assistant registrars ; the volume of it is very great as you can imagine, dealing as it does with a population of four millions. We have to assist as assistant registrars, and of course our claim would be that we should really be made and paid as assistant registrars ; but during the war we feel that that is an impossible and impracticable position, and we do not wish to press that point.

54,731. Do you wish to put forward any consideration on behalf of the lower class of clerks also?—Yes, I want to say that we submit that while these conditions are very hard on the first class clerks they are equally hard on our juniors. If the qualifications for first class clerks which are insisted upon to-day, and which are necessary while we do our present work, continue to be insisted upon in the future, none of the third class clerks and very few of the second class clerks can hope to be promoted to that grade at all.

54,732. What are those qualifications?—If you are going to be trusted to examine a title and decide on its sufficiency, you must have had professional training, and we do not think that that work could be trusted safely to men without a certain education which may not be possessed by all the present body of third class clerks.

54,733. You are not speaking of actual professional qualifications such as being called to the Bar?—Yes, I am.

54,734. Is it at present made an indispensable qualification for promotion to the first class that the men should have been called to the Bar?—I could not answer the question in that form, but in actual fact no one not possessing those qualifications is a first class clerk.

54,735. In the case of the clerks of the lower class, how many are qualified as solicitors or barristers?—None of the third class clerks. I am told that there are five barristers and two solicitors in the second class. There are three second class clerks who are neither barristers nor solicitors.

54,736. Do those who are barristers or solicitors possess the necessary qualifications for promotion to the first class?—They would on the present conditions, I think, provided the registrar considered that the individual was efficient.

54,737. Would the work done by the second and third class be a suitable preparation and training for the work of the first class? Have they to deal with the points which arise when you scrutinise a title?—I should think, provided you started with a man possessing a liberal education, he could certainly hope to do it, but I think he certainly must have a professional qualification and be a lawyer. I do not see how the legal work could ever be done by a man who had not some legal knowledge. But the Land Registry itself, I should have thought, was one of the finest schools of conveyancing in the kingdom, because we see an immense number of titles and read them—I suppose more titles are read by us than by any other body of men in England ; it must be so.

54,738. Would that apply to the second and third as well as the first class?—A certain number of the second class at the present time have opportunities, but I do not know that any of the third class have. Mr. Byers will later on be able to tell you.

54,739. How many of the second class are men of university standing?—Three of the second class clerks.

54,740. And of the third class?—One. The point I wish to bring out is, that the effect of the present first class clerks possessing their present qualifications, and being classed and paid on their present basis, is a hardship, not only to them, but to the others, because this very substantially penalises a man entering the Land Registry as a third class clerk compared, for instance, with the Law Courts, to which we are supposed to be analogous. There, I think, it appeared from the evidence of Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie, that the clerk entering the third class can hope, by diligence and efficiency, to reach the first class ; but in the Land Registry, there being a professional qualification, it would form a bar which he would not have an opportunity of surmounting, and we feel that is very hard on the present staff of third class clerks in the Land Registry. I suppose a brother might go into the Law Courts, and if he discharged his duties efficiently there, he could hope certainly to say : “ Before I retire I may “ hope to have 600*l*. a year.” In the Land Registry to-day I think he could not say that.

54,741. What do you consider the proper way of filling the higher posts in the Land Registry?—I should say there must be a professional bar, but we submit that that should be placed at the grade of assistant registrar and acting assistant registrar, and they may be regarded, say, as all the men in the first class now. One of the assistant registrars and the acting assistant registrar came in as second class clerks, not as third class clerks. A man possessing a liberal education who comes in as a second class clerk might reasonably hope to become an assistant registrar. But, I think, in the case of a man entering the service of the Land Registry as a third class clerk, all he could reasonably hope for in the absence of very special and exceptional talent would be to become a first class clerk. At least, if that were so, he would have no grievance as opposed to men entering the Law Courts.

54,742. (Mr. Boutwood.) That is the point. If the first class clerks were made acting assistant registrars or something of that sort, do you suggest that there should be a new grade of non-professional first class clerks created at the head of the clerical staff?—Yes, we should suggest then that it should re-act throughout the office.

54,743. (Chairman.) Your suggestion would amount to this, that there should be two lines of promotion, one for professional men entering at the second class and promoted to first class and to assistant registrarships, and another line of promotion for non-professional men entering at the third class and eligible for promotion to the second and first class?—I think I represent the entire department in saying that there is a strong feeling in the department that that would be a reasonable career for men coming in.

54,744. Then what would be the work of the first class under the system you suggest?—The work discharged by the second class clerks at present.

54,745. In fact, everybody would be moved up a class?—Yes, because they are actually doing the work now.

54,746. What would be the work of the future second class?—They would do the work they are doing now.

54,747. But you say the future first class is to do the work at present done by the second class?—We are not claiming promotion. We are submitting that on the work actually done to-day the first class clerks are called upon to be men of education and to discharge the functions of an assistant registrar, and that that should be recognised.

54,748. Then the present first class clerks on your suggestion would become assistant registrars, and the present second class clerks would become first class clerks, but continue to do the work they are doing now?—On the same ground, that they are doing senior work.

54,749. What would be the work of the future second class, the work of the present second class being done by the future first class?—This re-acts throughout the whole office in the sense that our third class clerks are frequently called upon to do work of quite a responsible nature which we think it quite reasonable should qualify them to be second class clerks.

54,750. Then the future second class would do the work now done by the third class?—Substantially.

54,751. What would the future third class do?—That is rather going into the organisation of the whole department. I think it has been found that the present extreme division of class is not quite the happiest arrangement. Having admitted a professional bar or qualification for what may be called the superior class in the Land Registry, we go so far as to suggest what is called in the other offices the second division for the purely routine and mechanical work of the Land Registry.

54,752. You have already some assistant clerks for routine work?—Yes.

54,753. At present you have three classes doing certain work, and according to the organisation you suggest you would have four classes?—We should in actual substance abolish the third class clerks, because I think the registrar agrees that the present nomenclature is not a very happy one. We cannot really make all the duties of the office fit neatly into these sections or classes, and it ought to be a little more elastic than it is.

54,754. What exact organisation do you suggest?—We suggest, to accept your emendation, that every man of the professional class might come in as second class clerk and be promoted right through to assistant registrar, and higher in the case of a very exceptional man. Regarding the purely routine clerical work, we should like to bring out that there is a great hardship on the present third class clerks who came in imagining that they would go straight through to first class clerks. If promotion was open to these men we should appoint no more third class clerks expecting to go up to the first class, but we should have the professional class and the routine class.

54,755. In fact, leaving aside the case of the present men appointed with prospects of promotion, you would in future have a class for the routine work without prospects of promotion except in very exceptional circumstances, and a higher class recruited direct from professional men entering through the second class. Is that it?—Yes.

54,756. It is an organisation corresponding to that of the Chancery Registrars' Office. Are you familiar with that office?—I am not sufficiently familiar with it to commit myself. I am told that I did not sufficiently bring out the point that for the clerical and routine work in the Land Registry our suggestion would be that it should be done by what are called second division clerks in the other branches of the public service.

54,757. You would abolish the third class altogether and substitute second division clerks for it?—That is our suggestion.

54,758. You think that second division clerks would be fully capable of doing the work of the third class under those conditions?—Yes, and I am supported by my colleagues on that point.

54,759. Do you wish to speak also on the question of transfer to other departments?—Yes, I think one of the causes of discontent is the fact that the only real avenue to promotion appears to lie in transfer from the Land Registry to some other branches of the Civil Service. In spite of this it is not the most competent members of the staff who have had the opportunities of such transfer. I think it will be generally conceded—and the registrar would probably agree—that the most efficient members have remained in the Land Registry. In fact, it has never been suggested that those transferred persons were selected by reasons of any special qualifications or superior capacity, but it does remain a fact that those transferred to other departments have received substantial promotion whilst their colleagues (in many cases their senior colleagues) have remained in the Land Registry with much smaller, if any, advance in position and salary. For instance, in the course of the last 16 years several junior members of the staff have been transferred to other departments, principally to positions in the Royal Courts of Justice. There was a very striking case in 1901 when a junior third class clerk having, so far as is known, no special qualifications was transferred from the Land Registry to the department of the registrars of the Chancery Division and has advanced from that date, it is believed automatically, until he is now a registrar receiving a salary of 1,250*l.* rising to 1,500*l.* per annum. In 1901 another third class clerk in the Land Registry was transferred to the same department and has similarly advanced until he is now a principal clerk receiving 800*l.* a year. There have been several other cases of such transfers.

54,760. Those are typical cases?—Those are typical cases.

54,761. You suggest that men without special qualifications who have been transferred to other departments have advanced much more rapidly than they would have done if they had remained in the department?—I think I may say without doubt that if these men had remained in the department they would have had no opportunity of being promoted, certainly not sooner than the present men, and several of them might not have received promotion at all. So far as we who are responsible for the administration of the Land Registry would have to recommend them, we should say that probably they would not have been promoted at all with us.

54,762. You mentioned that you had a feeling of insecurity as regards future promotions from outside. Will you explain that a little more fully?—There is a feeling of insecurity in the department due to the apprehension that such posts as may become available for promotion may be conferred on persons from outside the department. This feeling was accentuated last autumn by the temporary employment of a gentleman from outside the department to perform some of our duties, and he was appointed at a higher rate of pay.

54,763. What was he called?—He had no official name accorded to him. He was brought in for a short time to assist in the absolute title work, but the registrar told us that he regarded him as junior to every single one of the present first class clerks. We made some appeal to the registrar about it, and pointed out to him how exceedingly serious it was to us, if a man might come in in that way at a higher rate of pay, and it was extremely discouraging, and we asked him to communicate our feelings to the Lord Chancellor, which he did, and the registrar assured us that in that particular case our apprehensions were absolutely without foundation, and that so far as his recommendation would have weight with the Lord Chancellor he would certainly recommend every one of the present first class clerks as suitable men for holding the higher posts.

54,764. (Mr. Coward.) What became of that gentleman?—His appointment was for a period of three months, I think, and at the termination of the three months it was an end of his engagement at the Land Registry, but it caused a very acute feeling in the Land Registry, and we took the point with the registrar, that if that sort of thing was to happen it would be probably done in that way—that a gentleman would be put in temporarily to learn the work and later on employed again, and when an assistant registrarship fell vacant they would say, "This gentleman has learnt the work of the department," and he might be slipped in over our heads. We asked that some official statement might be given to us, that so long as we were efficient and performed our duties well, and in the opinion of the registrar for the time being were capable, the Lord Chancellor would rather consider our cases after 20 years of work, as many of us have had, in preference to a gentleman from outside. We submit that the gentleman who came in is of the same standing as we are.

54,765. (Chairman.) Was he a barrister?—Yes, he was a barrister. We do not ask that the fact of being a member of the staff should give a vested right to promotion, of course, but we respectfully submit that the claims of the staff in the department should be considered first, otherwise our career is very seriously endangered.

54,766. Do you wish to add anything further as regards promotion?—So strong has the feeling of discontent been, that in past years several members of the staff have resigned and sacrificed their pension owing to their disgust at the absence of any encouragement.

54,767. (Mr. Coward.) What has become of them? What have they done?—They have done very well. When the Insurance Act began one or two of our old members got positions under that, and have all advanced very substantially compared to what would have been the case in the Land Registry. The result is, that we feel that it is a department not to be in, but to get out of, which I submit is not a healthy feeling to have in the department.

54,768. (Chairman.) Do you consider that the prospects and position you have at present are worse than what you had reason to expect when you entered the department?—Yes, but on this point I should like to say that the case I am endeavouring to make is not that we have anything in the nature of a grievance because the Land Transfer Acts have not extended; that could not be a legitimate grievance to us. We took the risks and we hoped that if it had extended we should have had positions in the country. But the case I am endeavouring to make is, that our work of the administration of the Land Transfer Acts in London, in the most important area of the country, in itself entitles us to a better position than we have, and we have been disappointed that we have not received more for the work that we have actually done.

54,769. Was the work which is now being done by first class clerks done by first class clerks at the time when you entered the department?—No, it was done only by assistant registrars. When I came into the department I thought if I made myself qualified to do the exact work that I am doing to-day I should be in receipt of 850*l.* to 1,000*l.* a year.

54,770. At that time did the first class clerks not decide questions of title at all?—No, nor the assistant registrars.

54,771. Were they decided by the registrar only?—At the beginning of the Land Transfer Acts we dealt only with the possessory work; the absolute work was practically dead—there was very little. With the enlarged knowledge of possessory work and the enlarged experience in London of the classes of title that we met with, we became exceedingly cognisant with the London titles and acquired a vast amount of information regarding titles, and the registrar from time to time felt it possible to advance a little further in granting absolute titles, and as the absolute title work increased, so, first of all, the assistant registrars were drafted off to do the absolute title work and then the first class clerks. That is an increasing branch of our work, but when we started there was practically no absolute title work.

54,772. That is a kind of work which has grown up since you entered the department?—Yes, that branch of the work has very substantially increased, and is increasing rapidly.

54,773. You represent that the work now done in that branch by first class clerks is as important and responsible as the work that was done by assistant registrars at the time you entered the office?—Undoubtedly. It is exactly the same. The administration of the possessory parts of the Land Transfer Acts in London is given entirely to the first class clerks. They administer those Acts and arrange the office subject to the criticism and over-riding direction of the registrar. He deposes that power to the present first class clerks.

54,774. Was it the practice in the early days of the Land Registry to consult outside counsel on questions of title?—To some extent it is the practice to-day, because under the Land Transfer Acts if any extremely complicated point of law arises which the registrar personally feels a doubt about, he has the right to refer it to counsel for consideration.

54,775. Is that often done?—I could not say often, but the power is always there.

54,776. Was it not more frequently done in the earlier days?—I have no precise statistics. Our impression is that it was.

54,777. You could not say whether it is the case that the staff inside the office now deal with questions which in the earlier days would have been referred to outside counsel?—Yes, undoubtedly.

54,778. That is the case?—We can certainly say that. We are all so much more experienced. The registrar himself feels able to do things that he would not have ventured to do 15 years ago, owing to the experience which we have gradually accumulated in London.

54,779. Going back to the prospects at the time you entered the office, the higher staff of the office has been increased since that date?—Not the assistant registrars. We have had one acting assistant registrar appointed.

54,780. And the number of first class clerks has been increased?—In 1900, when I came in, there were a registrar, two assistant registrars, and two first class clerks. Now there are the registrar, two assistant registrars, one acting assistant registrar, and for this branch of the work, seven first class clerks. At one time there were three full assistant registrarships. That is another thing which has contributed to our mental perturbation. Everything has been cut down; there has been no special progress anywhere. When we were promoted in a body our salary was cut down.

54,781. (Mr. Coward.) Not cut down?—I accept the correction. It started at 450*l.*, but for several years it means that it is substantially cut down.

54,782. (Chairman.) The minimum of the scale was reduced?—The result is that we are personally receiving less to-day than if we had been appointed at 500*l.* a year.

54,783. (Mr. Coward.) Yes, but you are getting more than you would if you had stopped as second class clerks?—Admittedly, but we feel that it is hard that we were cut down. When the acting assistant registrar was appointed, the registrar in the fullest way stated his position as being absolutely the same as the other assistant registrars, but he was cut down to 700*l.* a year, and then the statement was made that if he were removed elsewhere, the question whether another acting assistant registrar would be appointed would be considered. It seriously affects us that nothing is held out in this department to encourage men at all.

54,784. (Chairman.) Do you wish to say anything on the subject of temporary clerkships?—The only point there is that several of my colleagues have been temporary members of the staff for some years, and it is felt that a grave injustice would be done to them if, when the moment comes to decide upon their pensions, the years that they spent in the department as temporary assistants should not count towards the years on which their pensions should be based. That is the case where they have subsequently been made permanent.

54,785. Does what you have said represent the whole of your case which you wish to put forward on behalf of the first class clerks?—There is one point which we view with some apprehension. We saw it suggested that possibly the rule in the Civil Service did not apply to the Land Registry regarding retirement, and that possibly the registrar and assistant registrars might stay on, I gather, rather indefinitely. We feel that that would be very, very seriously penalising us, because the present assistant registrars came in when they were younger men than we are, and received 850*l.* to 1,000*l.*, and several of my colleagues are as old as those assistant registrars, and they would never get a chance.

54,786. You represent that the ordinary Civil Service rules as regards retirement ought to apply in the Land Registry?—With much respect we would like a ruling from the Commission that that would be advisable.

54,787. (Sir John Kempe.) In your letter of February you quote the Land Transfer Act, 1897, and say that Section 22 of that Act requires that the fee orders relating to registration of title should be arranged so as to produce an annual amount sufficient to discharge the salaries and other expenses. Has the Treasury ever raised the fees as the department has grown, or has the work of the department grown sufficiently to meet the expenses of the staff?—We have altered the fees. It is difficult to give a very definite answer to you, because the graduated scale has been altered, and we have rather reduced the fees regarding the smaller values, and increased them regarding the higher values. The object was to obtain rather more money for the department than had been available.

54,788. It was done specifically in order to meet the growing expenses of the department?—I think so.

54,789. Yet, in spite of that, you say you are told that the Treasury consider that they cannot raise the salaries until the fees reach the right amount?—I do not want to say that we have been told that, because nothing in writing came from the Treasury about it, to which we have had access, but that was the impression—that if the institution had been a flourishing one in the sense of paying, we indubitably would have had larger salaries.

54,790. How much of the land of the country has been brought in now?—The administrative County of London is in the compulsory area. The whole of England and Wales is voluntary.

54,791. Yes, we have been told that, but the system is a long way from full development yet?—Admittedly.

54,792. And more fees and much larger revenue will be produced by and by?—That would be so from all over the country; but in regard to London the extension of the system would not bring in more money, because we have already brought in the administrative County of London, and I take it that the expense of administering another area of the country would eat up the fees coming from that area.

54,793. I suppose the fees come according to the area?—Not under the present scale. It is a universal fee for the whole of England and Wales.

54,794. Would a large estate pay more than a small estate?—Yes, it is graduated and based on the graduated principle.

54,795. Are the fees higher in London?—No, the same.

54,796. The fact that London is brought in would not increase the revenue very largely. The larger revenue would be derived from the larger area of the rest of the country when it comes in?—In London it is compulsory, and must come in; in the rest of the country it is voluntary, and we regret to say that the landowners do not avail themselves of the opportunity so much as we would like.

54,797. But that is the area which, if ever developed, will bring in the most money. London does not bring in the most money?—I have seen no statistics to prove it. I should have thought the value was the other way, London values being much higher.

54,798. It is the value of the land on which it is based?—Yes, it is an ad valorem fee.

54,799. You say you are dealing with transactions, many of which involve large sums of money. Does that mean that a large sum of money depends upon your registration of the value?—If, in dealing with a very valuable piece of land, we made a mistake, and an applicant subsequently turned up, a claim would be made against the insurance fund.

54,800. If a mistake is made the insurance fund will have to pay?—Yes.

54,801. It does not affect the value of the property whatever you do. A mistake can always be put right. You would not depreciate the value of property by anything you do?—No; on the contrary, we submit it increases the value of property, because by adding security of tenure the property becomes more valuable. I am told that in Australia the value of the land has increased something like 10 per cent. since the system of registration was adopted, owing to the smaller legal fees and the feeling of greater security.

54,802. (Mr. Coward.) Is that so, really?—That came out before the Commission in Scotland from a witness, a Mr. Hogg, a barrister of large experience in the colony, and I mentioned it in an article I contributed to the Contemporary Review last May, and it was unchallenged, I think.

54,803. (Sir John Kempe.) I see in the Estimates of the present year the Land Registry fee stamps are 38,000*l.*, and last year 61,000*l.* 61,000*l.*, I suppose, is not the permanent amount?—I am afraid I have not come prepared to answer questions on finance of that sort.

54,804. You do not know why the fees received last year were so much greater than those estimated in the present year?—My colleague tells me it was because of the different method on which the accounts had been based. In previous years distinction was made between the Land Transfer Acts and the Middlesex Act, and the 38,000*l.* represented the expenses and income of the Land Transfer Acts, and the balance represented the Middlesex Act. Last year, I understand, they were amalgamated, and one sum was returned for both; but I speak subject to correction.

54,805. You are speaking of all receipts and not of fees alone?—Yes, receipts.

54,806. Then the amount is not reduced because of the war but because of a change of accounting?—Yes.

54,807. (Mr. Coward.) You speak about being apprehensive of people being imported into the office over your heads, as it were. You have been there for 15 years?—Yes.

54,808. Doing this work for 15 years?—Yes.

54,809. Assuming that it is well done, you will have had far more opportunity for doing that work than any person who could be imported into it?—We submit that that is unquestionably so.

54,810. Then is there any real cause for your apprehension? If you are able to do this work thoroughly well, I cannot conceive why you should be apprehensive of having somebody put over your heads?—Last year one gentleman did so come in. The registrar gave us to understand in that particular instance that our apprehensions were, in fact, without foundation. He recognised the fact that the first class clerks are fully competent to act, and have, in fact, for some years been acting as assistant registrars, by his recommendation to the Lord Chancellor, which I spoke about; but in spite of this, while emphasising the fact that the appointment did not rest with him, he expressed the opinion that it would be impossible to obtain any assurance whatever from the authorities that should any appointment be made to an assistant registrarship the claims of the present staff would be considered before those persons from outside the department.

54,811. They always might go outside if they were going to get a man who was, in their opinion, more competent?—We agree to that.

54,812. I should have thought, myself, that there was no possible risk, provided the two men were equally competent; but the question is whether they are. When you went into the office, your experience was not very great?—In one sense it had been because I had been for some years engaged as a coach at Oxford in connection with fellowships and had much larger experience than is possessed normally.

54,813. Not practical experience?—No.

54,814. You would not have the same experience as is possessed by a conveyancer at the Bar nor a solicitor in practice, of the practical working of titles?—Except in the subsequent 15 years.

54,815. Of course you will be familiar with Burton's Compendium and things of that kind, which probably the ordinary man in the street would not know much about?—Yes; but we have had such elaborate experience since in examining titles.

54,816. That is exactly what I said, so I should have thought you would have been quite free from fear?—But it does exist.

54,817. Do not you think it may be misplaced?—We hope so.

54,818. Perhaps you do not know what sort of work is done by the managing conveyancing clerks of solicitors?—Yes, I have some acquaintance with it.

54,819. Is not that much the same kind of work as you do?—I think it is rather difficult to speak of the whole class of managing clerks; they vary very greatly in my experience. Some of them are men of liberal university education and possessing the qualifications which the Commission, I think, recognise as necessary for administrative posts. Some of them, my experience shows, have not that liberal education.

29 April 1915.]

Mr. J. S. STEWART-WALLACE and Mr. E. OWEN BYERS.

54,820. I agree; but I am speaking of the conveying clerks in solicitors' firms who do a large business?—Who have a liberal education?

54,821. Yes?—Then they are men of the same class, but without the special experience of the Land Transfer Acts which we have acquired. Our knowledge of London titles I do not think any body of men could possess, because we index a great deal of the knowledge and have acquired it through a course of years. Our position is not the position of a man outside, who can leave one firm and go to another and get another position. If a man is appointed over his head there are other firms he can go to. But there is no second Land Registry. We have spent the whole of our lives practically in the Land Registry and cannot retire and go to a rival Land Registry and ask them to take us on because of our experience.

54,822. Supposing the whole of you seven first class clerks retired to-day, do you think your places could be readily supplied?—It is difficult to suggest that we are the only competent men in London. I should be the last to do that.

54,823. Would there be really any difficulty in getting a great many applicants for the posts?—If I might put it in another way, 15 years ago, before I entered the Land Registry, I was in receipt of a larger income by the exercise of professional skill than I am to-day after 15 years in the public service. If I had known that would be so I am not quite certain that I should have entered the public service; but I cannot now resign.

54,824. Then "Fain would I climb but that I fear to fall"?—There are private reasons, as a rule, for movements of that sort. I would venture to leave myself out altogether, and say that I think you would have very great difficulty in getting a body of men such as my colleagues are for their present salaries to discharge the duties they do. I do not think it could readily be done.

54,825. There is no question, I should think myself, that the first class clerks in your office are quite a different class to the first class clerks in the other legal offices?—We venture to think that an inquiry into our records and standing would show—and the statements made by Master Romer and the other witnesses from the Law Courts, I think, substantiate the view—that the men discharging the duties of the first class clerks in the Land Registry to-day are quite a different class—I do not use the word in any invidious sense—from those who are called first class clerks in the Law Courts, from the point of view of social standing, professional training, and otherwise.

54,826. (Mr. Boutwood.) To go back to your apprehension, I suppose, as a matter of fact, what you have in your mind is, that some day there might be a wicked appointing authority who might not give exclusive attention to the qualifications of the men before him?—I accept every phrase of that.

54,827. The suggestion has been made to this Commission that in all these cases, where patronage is exercised by one man, he should be assisted by some sort of a committee on which, for instance, the Treasury, the Civil Service Commission, and the office concerned would be represented, and that virtually he should act on the recommendation of such a committee. Would that be an additional safeguard?—I think it would.

54,828. Who appoints the assistant registrars?—The same appointing authority as appoints the first class clerks—the Lord Chancellor.

54,829. Are there any qualifications prescribed for them?—Under the Act five years as barristers or five years as solicitors.

54,830. Do they do anything that you do not do?—No. There is only one point about it, and that is one reason why we are asking for the title of assistant registrars. In the absence of the registrar to-day, because of our title, he could not make us acting registrars, whereas he tells us that he would have absolute confidence in us individually, but there is a bar to his doing that owing to the fact that we have not the title. If we had the title he has told us that he would trust us as he would his assistant registrars.

54,831. There is only one other point which occurred to me in the course of your evidence. Instead of your third class you suggested the substitution of the second division. It was put very strongly to this Commission in the early part of its proceedings, that there are at the present moment certain public offices in which there is a second division at the bottom and a professional class above, and that the second division in those offices have not whatever expectation of promotion exists in other offices in virtue of the Orders in Council, and the result is unfortunate. I only mention that to ask you really to consider that point of having a class at the bottom of your office which would really be in a different position, and with different prospects, from the same class in other offices?—But would it be the same class?

54,832. The second division?—When speaking of the second division clerks we hoped, of course, that their position would be very substantially benefited by the recommendation of the Commission itself. We would like to see the second division so altered, if necessary, as to make it an attractive and reasonable career for a man possessing the qualifications asked for in a second division clerk.*

54,833. But then you would be up against this difficulty. What is the salary of your present third class?—They are appointed at 100*l.* rising by 10*l.* a year to 200*l.* a year.

54,834. The present second division goes to 300*l.*, and the scale suggested in the earlier Report of this Commission was considerably higher?—But not 600*l.*

54,835. No; but instead of a third class stopping at 200*l.* you would have a second division going up to 300*l.* or 400*l.*?—Perhaps I do not make it clear. We feel that the present third class clerks would have a substantial grievance if they were now barred from going to first class clerks. Whereas if they were given or allowed to understand on appointment that if they were once got rid of by promotion to other departments, or otherwise, they would not be replaced by third class clerks but by the second division clerks who would have a more reasonable opportunity; 200*l.* a year seems to me to be a very low maximum for a man doing that work very well. I should like to see the reward of the second division clerk increased, and opportunities given for a really clever second division man to go further; but if you have a professional bar, as in the Land Registry and all legal departments, and he has not that professional qualification, he does seem to be excluded by the Act.

54,836. So you accept the prospect of a larger expenditure at the bottom of your office?—Certainly, for an improved second division clerk.

54,837. (Chairman.) (To Mr. Byers.) You have heard the evidence already given this afternoon, some of which applies to the position of the third class as well as the other classes in the office?—Yes.

54,838. Are there any special points which you wish to put before the Commission with special reference to the third class?—A good deal of the ground has already been covered by my colleague. There are one or two things which I think I ought to bring out. He has already referred to the fact that there is no retiring age in the Land Registry, or apparently not; and also informed you that the average age of the first class clerks is 46. The average age of the third class clerks is 39, and our submission is that from that fact alone there is very little opportunity of promotion for us by reason of vacancies in the superior class. The seven third class clerks whom I represent have all done from 10 to 15 years' service.

54,839. Are they all at the maximum of their scale now?—They are all at the maximum of their scale now, and they have been doing practically the work of the second class clerks for some time past. I think that point has been made clear already, because the first class clerks have been given the duties of assistant registrars. The second class clerks have, to a very large extent, taken upon themselves the duties of the first class clerks, and the third class clerks have accordingly been given very much more responsible duties to perform, and we believe we have performed them efficiently; so much so, that the registrar has, to some extent, recognised our claim to promotion by suggesting some sort of slight increase in the maximum of the grade.

* There is some confusion in nomenclature here. The second division clerks I had in mind are the present second division clerks—not the improved class recommended by the Commission. If those recommendations were carried out and a new class of assistant clerks made, these new assistant clerks would be the grade suitable for our routine clerical work.—J. S. S.-W.

54,840. What was that suggestion?—That those who had been in the office for 15 years should go up by 10% a year to 250%.; but I should like to point out with regard to that, that what that means is, that a man who, when he was appointed third class clerk, expected to be promoted to a second class clerkship at any rate within 10 years, has got to work 20 years before he reaches 250%, which is the commencing salary of the second class.

54,841. What reason had you for expecting promotion within 10 years?—Because we came into the office under the same conditions as the third class clerks in the Royal Courts of Justice; and, with the experience of the promotions which take place there, we had every reason to expect that promotion would take place within, at any rate, from 6 to 11 years.

54,842. Is it not a necessary experience that in a new office where a large body of the staff is appointed at much the same time a block in promotion is almost certain to result?—I think undoubtedly that is so.

54,843. So that the present block in promotion would appear to be due a good deal to that cause and not to permanent causes?—Quite so.

54,844. Or causes arising out of the nature of the classification or the work to be done?—Yes.

54,845. If the cause of that block is temporary, would it not be reasonable that if a remedy is to be applied it should be a temporary remedy?—I do not quite follow what you mean by a temporary remedy. Can you illustrate that?

54,846. I mean a remedy which would not consist in a permanent alteration of the scales of pay or classification?—Certainly; that might be so.

54,847. You have heard the evidence which was given by Mr. Stewart-Wallace as regards the work of the third class and the proposal to assign the more mechanical work to a separate class of second division clerks or clerks of that character. Have you any observations to make on that suggestion?—No, I have no objection to that at all.

54,848. From your experience of the work of the third class, do you think a clear distinction can be drawn, and is in fact drawn, between work of a more mechanical kind which would be given under that suggestion to the lower class and the work requiring professional knowledge which would be given to the higher classes?—It is a little difficult to know what is meant by "mechanical work." Of course, the work that has been performed by the third class clerks for some time past has been rather more than that. They have had administrative duties to perform, they have considerable responsibility, and they have acquired a good deal of knowledge, particularly of the working of the Land Transfer Acts and the laws which are concerned with it. I think there is certain minor work which could be done by a grade of the kind that Mr. Stewart-Wallace has mentioned—the second division clerk.

54,849. Does the present work of the third class include anything which could be described as examination of title?—No, hardly that. Those of us who are doing legal work are engaged in the work of the possessory title department (we are not all doing legal work). That consists more particularly of a complete knowledge of the Acts and Rules, of the Land Transfer Acts, the Conveyancing Act, the law of Charities and Trusts, and so on. That is the work we are engaged on.

54,850. In registering possessory titles, are there any cases which are entirely dealt with by third class clerks which do not go to a higher class for final approval?—No. The second class clerks do not, except to a very limited extent, settle cases themselves, and we have been for a long time doing the checking work which is settled by the first class clerks.

54,851. Then the work of which you are speaking is preparatory work and checking work. Is that what you would consider the best kind of work which you do in the third class?—Yes, to a very large extent. We are supervising juniors, and they frequently come to us for decisions upon minor matters in connection with the department, and also for advice as to how to do their own work.

54,852. Do you mean juniors of the third class or the assistant clerks?—I was speaking of the junior temporary clerks and the assistant clerks.

54,853. The work done by the assistant clerks is, I suppose, not work requiring responsibility or discretion?—No.

54,854. Is all the work of merely copying entries in books and so on done by assistant clerks?—Yes.

54,855. The third class have no work of that kind?—Very little indeed, now.

54,856. Are there any other points you wish to bring forward?—I think the question of the apprehension is one which we share with our seniors and, perhaps, to a little larger extent, for this reason. As it has been suggested that there should be a professional bar between the upper and lower grades, that loads the dice against us, if we are to be prevented from getting over it unless we become barristers to entitle us to those positions. We came into the office with the full expectation of reaching the first grade, and we do not think that any recommendation should be made, or any reorganisation of the staff should be carried out, which would prevent us from reaching the ultimate maximum of 600%, which it was our normal prospect of attaining when we entered the Service.

54,857. (Sir John Kempe.) The Chairman remarked about your delay in promotion being a temporary block only. Of course, you can judge from the ages of those above you what chances you would have of promotion. Would there be a chance before long some day of a large number of places above you being free?—That is just our point. There is none whatever.

54,858. Would the ages above you preclude that?—Quite. The oldest first class clerk is 55, and the senior clerk is 50. The average age of the first class clerks is 46, and the oldest man in the third class is 43. There is practically no opportunity for us to rise at all by reason of a vacancy occurring.

54,859. The average age of the third class is lower, but still it would not be by many years. Your maximum age is 43, and, therefore, your average age is not much lower than that of the first class?—It is the difference between 46 and 39.

54,860. There is not much margin and there is no chance of a sudden flow of promotion?—None whatever.

Mr. GRAHAM WALLAS.
 Miss HALDANE.
 Mrs. DEANE STREATFEILD.
 Mr. E. W. H. MILLAR (Secretary).

The Right Hon. LORD WRENBURY, called and examined.

54,861. (Chairman.) My lord, you were for some years one of the judges of the Chancery Division?—I was a judge of first instance in the Chancery Division from 1900 to 1906, and a Lord Justice of the Court of Appeal from 1906 to the present year.

54,862. Before that you had practised at the Chancery Bar?—That is so.

54,863. The first point on which the Commission desire to have your opinion is the question of the method by which appointments are made to legal offices other than the offices of the judges themselves, which are outside the reference to this Commission. At present, as you are aware, the appointments are made partly by the Lord Chancellor, partly by the President of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division, in some cases by the Master of the Rolls and the Lord Chief Justice, and in certain cases by individual judges. Evidence has been given before the Commission suggesting alterations in that system. One point which has been put before us is that all appointments ought to be made by some Minister responsible to Parliament, and suggestions have also been made for a committee, either to assist the Minister who makes the appointment by examining the qualifications of the candidates and reporting to him, or, according to the suggestion made by Lord Loreburn, a committee actually to make the appointment, with an appeal, in case of dissent on the committee itself, to the Lord Chancellor. We should be glad to have your views on those suggestions, and generally upon the proper method of making the appointments in question?—In the first place, I think there is a class of persons who are so much personal servants of the person to whom they are appointed that their appointments should rest solely with the person who employs them. It would be impossible for anybody, I think, to dictate to a judge who the judge should have as his clerk, and there may be other appointments of that description; and, in what I am going to say, I exclude those altogether.

54,864. The judge's marshal, for instance?—The judge's marshal. There may be other instances. Speaking generally of appointments, my view is this: I hold myself with all work that it is much better done by one person than by a committee of persons. You never get the best work out of five men acting together; you get something much better out of one man. I would, therefore, as regards all appointments, ultimately vest the power of appointment in some one man, and the one man, I conceive, in the case of this class of appointments, would be the Lord Chancellor. Of course, he is a Minister responsible to Parliament, and his acts could be questioned, if there was anything to question, in anything that he had done. But it by no means follows that the sole person whom I would make the ultimate authority to appoint should act entirely without consulting other people. It is perfectly obvious that the Lord Chancellor has very small means of knowing, as regards a great number of appointments, who is the best person to appoint. To answer that question is always excessively difficult; no human being can do it accurately, and I think you have to do the best that you can. In order to obtain the information upon which you are going to act, it seems to me that the assistance of a committee would be most valuable. The business of the committee would be simply to receive evidence in order to ascertain the facts as far as they could, which might be done by hearing people before them, or it might be by personal inquiry from anybody else, getting their information as best they could. That committee might put the materials which it collected in such a form as to result in saying that they thought, for reasons which they might cite, that X was the right man, and the Lord Chancellor would act upon it or not as he thought proper. It may be that the Lord Chancellor would consider that amongst the people forming the committee, A, upon this particular appointment, was a person more deserving of attention than B, and if A said X was the right person, perhaps he would act upon that. All that would be a question for the Lord Chancellor, but I think, theoretically, the best way of ascertaining the knowledge is to have a body of persons to collect the materials and report upon the materials, and then a sole person who should act.

54,865. Do those views apply throughout: to the clerical appointments and to the minor posts as well as to the major posts, such as masterhips and registrarships?—I do not see why they should not apply to the minor as well as the major. I agree that in the minor appointments probably the Lord Chancellor would simply act upon what he was told, and very little more. But as a matter of machinery and detail, I do not see why he should not act as much in the one as in the other.

54,866. And that would apply, I suppose, to the promotions in the departments as well as to original appointments?—Yes. Of course the objection to it is that it increases the work of an already overburdened official. If all these little things were to go to the Lord Chancellor it would take up a great deal of his time, but I suppose they would go through as a matter of course in the minor cases.

54,867. Theoretically, they do go to him at present, except in certain particular cases, such as the offices of the Probate Division?—That I did not know.

54,868. Under the present system promotions in the legal offices, as well as the original appointments, go to the Lord Chancellor, and, no doubt, are dealt with in fact largely by his permanent secretary?—I should fancy so.

54,869. Do you see any objection to the removal of the patronage, or the power of appointment, which is at present exercised by the President of the Probate Division and certain other judges, to the Lord Chancellor?—If I possessed the patronage—which, happily, I do not—I should be only too thankful that it should be removed to the Lord Chancellor.

54,870. From an administrative point of view, and from the point of view of the proper management of the offices, you do not see any objection to the appointments being made by the Lord Chancellor?—None at all.

54,871. It has been suggested to us that for some, at any rate, of the appointments, specially those clerical appointments which do not require any previous professional knowledge or experience, competition by examination should be applied as a method of selection. What is your view as to that suggestion?—My view, generally, is that by competitive examination you acquire a knowledge as to only a small part of a candidate's efficiency for his post. If you are going to appoint a boy of 18 to something, I think an examination to see that he is a decently-educated person is a necessary and proper step. With higher posts it may be a useful step in order to ascertain what quality of man you have got so far as knowledge capable of being tested in an examination is concerned. But I think when you have taken your examination, and done that, you have only taken one step. Practically, what you want in making every appointment is to learn, as far as you can, the personal qualities of the candidate, and not merely his intellectual qualities, as instanced by an examination for which he has studied. I should like to see an examination used as one of the factors, but only one of the factors, to determine whether the candidate should be accepted or not. As to the other means of information, I agree it is very difficult to follow it out and say how you are going to get it. As I said before, to a large extent you have to act upon information which you can get from friends, or from those who are acquainted with the candidate, and other ways, which you have to use your own judgment upon as to whether you believe it or do not, or whether you think the person is exaggerating in favour of his candidate or not. There your own personal qualities come in, but I think you want to qualify the effects of an examination by what I regard as more important, namely, the particular characteristics of the person which qualify him for the office.

54,872. Something can be gathered as to those by personal interview and personal questions?—Certainly; I should always have a personal interview. I think you can judge a very great deal of a man's character by the way in which he speaks and acts.

54,873. (Mr. Coward.) You are very likely to be led astray sometimes by a personal interview. A man may have a sort of seductive manner which convinces you that he is a very fine person, and very able, and so on, but when you come to test him you find he is a very different person?—I think you must try not to be led astray if you can.

54,874. I only suggest that it is very difficult sometimes?—It is very difficult. I think it is an excessively difficult thing to select the best man for a place.

54,875. And you are very likely to be led astray?—I should not say very likely—quite possible.

54,876. Do not you think so?—No, I do not think so.

54,877. (Chairman.) Then your suggestion would be that for the junior posts for which competition is applicable, you would make a competitive examination part of the method of selection, but that you would combine it with information derived from other sources and also from personal inspection?—Supposing you are going to take a boy of 18, I should examine him to see whether he can write English; whether his handwriting is good; whether he is good at figures, or has learnt any history and various other things, and that he has an ordinary reasonable education. I should then, if I could, go to his schoolmaster and ask him what he thought of the boy, how he behaved at school, and so on. If I had among my acquaintances any boy who was at school with him, I should think him a most valuable source of information, and should ask him what sort of a boy he was at school. I should get his personal characteristics as distinct from his examination characteristics, and upon the material collected I should act. I should see him and form my own opinion for what it is worth.

54,878. The method of personal inquiry would be rather difficult of application if there were a very large number of candidates?—No doubt. I think patronage is excessively difficult myself.

54,879. Taking the case of schoolmasters, for instance, they might have a certain interest in putting forward the best points in their own candidates?—That is quite true. In the case of getting all information, it appears to me it is like the giving of advice. You ask a person's advice, and when he has given it you act upon it or not, as you think proper. You may think he has advised you badly. You may ask a schoolmaster and he may give a glowing account of the candidate, and you may come away with the impression that he has painted his picture much too brightly, and you must discount it largely. That you must do for yourself.

54,880. Another question which arises, and which is rather closely connected with the question of the method of appointment, is whether the present organisation of the legal offices should be maintained—I mean the organisation where the men are recruited at the bottom of the third class, and are promoted to the two higher classes in regular course (mostly as at present by seniority)—or whether, as has been represented by some witnesses, you should have a different system and have a lower grade for the performance of the more mechanical work, the keeping of books, lists, accounts, and so forth, and a higher grade where higher qualifications are wanted for better work, and make it a matter of exception and not of regular practice, to promote from the lower grades to the higher grades; in fact, whether you should recruit at two points instead of at one. Are you prepared to express an opinion on that suggested alteration?—I can only give my opinion as that of the man in the street. I would never myself put a human being into any position from which he was told he could not rise. I would recruit from all sources from which I could obtain candidates, and I would not exclude any man from the possibility of rising. I would, therefore, not have third class clerks who should be engaged upon the terms that they should never move into the second class. I would let it be open to every man's ambition to rise from the third to the second, if he showed himself worth it. I think you get the best work out of human beings by putting them into a position and saying: "Now, if you show yourself worthy of something better you shall have something better." I want the best man I can get in every place, and I would, therefore, never have a class which is stigmatised, and is marked with an indication that that class is not fit to rise. I do not know whether that answers your question.

54,881. I think there was no suggestion that the door should be absolutely shut. If there was a man of exceptional ability in the third class he would not be excluded from promotion to the higher classes?—I do not see why you should qualify it in that way.

54,882. The suggestion was, that for the higher classes you want men with better education than is required for work in the lower class, and also men with a certain amount of professional experience and knowledge, and that a man who had entered at the age of 18, say, and had been doing the mechanical clerical work of the third class, would not have acquired ordinarily those qualifications and, therefore, would not be the man to be selected for the higher classes?—Do you mean that the social question comes in, that the university man, say, in a higher class, would resent having placed on an equality with him a boy who has been a national school boy?

54,883. No. I do not think the social question is in view. It is a question rather of the educational and mental qualifications—whether the man who, with a primary education only, had entered into a class which was occupied with mechanical and clerical work, and had done that work for 10 years, would have the necessary qualifications for the better work which would be done by the higher classes?—He might or might not. If he had, you would promote him; if he had not, you would not.

54,884. At present, practically, he is promoted whether he has it or not?—Then I think that is quite wrong.

54,885. The question is whether you would not get a more suitable class of man in the higher classes by making the normal method of appointment direct to the second class?—But that raises the whole question of promotion by seniority simpliciter without anything else.

54,886. That question is involved also?—I think promotion by seniority simpliciter is wrong, that seniority should count amongst other things, yes, but for every place your business is to get the best man for that place. If the senior is the best man, or if he and another are equally good, I should give the post to the senior man, but I should only make seniority one amongst other qualifications.

5 May 1915.]

54,887. (Mr. Coward.) You do not select a man at the Bar to conduct a case because he is an old gentleman?—Not always. You want the best article for that job.

54,888. (Chairman.) Under the present system, where the normal method is promotion from the lower classes, it would be regarded as a hardship in the third class if anybody was brought in from outside to appointments for the higher classes?—There is only one argument for promotion by seniority that I know of, and that is, that it is supposed to lead men to work well, knowing that if they do in course of time they will go up. That appears to me to be fallacious, because if a man knows that he will go up because he is senior, there is no particular incentive to work. He has only to wait for years to elapse; the mere flight of time qualifies him for a higher class. I do not think flight of time qualifies a man for anything; it is a question whether he is the best man for the place.

54,889. You would apply the method of promotion by merit throughout?—I would, bearing in mind, of course, that seniority certainly presents some claim, and that a man who has done good work for years is not a person to be ignored.

54,890. If it was a question of a vacancy in the second class and you thought you could get a better man from outside than you could find in the third class, would you appoint him from outside?—I should certainly go outside.

54,891. And that principle you would apply throughout; you would reserve free liberty to appoint from outside to the higher classes if you thought you could get a better man in that way?—I would. I have no regard for vested interests.

54,892. Turning to quite a different point, the question of organisation: The Commission have had a good deal of evidence as regards the present organisation of the Chancery offices, and in particular on the question of whether the Chancery Registrars' Office and the Chancery chambers should be kept separate as at present, or should be amalgamated. As you are aware, that question has been reported upon by several Commissions and Committees—such as the Esher Committee in 1886, and the Kekewich Committee in 1907. We should like to have your views on that question?—I start with a proposition which seems to me to lie at the root of this. The work of the master is judicial work; he is a subordinate judge; he has to determine questions and give decisions upon the matters which are brought before him. His position is judicial. The position of the registrar is not judicial at all; he is a recording instrument. The business of the master is to do something; the business of the registrar is to record what somebody has done. Those two things are in their quality essentially different. The Chancery orders, not all of them of course, but many of them, are of so complicated a nature that you certainly require a skilled person to draw them. I should have been very sorry myself as a judge, if I had had to draw my own orders; I am sure I should not have been competent to do it. The registrars have acquired a knowledge of the proper way in which orders ought to be drawn in order to carry out the complicated rights which often arise in Chancery proceedings. I think you want a skilled body of men to draw orders of that description. Of course, it is not every order which is of that description. Many orders are alphabetically simple. An application is made by a defendant, say, for further time to deliver his defence and he gets ten days; anybody could draw that order, of course. There are orders of all descriptions, from the simplest order for time to the most complicated order in a suit to determine priorities as between mortgagees and incumbrancers of various kinds and to work out their rights. I think, therefore, you certainly require to maintain a body of skilled persons, whose business it is to draw orders. I further think that there is at present a great deal of waste of time and energy in sending orders from those who make them to those who are to draw them. If you are going to draw an order you must understand what the case is about. The master before whom it has been known what it is about. The registrar, if he has to draw the order, has to learn what it is about; that may take time, and it is a great waste of power to ascertain it over again. It seems to me, therefore, that the two classes of work which I have described—the judicial work and the recording work—run into each other, in the sense that the registrar who ultimately records only puts the crown on to the work which the master has judicially done; it is the finish of the master's work, and the finish may often best be done by the man who has done the spade work at the bottom, as the one leads to the other. I think the views which I have been suggesting lead rather to this, that you ought to have these two classes of work brought into close touch with each other, which would mean one office in which both persons should be found, but that that office, as between the persons who are acting within it, might very well be divided into persons who are doing two different classes of work. The master should, so to speak, have the registrar at his elbow so as to put down the order at once; but it does not follow that the master should necessarily draw the order. In that office I do not see why in course of time there should not be persons who are equally capable of doing both works—the judicial work and the recording work. They are both quite within the capacity of one man. But it does not follow, I think, that one man ought to do both, for this reason: I think there is no greater opportunity for waste of time than that a person should not be able to take up a job and finish it. To postpone a case always creates delay and expense. Therefore you want, let us say, the master who is hearing matters judicially to be free to take up and continue and complete his judicial operations without interruption. If a master is going to be a master this week and a registrar the next, he will not be able to do so; his time will be so cut up that he will not be able to give his appointments in advance. Probably, therefore, in the office which I contemplate it would be better, I should suppose, to have men who were doing the judicial work and men who were doing the recording work; but that is mere subdivision of the office. I should have thought theoretically that the best thing would be to have one office in which the parties were in close touch with each other, and to leave them to settle between themselves whether the particular order which is in question is a mere order for time, which the master would draw for himself or his clerk would draw for him, or whether it is a complicated order which ought to go to the registrar, and, if so, he would send it to the registrar, who would be in the next room and who could sit with him, if necessary, if worth while, to hear the case if it would save time. The two branches of work are different, but closely connected one with the other, and would be best done in one office with such facilities of communication between the people in that office as experience showed to be right.

54,893. That would remove the inconvenience and delay which it has been represented to us sometimes occurs where questions are raised by the registrar and the matter has to be referred back to the master and discussion has to take place between them?—I am supposing that the registrar is sitting in this room and the master in the next, and if any question arises the one goes and speaks to the other; that is all.

54,894. If you had the two offices brought together in that way, it is probable that some saving of force might result?—I think so, certainly.

54,895. (Mr. Coward.) The more complicated orders are always drawn by counsel, are not they, speaking generally?—No, I do not think that many complicated orders are.

54,896. I mean the minutes of the order?—Sometimes, but not very frequently. The application generally follows at the end of the case: "Does your Lordship think that Mr. A. B. should sign the minutes?" and the judge would say, "No, I do not think so; the registrar can do it"; or he would very likely say, "Yes"; but that application is not made every day.

54,897. I am only speaking of cases of some difficulty in which the orders are difficult. Dealing, for instance, with those applications under the Trading with the Enemy Act which are now proceeding, every one of those is drawn by Mr. Austen-Cartmell?—I will not say what my view upon that is.

54,898. Some are very curious and very complicated?—There may be some.

54,899. (Chairman.) Your opinion is that there is nothing in the nature of the work which makes it impossible for the same man to acquire the knowledge which makes him capable of performing the work of a master and the work of a registrar?—No.

54,900. Another part of the registrar's duty consists in sitting in court?—It does.

54,901. The Kekewich Committee made a recommendation upon that point, and suggested that it would be unnecessary for the registrar himself to sit in court when witness actions were being taken, and we understood from Mr. Registrar Farmer that that is now the practice—that the registrar can send his clerk into court in case of witness actions. But it appears to be still the rule and practice that the registrar himself should be present in court when all other kinds of business are going on. Do you think it necessary that that rule should be maintained, or should that change be carried further, and a clerk be substituted for the registrar in any other case besides witness actions?—When witness actions are being tried the work of the registrar really is largely mechanical; it is merely the swearing of witnesses, the marking of documents, and work which could very well be done by a clerk, and it is not necessary for the registrar to be there. There are other days when I think it is certainly essential that the registrar should be there; for instance, on motion day a great number of orders are made, and very few words perhaps are said, and what is intended would not be appreciated by any person not familiar with the proceedings of the court; I suppose the ordinary spectator would not have the least idea of what was going on. On petition day, I think, the case is even more largely true. Petitions are now very few in number, but orders on petitions are exceedingly complicated and difficult. I think when motions are being heard, when petitions are being heard, and when adjourned summonses are being heard (to which it applies in a less degree), the registrar ought to be in court. When witness actions are being heard, I think a clerk can equally well do it.

54,902. Do the various kinds of business you have mentioned other than witness actions cover the whole of the kinds of business that come before the court?—Motions, petitions, and adjourned summonses—yes, I think so.

54,903. In fact, you would draw the line where it is drawn at present, and say that the registrar need not be present in witness actions, but in all other cases he should be present?—Yes. I may say I noticed somewhere in the evidence it was said that the registrar ought to be there because the judge from time to time consults him on points of practice. In my experience it is not in the least necessary that he should be there for that purpose. I do not think I consulted a registrar upon a point of practice twice in the course of the six years or more when I was sitting in court. When I was counsel I do not remember a judge referring to the registrar more than the number of times you might count on your fingers.

54,904. (Mr. Coward.) I looked at the report of the case of in re The New Zealand Land and Mortgage Company, which was a question about vesting shares, and I see Lord Justice Lindley referred to the registrar, who told him something about the order in such a case. That is very curious, but it is very rare?—Such things are known, though the occasion is very rare, and if a judge wanted assistance in that respect he would simply send for the registrar, just as we sometimes send for a master when some matter is before us which has been before the master. It is very easy if you want a man to send for him.

54,905. (Chairman.) What is it that makes the registrar's presence in court necessary in the class of business you describe?—The judge takes no note of the order which is made; that is the registrar's business. The judge does nothing of that sort; he has no record, and the week after will not know what he has done. It is the registrar's business to record exactly what has been done. You may have a contest between counsel, one saying it was this and the other that, and you refer to the registrar's note to see what was done.

54,906. (Mr. Coward.) And if there was any question about it, the judge would determine?—The judge refers to the registrar. The judge does not remember or may not remember. When there is some question as to what was done, the registrar's note is the only authoritative note. On motion days and summons days when matters are coming on quickly, it is essential to have a person who understands what is going on to take a correct note of what the result was. He is the only person who protects the judge from the subsequent assertion of counsel on either side that it was this or that.

54,907. (Chairman.) Would you say that for that purpose it is necessary to have a man of the calibre of the registrar himself. Would not his principal clerk be capable of doing that work?—I am not competent enough to say how expert the principal clerks are. You want to have a person who is acquainted with the work of the court, understands the business which is going on in the court, and can correctly record the action of the court.

54,908. (Mr. Coward.) There is sometimes a shorthand writer taking a note of the order made by the judge, and, if there was an official shorthand writer, would not the taking of that note quite suffice for this purpose—an official note I mean?—Certainly an official note would be a more complete record than the registrar's note.

54,909. (Chairman.) Another point to which the Commission's attention has been called is, that in the Chancery offices, speaking generally, the staff is what I may call more top-heavy than in the other offices. Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie described it in this way: He said in most offices the staff is arranged pyramidally with the base down, and in the Chancery offices it is arranged pyramidally with the base upwards?—In what sense?

54,910. In the sense that the number in the higher class in the Chancery offices is very much larger in proportion than in the other offices?—You mean 12 registrars and 1 third class clerk. Is that the sort of idea?

54,911. It is roughly in that direction. In the Registrars' Office there are at present 9 registrars, 6 clerks to registrars, 4 second class clerks, and, I think, 10 third class clerks. In the Chancery chambers there are 12 masters, 24 first class clerks, 12 second class clerks, and 12 third class clerks; that is to say, you have a larger number, especially in the Chancery chambers, in the higher offices than in the lower. Each master has 2 first class clerks, 1 second and 1 third class clerk attached to him, which is rather a reversal of the ordinary proportion. The question is whether there is any peculiarity in the work of Chancery which justifies that difference in the classification?—I do not think I have any opinion upon that at all. It depends upon how much there is of the mechanical work as compared with the work next above it, and so on. I do not know how that is.

54,912. That is the point. On that point you are not prepared to express an opinion?—I have no opinion at all.

54,913. It has also been suggested—and this is a point on which a recommendation was made by Mr. Justice Pearson in 1886—that there should be an intermediate grade between the masters and the first class clerks, something of the nature of assistant masters. I think for them Mr. Justice Pearson suggested a salary of 800*l.* to 1000*l.* as compared with the master's salary of 1,200*l.* to 1,500*l.* They would take the simpler and shorter matters which are at present dealt with by the masters. Are you prepared to express any opinion on that suggestion?—I do not think I have any view at all, beyond this: If an action is before a particular master he knows something about it, and therefore, I should have thought it saved time if he should even take trifling orders in that proceeding rather than send them to somebody else who, by hypothesis, knows nothing about it. It does not follow that you are wasting time because you employ, say, a first class man to do second class work from time to time, if it is conveniently combined with his first class work; but it is a matter of detail in the office upon which really I have no opinion.

54,914. A further point on which we have had evidence is whether it would be desirable to fix a limit of age for retirement, both in the case of masters and in the case of the clerical staff. The suggestion has been made that in the case of the clerical staff the ordinary Civil Service rule should apply, which is, that a man may retire on pension at the age of 60, and that he must retire at the age of 65, with power to the higher authorities to prolong his service in exceptional cases to 70. Most witnesses who have given evidence on this subject have suggested that in the case of the judicial and semi-judicial offices, such as the master-ships, the limit should be higher, and 70 has been the usual age suggested. What is your opinion on that question?—I would fix a limit of age for everybody with power to invite the man to go on if he is a person whose services you still consider of value. I do not at all think it is well that a man shall go on after his capacity has diminished. I would arrive at an age, which it is difficult to fix, no doubt, at which his capacity would presumably be diminished, and I would have full power given to ask him to go on, but I would name a limit of age for everybody. As regards judicial work, I think myself 70 is not too long. I believe doctors will tell you that the brain improves after the muscles have begun to decay. I think brain work is often very well done until latish in life. I do not think the age of 70 too long for judicial work. As regards the other work, I do not know why 70 is too long for the man whom you propose to retire at 65, but 65 may be a more reasonable age for other work, though in the case of everybody I would take the power to invite them to continue.

54,915. Returning for a moment to the question of the staffing of the Chancery offices, another point which has come up in evidence is, that the work of the Chancery Division has very considerably diminished in the last 20 or 25 years, and some witnesses have expressed the opinion that the staff in the Chancery offices is unnecessarily large. Are you prepared to express an opinion on that point?—No, I know nothing about it.

54,916. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) You told us that it is necessary for the good conduct of public business that the judge should appoint anyone who is so personally and intimately brought into contact with him as his own clerk?—Yes.

54,917. Normally, the same clerk serves a judge throughout his period of service, does he not?—Yes.

54,918. When the judge dies or retires is not there from time to time a certain difficulty as to what to do with his clerk—a man who has done good work?—Yes.

54,919. There is no post obviously open for him?—No.

54,920. And some pressure is brought to bear that some personal use of patronage should be made in his case. Have you any solution of that difficulty in your mind?—The position of a barrister's clerk—and, of course, the judge's clerk is the successor of the barrister's clerk—is throughout one of peril from the day he begins. If he is thrown out it is almost impossible for him to get in again. During his tenure of office, if his master be successful, he receives very considerable emoluments—in certain cases emoluments much too large for his merits: but at the same time, in other cases he receives but a small emolument. It is a most dangerous calling, most fluctuating in its receipts, and most perilous in that it may come to an end, and there is no opportunity at all for his finding another place. It may be said that inasmuch as the receipts are large during his tenure of office the man takes the place with a risk. I think that is true. I do not know that he has any ground of complaint because when his service comes to an end he finds himself stranded; but that is a feature of the employment. At the same time, it is the fact that when the judges' clerks or the barristers' clerks do lose their occupation they are a class of persons who are certainly of value, they are men of affairs to a large extent, many of them write shorthand very well, they are acquainted with accounts, and certainly they are very useful people to get into other employment, and therefore I would give every facility for opening other employment to them; but I do not think you can do more. I would look upon them as persons who from their service are deserving of recognition, and who you would expect to be capable and efficient people in certain walks of life, and I think it would be very desirable to open other avenues of employment to them, I mean of benefit to the State, and, of course, of benefit to themselves too.

54,921. (Mr. Coward.) What class of employment could you suggest for them? Would not you say that it is rather the duty of the counsel who has had the services of the clerk to see that he is provided for than the State?—I quite agree. Certainly, he has been his personal servant all his life, and like all of us would do with an old servant the primary duty rests upon the master to see that he does not want.

54,922. It is difficult to find any employment which a barrister's clerk would be competent for except that of a barrister's clerk?—I do not agree at all. I think many of them—I will not say they are accountants, of course—are very conversant with figures and have been dealing with them all their lives, and they take up accountancy work very readily. Many of them are good shorthand writers, and they are people who, I think, would be exceedingly useful in I do not know what class of work.

54,923. Perhaps my class of work, if they were good shorthand writers?—Certainly in your class of work. Many of them write shorthand very well now. The judge's clerk is a man who is presumably an honest man, and been known all his life as an upright person, who has a considerable amount of education—I mean his associates have been such that he acquires a certain amount of gentlemanly bearing, and so on—and as a shorthand clerk he would be valuable, and I think in appropriate service he would be found an exceedingly useful person; but unfortunately now he is not in touch with anything; he cannot get into a place which would be suitable.

54,924. (Mr. Boutwood.) Does all that you have been saying apply equally to the judges' clerks?—The judge's clerk is but the barrister's clerk continued; it is a prolongation of the same person.

54,925. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) Mr. Coward asked you whether certain difficulties in the Chancery Division might be got over if there was an official shorthand writer. Did I understand you to think that on the balance of advantages it would be a good thing that such official shorthand writer should be appointed?—I would certainly not have an official shorthand writer merely for the purpose of superseding a registrar. All you would get would be every word that was said as distinguished from a summarised note, which is what a registrar would take. It would be a mere waste of paper and ink.

54,926. An official shorthand writer might be useful for other purposes?—Yes.

54,927. Speaking generally, do you think it useful that such an official should exist?—That scarcely arises out of the point about the registrars. I would not have a shorthand writer to supersede a registrar.

54,928. But have you any opinion to offer as to whether, for the many duties for which such a man would be useful, it would be desirable to have him?—But is it part of the business of the Commission to go into the general question as to whether there should be official shorthand writers? It is a very large question.

(Mr. Coward.) It is a very interesting one.

54,929. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) You told us that throughout the whole of the Service into which we are inquiring, it is desirable that everybody when he first enters should feel that the whole Service up to the top is open to him; that he should have the marshal's baton in his knapsack?—Quite.

54,930. Of course that principle would be general to the whole Civil Service and not merely to the Judicial Service?—Yes.

5 May 1915.]

The Right Hon. LORD WRENBURY.

54,931. That would imply that a man who would become Under Secretary of State should normally enter at the bottom of the Service as a boy clerk?—I do not think that follows.

54,932. That is the distinction I want to ask you about. Would you agree that under normal circumstances the man who is to be Under Secretary of State at the end of his career should enter rather later in life, after a more prolonged education, and should be a man from the beginning with rather more unusual and rather more extensive personal ability than the man who enters as a boy clerk?—It seems to me that that is a question which would work itself out in the course of events. It would be open to everybody to become Under Secretary of State, and it is exceedingly improbable that a person who began at 5s. a week, or something like that, at the office, would ever rise to that dignity. He might.

54,933. I know; but even supposing it is well understood that every post in the office is open to everybody, those who organise the office have to arrange whether they will recruit the whole office at one age and one educational stage, or at different ages and different educational stages?—According to my view they would of course, recruit at different ages every time. Say that the posts are numbered from 1 up to 10, and No. 6 falls vacant, to supply No. 6 you would go to Nos. 7, 8, 9, or 10, or to the outside public, or to any other source open to you, but a man might come up from No. 7 or not; he might come from outside.

54,934. The question whether you go to the outside public, and by what means you go to the outside public, and the type of man you want from the outside public, is a question for which provision has to be made beforehand. You have to have a deliberate arrangement, and you cannot settle it purely on each individual case?—No.

54,935. Would you treat the filling of every vacancy in an office as creating a new problem on methods of administration and methods of selection. Should the question whether you selected someone who came in as a boy clerk, or whether you held an examination and selected a man from outside, be settled in each case purely as if that case stood alone?—I am afraid I do not quite follow the question which you ask me.

54,936. If one takes an extreme case in the Law Courts, say, which would be presented by the fact that the officials in the Law Courts range from the messengers up to the judges, it may be argued that every messenger should feel that when he enters he may possibly become a judge; but arrangements are in fact made which presume that normally a judge will have been a distinguished barrister before he is appointed, and that the messenger will not. Does not that equally apply to the men who do the more mechanical clerical work of an office and the men who do the higher forms of intellectual work in the office?—I really do not know quite how to answer that question except by taking an instance: Supposing a messenger comes in and is employed as a messenger and then becomes an usher, if he is going to aspire to sit upon the Bench, he must leave his post as usher to pursue his studies and be called to the Bar, and if he does so and takes up another career he may end by being on the Bench; but that all depends upon himself.

54,937. The question of the training which the man gets depends upon himself and his circumstances, but the question of what training should normally be considered as constituting the right preparation for a particular office is a matter which would have to be settled more or less by general considerations and by rules, would it not? For instance, that a judge should have been a barrister?—Obviously.

54,938. And that a man who is at once going into, say, the Diplomatic Service, should have a high acquaintance with languages?—You might almost say that a person who was going to be a clerk should be able to write—Yes, certainly.

54,939. And therefore when you are constituting a Diplomatic Service you have to face the fact that normally the man who comes in as a boy clerk to do the clerical work in the Foreign Office when he is about 16 years of age, will not have the necessary exact knowledge of foreign languages which would enable him to be a secretary of embassy later on?—If he was a sensible person I should think he would realise that fact.

54,940. You can see that that fact might also be realised in the judicial service?—Certainly.

54,941. That normally a man who is appointed as a third class clerk should not look forward to the higher intellectual work?—I should say that if a sensible person he would see it, but I do not think it affects any scheme at all.

54,942. You told us that in so far as you would use an examination for the Service, you would use a pass examination and confine the real competition, I understand, to the steps that would be taken to ascertain the personal qualities of the candidate?—No; I would not have a pass examination. I would have an examination of such a searching nature as I thought right.

54,943. But you would not allow it to be a competitive examination in the sense of the appointment depending on the result of it?—I would not examine with the promise that I would take the first man. I should examine on the footing that the results of an examination coupled with other facts would determine my choice.

54,944. That, again, is a question general to the whole of the Civil Service. You probably know that that proposal has from time to time been made with regard to the whole Civil Service, that the Civil Service examination should be treated as only part of the evidence, and that there should be personal inquiry and selection after it. Some steps were taken 40 years ago, indeed, to try to bring that about, but you know it has been dropped. At present, while careful personal inquiries are made to ascertain whether the character of a candidate comes up to a certain standard, the real competition between candidates for appointment takes place on the examination?—Yes.

54,945. Would you, on the whole, apply the principle you have just laid down to the whole Civil Service or only to the Judicial Service?—You are asking only my personal opinion as to how to find the best candidate in any case?

54,946. Yes.—I say I should seek for my candidate by combining the results of the examination with other sources of information.

54,947. (Mrs. Deane Streetfeild.) You said you would propose filling a vacant appointment perhaps by appointing someone from outside the Service. Would not that be likely to create a difficulty in that the people who are in the Service would feel, perhaps, that the plums of it were likely to be given to outsiders, and it would discourage members of the Service if they had no hopes of rising steadily?—My hope would be that it would encourage them the more, because if they knew that they had the competition of the outside they would try to show themselves the more worthy inside.

54,948. Then am I to understand that an outsider would not be appointed unless there was no one inside the Service who was competent to fill a post, in your opinion?—I do not say that. I should recruit all my candidates, whether from inside or outside, with a view to getting the best possible man for the job. If I found that there were two practically equal I think I should give the preference to the man already in the Service, because he had already done service and was entitled to promotion if fit for it; but if I found the man outside was a better man for the job, I should pass over the inside man and appoint from outside.

54,949. How would you do that? Would you advertise?—I do not think I am prepared to give an opinion upon that point.

54,950. I was trying to think of it in practice?—I do not know that I am giving you any evidence of any value. I am merely stating theory, and not practical work.

54,951. But you think it would not tend to deteriorate the Service itself and be disheartening?—I should hope that it would raise the Service.

54,952. (Mr. Coward.) I should like to ask you a question that causes me much heartrending. I do not understand myself what the answer to it is, and if you could give me one I should be very grateful: The point is, how best to arrange for the organisation of these offices. The work must be done, and it should be done efficiently. That is a thing upon which we all agree. Secondly, I suppose you would agree that numbers is not at all a necessary thing in having efficient organisation?—Do you mean a sufficient number of clerks?

5 May 1915.]

The Right Hon. LORD WRENBURY.

54,953. Yes; if there be inefficiency it would not necessarily be got over by numbers?—No.

54,954. I see in the courts, if you take the Central Office and the Chancery offices, including the Registrars Office and the Taxing Office, there are 207 people employed. The question that is a great puzzle to me is how to ascertain whether those people are necessary, and who are surplus members of the body and how to understand who they are. Take, for instance, the Central Office; there are there 7 masters, 2 assistant masters, 11 first class clerks, 28 second class clerks, and 28 third class clerks—that is 76 altogether. Taking that office, here are these 28 third class clerks, and I have never yet been able to ascertain from any one of them what is their day's work, or get them to explain what they do in a day's work, and I am afraid, perhaps, your experience may be something like mine, that you do not know what these gentlemen do?—I have not the smallest idea. I have never been into the Central Office, and I do not know what a third class clerk does or what a second class clerk does.

54,955. That is my trouble, and I do not know how it is to be ascertained. There is nobody who has the direction of the thing so as to say we want so many clerks for any particular work?—Are there no statistics kept of the hour a man comes in and goes, or what he does?

54,956. These gentlemen have very short hours and very long vacations. I have asked several here if they could give me an account of a day's work, and I have not yet succeeded in getting from any one of them what they have to do. I was really asking you a rather hopeless question, I am afraid. I do not know myself that I can expect much aid?—Really, you would have a much better opportunity of learning it than I should. I should have thought, through your clerks, who are in and out of the offices and so on, you could learn what I have no means of learning.

54,957. (Miss Haldane.) I want to ask you whether you have any views about the age at which the third class clerks should be brought in?—I am afraid I have no experience that would answer the question. I do not know what they do.

54,958. We have had evidence that they might be brought in at the end of their secondary school career. Is that about your idea?—I do not think I can say anything of any value. I do not know what their work is, so I do not know at what age a man or boy would be competent for the work.

54,959. You were talking just now about getting the school record from his schoolmaster and so on, and that would imply that he had just left school?—I only gave that as an illustration. You want to get information from the person best able to tell you the personal characteristics of the individual.

54,960. I had in my mind whether anything such as we have in Scotland to a considerable extent, namely, a certificate on leaving school, which is not wholly an examination certificate, but a record certificate of how the boy has done right through his school career, plus an interview, might be a good system of admission?—I should think that would be very valuable indeed.

54,961. I quite see your view, and everybody's object is to get the best man; but the difficulty is that if you do not have competition, how you are to secure that best man?—I agree.

54,962. I suppose you would make the appointments known in a way that they are not known just now, whether by advertisement, or some other way?—Yes.

54,963. Then you would have probably an immense number of applications; but the difficulty is, when you do not have competition, to determine which is the best young man to bring in?—I do not want to abolish competitive examination, but I do not want competition to result in the first, second, or third man having the place. I should make my examination a very significant test, but only one of many tests, and I should endeavour to add to it, if I could, that which I could learn about the man apart from his capacity in an examination; but I agree that it is excessively difficult to do.

54,964. That is the practical difficulty one feels. We have discussed this a great deal on this Commission. These are the practical difficulties, and you have no particular views as to how to get over them, except to make the appointments known in a way that they are not publicly known at present, trusting to get the best men by a competitive examination plus interview?—That is my view.

54,965. (Sir John Kempe.) Your lordship has given us your general view as to the best way of recruiting the clerical part of the Service. You have not given us, as far as I can see, any reasons for not admitting, in the case of the Law Courts, the ordinary method that is employed in recruiting for the Civil Service, that is, by open competition. I do not know whether you recollect the state of the Civil Service generally before open competition was established, and the weaknesses which developed then. One was that you got into an office a staff which was very uneven; some men were very good, some men were very bad, and the result was you had great waste; you got more men in the office than you needed. There were a few good men but a great many more bad men. In the present system you get a very good general level. Is there anything in the legal work which occurs to you as being against adopting that system in the Law Courts?—Do you mean as regards the lower class?

54,966. The lower class only—the first, second, and third class clerks?—I think an examination is useful in every case.

54,967. Open competition?—Yes; but competition is generally understood to imply that when you have held your examination you are going to act on that alone?

54,968. Yes?—After I have held my examination I should regard my examination as a most valuable guide, but I should not say it was going to determine my appointment.

54,969. At the present time in the Civil Service it does not absolutely govern the appointment, because searching inquiry is made after the examination to see that they are the right men. Would not that satisfy you as being enough?—I do not see why the legal clerk is to be selected on a different principle to a commercial clerk or a Treasury clerk.

(Chairman.) But those inquiries are merely for the purpose of ascertaining that a man is of good character and in good health. It does not in any way discriminate or select a man lower on the list to be preferred to a man higher on the list; it merely rejects certain persons who do not come up to a sufficient standard of character or health.

54,970. (Sir John Kempe.) That is true; but you must have some way of selection, and the way of selection in the Civil Service is to get the man of most ability, provided otherwise qualified, and I do not see why it should not be the case in the legal departments. I have seen a good deal of the Civil Service departments and something of the legal departments, but not so much. It appears to me that the Civil Service work, on the whole, presents a greater variety, perhaps, than the legal departments. The work of the legal departments never rises above a certain level; a great deal is form, and it seems to me that it is just the kind of service which could be filled up by men of a general level. You can apply them to the work better if you have instruments even all through, just as the ships in a fleet have to be of the same standard in order to act properly. If you have all your men of the same quality you can apply them to the work much better than if you have a few good and a few bad men?—I should myself regard it as better than if they were all of even quality that some had shown themselves superior to others. I should try to have no inferiors, but I should be quite glad to get some superiors.

54,971. Is there much work in the department which requires very great superiority of work clerically?—I suppose the legal work, however humble it may be, requires some knowledge of the law, and that is skilled work.

The Right Hon. LORD WRENBURY.

54,972. Certainly; but not the same work as a barrister or an advocate has to do?—Not at all.

54,973. It is clerical work, after all?—It is largely clerical, I suppose; but I really know very little about the working of the offices; a judge sees nothing of it. I am not speaking from any personal knowledge at all.

54,974. All I wanted to get at, really, was whether you had any reason against the adoption of the Civil Service method. It appears that you have not considered that question much. You have no objection to the Civil Service system?—I suppose the object of the Civil Service system is to find the best man for the place, and, if so, I think it is perfection; but whether you get the best man for the place by saying, "I will examine you, and if you are first, second, third, or fourth, you will get a place, and if you are fifth you will not," is a thing which I doubt.

54,975. Because you attach more importance to the personal character than the intellectual character of the man?—I do not say more. I attribute importance to both, but I think you may get a man of considerable intellectual ability who may be useless to you—a shiftless, idle fellow, inaccurate, and not trustworthy. I would far rather have a more stupid man upon whom I could always rely to give me his best.

54,976. That is to say, you would judge of his character?—Yes.

54,977. There is one particular difficulty I see about retaining the third class and filling the higher posts from it. You would hardly ever get enough men in a lower class to put into the class above them if you limited yourself to promotion from the third class?—Nobody proposes to do so, I understand.

54,978. For that reason you propose to mix them?

Nobody proposes to confine themselves to any particular class. All that is suggested is that no man should be excluded from rising because he is in a particular class.

MR. W. J. BANNEHR, MR. H. F. BLAKE, MR. A. W. PORTER (Clerks in the Supreme Court Taxing Office), called and examined.

54,983. (Chairman.) (To Mr. Bannehr.) You are a first class clerk in the Taxing Office of the Supreme Court?—Yes.

54,984. How long have you served in the Taxing Office?—Since October 1878.

54,985. What had been your experience before that?—I was educated at St. Saviour's Grammar School, Southwark, and I had been in solicitors' offices from the age of 16 until 1878, when I was nearly 25 years of age. I had had rather a remarkable experience as a very young man, because the last office in which I was for five years was a small office, and my principal left all the working out of his practice practically to me, and I had to find out from books and reading and by the help of counsel what had to be done, and I did it. It was unusual, I believe, to leave responsible work to so young a man, but I had that responsible work and I did it. The appointment in 1878 was in the hands of the Lord Chancellor, but he had not at that time interfered with the old practice, under which the taxing masters appointed their own clerks, and Mr. Drew practically appointed me. I know that he made inquiries of many men, because he wrote me to that effect.

54,986. You were appointed in 1878. How many years did you serve before you were promoted to the first class?—I was appointed to the first class in 1894.

54,987. That is after 16 years?—Yes.

54,988. (To Mr. Blake.) You are a second class clerk in the Taxing Office?—Yes.

54,989. What was the date of your original appointment?—1891.

54,990. And you were promoted to the second class, in what year?—In 1899.

54,991. That is after rather more than eight years' service?—That is so.

54,992. Had you been in a solicitor's office before appointment?—I was at Cambridge University and was 54,979. That is the reason for your proposal for selection by committee or otherwise at any point in the career of the clerks and not confining yourself to promotion from grade to grade?—I do not think that is the reason for it. I think it is a matter which works in with what, it seems to me, best to do for the purpose of finding the best man.

54,980. (Chairman.) There is one point I should like to ask you in connection with the question of the Chancery registrars and the Chancery masters. The Chancery masters are organised in three groups attached to the three groups of judges. It was suggested by Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie that, if the registrars were combined with the masters, it would be necessary to fit them into the organisation and attach the registrars to the three groups. Mr. Registrar Farmer took objection to that, and said that he thought it would be a great mistake to attach particular registrars to particular groups, and that it would, for reasons which he did not very clearly explain, destroy the independence of the registrars. Do you consider that it would be necessary, if the two offices were thrown together, to adopt the group arrangement for the registrars also?—I do not think the group arrangement is necessary in any case. I think myself that, where you want to ensure uniformity of practice, it is desirable that everybody should be in touch with everybody else from time to time, not that a judge should be combined with a particular three or four masters to the exclusion of other six or eight masters, but that all should be in contact with each other from time to time, and that they should all rotate.

54,981. Then you would prefer to do away with the group system altogether, so far as the masters are concerned?—Yes.

54,982. If that was done, the objection, whatever its value, which was taken to dividing the registrars into groups would not apply, because they would not be grouped?—It would disappear.

an articulated clerk, and I am an admitted solicitor, but only had three years' articles.

54,993. During those three years you were in a solicitor's office?—Yes.

54,994. (To Mr. Porter.) You are a third class clerk in the same office?—Yes.

54,995. Had you been in a solicitor's office before appointment?—For over 10 years.

54,996. What was your age on appointment?—26.

54,997. And you have been in the office for how many years now?—Nearly 11 years. I might say I have prepared a table showing the previous qualifications of the whole of the staff in the Taxing Office, which, with your permission, I will hand in (handing in the same).

54,998. (To Mr. Bannehr.) The points which you wish to put before the Commission relate to the question of salary and the question of promotion?—Yes. The case that my colleagues have set up by their statement asks for three things: (1) for increase in salary; (2) for an increased speed of promotion; and (3), which includes the other two, is for restitution to the positions assigned to the clerks by the order made by the Lord Chancellor and Treasury in 1881. That order assigned to all the principal clerks in the Taxing Office the position of first class clerks, and to all the juniors in the Taxing Office the position of second class clerks. Their case is that they may be restored to that position.

54,999. We will deal with the question of promotion first. What are the points you wish to put before us on that subject?—Might I ask you to allow Mr. Porter to speak to that? He has prepared that part of the case.

55,000. (To Mr. Porter.) Will you speak on that point?—In connection with the slowness of promotion I have also prepared a short statistical statement which I thought might be useful (handing in the same).

55,001. Will you explain what you wish to put before us?—First of all, the point with regard to the staff of the Supreme Court Taxing Office, as distinct from other legal departments, is this: With regard to the appointments of third class clerks the masters have for some years past insisted that the candidates or persons elected to the post of a third class clerk, or the position of junior clerk, shall either be a solicitor's clerk of some years' experience or a solicitor. You will see from the table I have handed in that the staff as at present constituted consists of men who have had on an average 10 years' experience in a solicitor's office; and there are also, I think, five solicitors. Compared with other departments that qualification of previous experience is not required. If it be not considered improper to compare ours with the other departments I will take the Central Office. I do so only for the purpose of comparison, and not for the purpose of making any invidious distinction. In the Central Office the men are appointed, on an average, younger in years than the third class men in the Taxing Office. The reason for this is, that if you insist upon a man coming in with some years of previous experience he must be at least 26 or 27 years of age, and I think the average appointment to the Taxing Office is of that age.

55,002. A man comes in at 26, because he thinks it worth while to do so?—A man comes in to the Taxing Office with previous experience with two or three objects. One reason is the pension; another reason is that the hours are shorter than he has been used to in a solicitor's office; and the third reason is his hopes of promotion, and also the holidays are longer than one gets outside. Speaking from experience, the holidays outside in a solicitor's office were three weeks, which on an average is pretty general.

55,003. What holidays do you get in the Taxing Office?—When one is not on vacation duty, in which case you get no holiday at all, you have the whole of the Long Vacation practically, and the greater part of the other vacations. During the other vacations the Taxing Office is open on the days when the other offices are open with half the staff.

55,004. Those collateral advantages must be taken into account in considering the suitability of any scale of salaries?—I would add that on the average without exception a solicitor's clerk, when he does in fact come in, gives up salary. Taking myself as an instance, in my own case I gave up, I think, between 40% and 50% a year.

55,005. Which you recovered in four or five years?—Yes*; but also one would imagine that if I had remained outside I should also have received an increase there.

55,006. The slowness of promotion is the point you wish to represent. What do you wish to say about that?—Our department as compared with other departments is managed by 11 masters, each master having two clerks. The present standard of the staff is 4 first, 8 second, and 12 third. The peculiarity of the position is also noticed, inasmuch as the senior clerks are in two different grades; some of them are firsts and some seconds, so that the chance of promotion of the third class clerks to first class clerks is far more remote than that in the case of Chancery chambers, where they have twice as many firsts as seconds and thirds; that is to say, second and third class clerks in Chancery chambers have a double chance of promotion, as compared with the departments where there are only an equal number of seniors and juniors, which is rendered harder by the fact that some of the seniors are second and some first.

55,007. Have you compared the numbers also with the Central Office? The proportions there are very different from those in Chancery chambers?—Yes. In the Central Office they have 11 first, 28 second, and 28 third. There they have the same number of thirds as seconds, whereas we have not even 12 seconds.

55,008. In comparing it with Chancery chambers, the comparison might tell in both directions. It may be that the proportions of the higher classes are too large in Chancery chambers?—I am only mentioning the fact of its present constitution. Another point is this—I do not know whether I have explained myself clearly—that with regard to the number of the staff, the reason promotion is slower is the fact that there are not the three classes of work that exist in other departments; there are not the first, second, and third class clerks so far as the character of the work is concerned.

55,009. But there are as regards the scales of pay. You have the three classes of clerks?—But you have this position, that the senior clerks are made up of firsts and seconds, whereas in Chancery chambers the senior clerks are firsts, all of them. You have three grades of work there.

55,010. That is a question of the work, but so far as the scales of pay are concerned you have the three classes as in the other offices?—Quite so.

55,011. You are speaking of promotion not in relation to the work, but in relation to the scales of pay, I understand?—Yes.

55,012. As regards the scales of pay you have the three classes which they have in most of the other offices; but you represent that the proportion of the higher classes is smaller in your case than in the case of some of the other offices. Is that your point?—Yes, so far as it affects the question of promotion.

55,013. Now as to the actual rate of promotion, what is the length of service of the men at the top of the third class at present?—The highest man was appointed in 1900. He has been in the office 15 years.

55,014. The last promotion to the second class was of a man with 13 years' service?—Yes.

55,015. Have you compared that with some of the other offices?—Yes, I think if you take the Central Office, which is an office we are closely connected with, seeing that our work is both Chancery and Common Law, you will find that in the Central Office of the 28 thirds there is not one at his maximum. On the contrary, I think you will find that the senior third, from information I have just obtained from the office, is only getting 160% per annum, so that he has four years to go before he will have reached his maximum.

55,016. You mentioned the Chancery chambers. Have you compared the length of service of the clerks at the top of the third class in the Chancery chambers?—A little different position arises there before the question of comparison comes in. The Chancery chambers have at present in the third class a number of men who have applied to be transferred from the Chancery Registrars Department, which was, if I may call it so, a blind alley position. There is for the thirds in the Chancery Registrars Department no possible promotion, and many of them have applied to be and have been transferred to Chancery chambers as thirds. I think the first man not transferred from the Registrars Department in the list as it at present stands is a Mr. Cocks, who was appointed in 1901. Then you come to a Mr. Weston, appointed in 1903. Those men, I think, were appointed straightway from outside to a position in chambers. The other names—Mr. Bartholomew, and onwards—were of men transferred from the Chancery Registrars Department.

55,017. Those two gentlemen you mention have just about the same length of service as in the case of the last promotion to the second class in your office?—Yes.

55,018. Therefore the comparison appears not to be very unfavourable to you?—Except that the chances of promotion of those men to-day, excluding Mr. Cox—if you take the whole list of the 12 thirds—are better than in the case of the 12 thirds in the Taxing Office.

55,019. But as a matter of fact the men at the top of the class have about the same length of service?—There is that one I have mentioned.

55,020. Have you compared your department with the Probate Registry?—No, I confine myself to what we call the legal departments of the courts.

55,021. In the Probate Registry they have roughly the same classification as you?—Excepting that they have six principal clerks at 800% a year in addition to their five first class clerks at 600% which we have not at all.

* Yes, in the sense that I had in five years reached my original salary, but meanwhile I had lost in the first year 50%, in the second year 40%, and so on.—A. W. P.

5 May 1915.] Mr. W. J. BANNEHR, Mr. H. F. BLAKE, and Mr. A. W. PORTER.

55,022. What is the length of service of the men at the top of the third class in the Probate Registry?—The top man, in the list I have in my hand, entered the service 1st November 1894. I remember reading part of the evidence given, and I think it was said that 10 of those were old copying clerks, in whose case the question of promotion does not arise.

55,023. Yes, with certain of them the question of promotion does not arise; but looking down the list, taking the first 20 or so, they are all men with service dating back as far as 1902?—Yes, that includes the 10 I was referring to—the old copying clerks.

55,024. But it also includes men who are in the line of promotion?—Yes.

55,025. So that they are not much better off than you are as regards speed of promotion?—In the table I have prepared I have taken 15 years roughly as a fair test to cover people's maximum, and I worked that out, including the Probate Registry, though I have not those figures before me, but they have been checked.

55,026. It appears to come to this, that, as regards length of service, the man at the top of the third class in the Central Office is better off than you, but the other offices are not much better off?—We think chambers are better off, unless you treat the cases of men who have been transferred from the Chancery Registrars' Department as equivalent to having been appointed originally in that place where they now are.

55,027. Taking facts as they are now and leaving out the men transferred, the senior men in the third class not transferred have approximately the same service as the senior men in your third class?—I think, roughly, that is so.

55,028. As regards promotion from the second class, what is the length of service of the man at present at the top of the second class?—Twenty-five years. That is the length of the whole service. The senior second at present is Mr. Blake, who is here this morning, and his present service is 24 years, of which he has been over 15 years in the second class.

55,029. Do you wish to say something further on the point on which you have already touched, namely, the question of classification not corresponding with the work?—Mr. Bannehr will deal with that subject. (Mr. Bannehr.) I bring that in under the claim to restoration.

55,030. (To Mr. Porter.) Have you anything further to say on the question of the slowness of promotion?—I consider that inasmuch as the men in the Taxing Office are appointed with previous experience they get no reward for that experience, either in the shape of anything added to their service for the purpose of pension or otherwise, but, on the contrary, comparing it with the Central Office, they are really worse off than men without previous experience. That has been proved in several ways in the case of men who have applied to be transferred. We have four cases in mind of men who came into the Taxing Office, and after staying there a little while considered the chances of promotion so bad that they applied to be transferred. Those four men have all been promoted in other departments since they left the Taxing Office. One of them is an 800*l.* a year man; another is now acting as first class clerk in chambers; the third and the other have been second class clerks some time, and I can say that certainly if they had remained in the Taxing Office in the position in which they were appointed when they first entered the Service they would still be third class clerks. We feel that the taxing masters making the point that they will have men with previous experience, and seeing the class of work one has to deal with, where one is exercising discretion and dealing with items of allowances to solicitors in respect of work done, we often have, by the necessity of things, to fulfil the duties of the senior clerk.

55,031. Will you tell us a little more about that? What exactly is your work—I am speaking of you personally in the third class?—Seeing the questions which have been asked, I have prepared with regard to that a statement giving the normal work of the juniors in the Taxing Office, and giving an idea of what a day's work consists (handing in the same.)

55,032. In the statement which you have handed in you divide the work into clerical or general work in the first place, and more advanced work requiring special qualifications in the second place?—For the reason that I thought it would be obvious to anybody that there must be certain routine or clerical work in any department; but so far from our general work being routine or clerical, it is certainly, we contend, the opposite; and I think Master Baker when before you supported that contention.

55,033. Taking the clerical work. In the first place that consists of entering orders in the register, sending out notices, keeping the fee-books and indexing bills, putting them away, and generally doing the routine clerical work in connection with the bills that come in for taxation. Is that a fair description of it?—Yes, but not quite. There is one point, that every order that comes in has to be read to see the direction for taxation.

55,034. (Mr. Coward.) What order do you say has to be read? The order referring it to you?—Yes.

55,035. But then the order says it is referred to the taxing master to tax the costs?—Yes, but sometimes it is incomplete.

55,036. (Chairman.) Incomplete in what respect? Do you mean it is not signed, or something of that sort?—In the King's Bench cases very often the recital part of the order is not followed out in the operative part. In Chancery it does not arise, because the Chancery orders are settled by the registrars. In Chancery also a statement of the parties is lodged, and the interests of the parties have to be stated for the purpose of giving directions as to taxation. That is put in under the head of clerical and general work. I am not enlarging upon it but only mentioning it as a fact.

55,037. Each third class clerk is attached particularly to one taxing master?—Yes.

55,038. And he does the work you describe here with reference to the orders coming to that master?—Yes.

55,039. Those are about 600 cases in a year?—Yes.

55,040. Would that be an average of something like 2½ cases per working day?—I have not worked that out.

55,041. If there were 300 working days it would be two cases per working day. There are not 300 working days, because you have long holidays, and therefore I say it is something like 2½ cases?—Yes.

55,042. You mention also certain work of a more advanced kind requiring special qualifications. You say interviewing solicitors and clerks and advising on questions of law and practice. On what questions of law do you advise solicitors?—There may be a case come in with regard to an order where there are costs of the action and counter-claim, one party getting the costs of the action and another party getting the costs of the counter-claim. The person getting the costs of the counter-claim may want to know what sort of costs he should bring in under that heading. There are also questions arising on judgments in the King's Bench Division, especially where there are issues involved where a person is successful upon a particular issue, and has got the costs of that issue, and he wants to be told or to be advised as to the proper form which his bill should take. We are able, by reason of our experience and knowledge, to inform him of the cases upon the subject where the principles of law are settled upon that question. There are also in Chancery what are called one set cases, where the costs are taxed and the parties entitled to shares have encumbered their shares, and their mortgagees are before the Court also, and the Court orders taxation but only one set of costs. We are able to tell the solicitors very often the way that their bills should be brought in, so that only one set is before the master.

55,043. (Mr. Coward.) You are assuming that the solicitor knows very little about his work?—With respect, we find in our experience that solicitors come to us an enormous lot on the question of costs. It is surprising on the question of costs that although it is, perhaps, almost the back-bone of the profession, it is a question to which the solicitors in their own interests do not give that attention which one would expect.

5 May 1915.]

Mr. W. J. BANNEHR, Mr. H. F. BLAKE, and Mr. A. W. PORTER.

55,044. (Chairman.) Then in the case of a solicitor who wants advice or information on those points, is it always a third class clerk with whom he deals?—No. I happen myself to be the joint editor of what is called by Master Baker the standard work on the subject of taxation of costs and which is recognised by the profession as a standard work upon the subject. I am also joint editor of the “A B C Guide to Costs.” They do not only come to me, but they come to other of my colleagues in the third class.

55,045. Is it ordinarily part of the work of a third class clerk, or of a senior clerk, to advise solicitors on points of this kind?—I cannot say as to the work being ordinary work. They go to whoever they think they will. If it is a case in our own office, naturally they would go to the clerks in that office.

55,046. There is not any regular routine as to which clerk should deal with solicitors who come for information on some point?—No.

55,047. You mention also appointments with solicitors to dispose of queries not dealt with by the master or senior clerk. What is the nature of those queries?—The nature of the queries is very varied. I will just give an illustration of a small point dealt with in the statement with regard to the considerations that have to be gone into on the question of the allowance of a copy. It may seem rather simple, off-hand, as to the allowance of a copy of a document, but I have given in the statement a few questions that would have to be considered in the allowance of a copy. Is it an old copy; was it expressly made for the purpose charged? That is governed by authority. Sometimes persons get the costs of an application only or the costs of an appeal, and they use upon that application or appeal the documents that were copied for a previous application or part of the action. There is authority which says the mere fact that copies are used on the subsequent application in which they get costs does not entitle them to the costs of them; and that is a question to be considered on that point. Another point is, whether it was a carbon copy; that arises on a typewritten document. We have a lot of cases where the documents are typed, and we have to see if they are top copies, and if they are not all what are called “tops” or first copies, but are carbons, they are allowed at half the charge for the top copy. Another point is with regard to printed documents. Sometimes a document which is printed is charged for, and we have to decide whether it is a document for which the charge should be 4*d.* or 2*d.* per folio, or no charge at all. Sometimes you will find in the bill of costs a charge for a print of a charter-party, which perhaps they get from the client. No profit can be allowed for this.

55,048. Then with regard to the preparation of certificates of taxation. What is an ordinary certificate of taxation? Is an ordinary certificate a simple document?—Yes, simple.

55,049. In what cases are they complicated?—To illustrate that I have brought two with me (producing same.)

55,050. Are the complicated cases those in which numerous parties are concerned?—Yes, what is called a partition action, and where there are incumbered shares.

55,051. Are complicated certificates drawn by the third class clerks?—The practice varies. Those before you were drawn by a third class clerk, and that is why I produce them.

55,052. After being drawn by him are they revised by the taxing master?—Not as a rule. Invariably the clerk has an appointment with the parties before him to settle the certificate.

55,053. I see this one you have produced is initialled by the master?—Yes.

55,054. It comes before the master to be initialled?—Not generally. That case I have put before you is a very exceptional one, seeing the length of it, but that was drawn by a third class clerk and approved by the master. Of course, there may be questions arising on it on which they might see the master. I do not mean that they would not want to go to him; very often they would, especially in a case which is a “one-set” case.

55,055. Then these are settled with the solicitors representing the parties?—Yes.

55,056. When they attend for the purpose of settling it, is it with a third class clerk that they settle it?—Yes, if he has drawn the certificate, as was done in that particular case.

55,057. If the parties raised any objection would that come before the master?—Yes. The senior clerk first, if the third class clerk had drawn the certificate. If the senior had drawn the certificate they would go to the master.

55,058. I see a further item “Disallowance of costs of taxation as a penalty in certain cases.” Is that a matter that a third class clerk decides?—Yes.

55,059. Disallowance as a penalty?—Yes. There are certain cases under which there are certain penalties. One is if the order is not lodged in time; another is where the costs are payable out of a fund or estate or assets of a company; and another is where the bill is being taxed under the Solicitors Act of 1843. Those are statutory penalties.

55,060. Those are cases where there is not any question of discretion, but they are decided by rule or statute?—By statute and rule.

55,061. I presume there are no questions of discretion where disallowances are made by a third class clerk?—No, not of these statutory penalties*. There are cases where the master may certify specially why the statutory penalty would not follow. Those would be for the master.

55,062. It is a case in which the third class clerk would apply rules; he would not exercise discretion?—That is so.

55,063. You say, also, that you sometimes have to take work home?—Yes.

55,064. Does that often occur?—Yes. I should say recently, the work having dropped down a little, it is not done so often, but I have brought with me a summary of casting. In the Chancery matters the question of casting is bigger than in the Common Law. In Common Law the bills are not so long as in Chancery. I have brought with me, to show what is involved in checking, the summary of a bill of costs, the pages of which were 3,400. It would be absolutely impossible to check that bill during office hours.

55,065. Are you speaking of the casting?—Yes; it would be absolutely impossible to check that bill properly in office hours.

55,066. Why?—There are continual interruptions. We have to see to the costs that are before the master, and see the people who are to go before the master. The office, like other public offices, is a place where people are continually coming in and going out, and asking about this, that, and the other. As to the advisability of this checking being done quietly, I have a case in my mind where I was checking a bill that was cast accurately till I came right to the end, where there was a mistake of 100*l.* too much on the bill. Possibly, had that been done in the office with many interruptions, there would have been a risk that that might not have been noticed. Some of the masters have expressed themselves so strongly that I know they applied to Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie that there should be a special staff for checking the bills, and that they should be uninterrupted by anybody, seeing that the person who has the checking of the bill has the last word with regard to the amount that is to go into the certificate. The initials of the junior clerk at the end are accepted as showing the proper figure to be certified to be paid out of court or a fund or estate or by the opposite parties. When the costs are payable by one party to another the question is not so acute, because the parties sometimes agree the figures.

55,067. That is to say, as to the accuracy of casting?—Yes, and as regards the amount to be paid.

55,068. (Mr. Coward.) But nobody comes into your office after 4 o'clock?—No.

* The negative answer to this question solely relates to the disallowance of costs of taxation, arising from Q. 55,058. The third class clerks are continually exercising a discretion by the allowance and disallowance of items and on occasions tax.—A. W. P.

5 May 1915.] Mr. W. J. BANNEHR, Mr. H. F. BLAKE, and Mr. A. W. PORTER.

55,069. What would prevent you doing all this addition work, and everything else that had to be done, between 4 and 6 o'clock?—That is so done. That is just the point.

55,070. (Chairman.) You said you had to take work home?—Yes.

55,071. Why not do it in the office between 4 and 6 o'clock?—When I say, "We have to," that is done perfectly voluntarily.

55,072. (Mr. Coward.) After 4?—Yes.

55,073. That is what I am saying. That is what I am complaining about?—The official hours cease at 4. Solicitors do not expect to be given appointments after 4. The hours are fixed by the rule. 10 to 4 is not fixed by us.

55,074. (Chairman.) Your general representation is, that the work of the third class clerks is important?—Yes. There was another point I wanted to mention with regard to the third class, and that is the sitting master's clerk. That is the office in which every order is referred, and also the office where the short and urgent King's Bench taxations are dealt with by what is called a sitting master. That is a master allocated each week to take the short cases. They are taken in the mornings. That position was held prior to 1910 by a first class clerk, and it is now occupied by a third class clerk. The masters, as a fact, did pass a resolution that that position should be at least held by a second class clerk, but nothing has been done upon that resolution, and the work done by the clerk in the sitting master's office is most responsible work. In addition to the balloting and referring of the orders, he actually signs the certificates himself for all taxations done by the sitting master. Last year the amount certified was 30,000*l.* of costs, for which this clerk alone issues the allocators and has to go through all the bills before they go to the masters, and that, again, he does after 4 o'clock, to prepare the bills for the master for the next day's appointments. He also has to vouch and check all those bills before the allocators which he issues are signed.

55,075. Do you mean, by checking, the checking of the castings?—Yes, after taxation, and prepare, sign, and issue the allocator for the amount of the bill.

55,076. On the master's decision?—On the bill as dealt with by the master. The important point is that a third class clerk is in a position to certify costs which last year amounted to 30,000*l.* The staff feel that a position like that should be adequately rewarded. This clerk was a solicitor's clerk of 11 or 12 years' experience before entering the office, and he was transferred to the Sitting Master's Department as a third class clerk and has never been promoted.

55,077. Is there anything else you wish to say on the points you deal with?—There is another point I wanted to mention. Speaking as a married man with a family—apart from the war, to which I am not alluding—the really serious question has cropped up of the increased cost in one's living, and one has to fill a position in which one has to be above temptation and that sort of thing; and we feel, as men with previous experience and filling a position where previous experience is necessary, and as Master Baker spoke in very kind terms in reference to our ability, that we should be rewarded on a higher scale than that on which we are. In comparing ourselves with other departments we do not want it to be assumed that we are attacking them in any way, but merely referring to the work done by the staff, which any member of the profession or a managing clerk who has any experience in the Taxing Office would endorse.

55,078. (To Mr. Bannehr.) Do you propose to deal specially with the question of classification in relation to the nature of the work to be done?—If you please.

55,079. Will you explain what you wish to say on that?—I desire to claim for my colleagues that all the second class clerks should be straightway made firsts, and all the thirds should be straightway made seconds. In support of that claim I refer to the statement of the staff submitted to the Commission and the various inquiries made into the duties of the clerks in the Taxing Office set out in that statement, and particularly to the order of the Lord Chancellor and the Treasury of November 1881. By that order the Treasury and the Lord Chancellor found a third class clerk in many departments, but they found none in the Taxing Office.

55,079A. (Chairman.) They did not find them quite as third class clerks, but very junior clerks, men fitted to receive a small salary?—They appointed those in other offices as third class clerks; but they found no such clerks in the Taxing Office, and classified no such clerk in the Taxing Office as a third class clerk. They classified all the clerks in the Taxing Office as first and second.

55,080. What was the salary of the junior clerks before they were made second class clerks?—They advanced the salary a little of both clerks. The junior clerks' maximum salary in 1881 was 350*l.*, and that was advanced by the classification to a maximum of 400*l.* The maximum salary of the senior clerk in the Taxing Office in 1881 before the inquiry was 500*l.*, and by that classification order the maximum salary became 600*l.* I should like to refer you to that order, and particularly to Clause 5 of it, which says: "Upon the occurrence of a vacancy in any of the clerkships specified in the said schedule the staff of the office or department in which the vacancy occurs may be readjusted, and the numbers of the clerks therein reduced or their duties altered accordingly in such manner as the Treasury, with the concurrence of the Lord Chancellor, may determine." Now I know of no order of the Treasury or of the Lord Chancellor since 1881 which has affected that classification in any way whatever.

55,081. Do you contend that the Treasury and the Lord Chancellor have not power to alter the numbers in the different classes?—Power is reserved to them to do it by a joint order, by that very classification order, but they have not done it.

55,082. Your point is a technical one, that the alteration has been made without a formal order to sanction it?—That is my first point, but not my only point.

55,083. But that point is purely technical, is it not? The Treasury and the Lord Chancellor have full power to alter the classification and numbers, but you suggest that they have done that without the formal order which you think necessary to carry it out. It has been done?—I do not know whether they have done it. I do not know how it has been done.

(Mr. Coward.) It does not say in Clause 5 that there shall be any further order. They may do it.

55,084. (Chairman.) "As the Treasury with the concurrence of the Lord Chancellor may determine"?—That may be so. I do not press this point beyond this, that that Treasury order was the culmination of several inquiries as to the status of the clerks in the Taxing Office, and I thought you would look upon it as evidence that the officials who had inquired into the matter down to 1881 considered that the clerks in the Taxing Office should respectively be first and second class clerks.

55,085. Prima facie is it not evidence of this, that a certain organisation being created for the legal offices with a first, second, and third class, the existing clerks in the Taxing Office, from the level of the salaries they were actually receiving, had to be fitted into the first and the second class if they were fitted in at all, and could not be fitted into the third class because the salaries of the junior clerks rose to a maximum considerably above the maximum of the third class. It appears to me prima facie to suggest that that was done in order to fit the existing clerks into the organisation that was proposed for the legal offices, and it hardly appears to me to determine the point of whether that particular classification and those particular numbers in each class were considered to be the right arrangement in permanence?—There had been inquiries before the issue of this joint order of the Treasury and the Lord Chancellor, and the result of those inquiries was that the second class clerks were held to be entitled to a maximum salary of 350*l.* I submit this is prima facie evidence, that in 1881 the Lord Chancellor and the Treasury considered that the clerks in the Taxing Office should either be firsts or seconds.

5 May 1915.]

Mr. W. J. BANNEHR, Mr. H. F. BLAKE, and Mr. A. W. PORTER.

55,086. Even if that were so, and even if the Lord Chancellor and the Treasury have altered their opinion since, is it not within their power to do so?—I suppose it is, but I submit that it is unusual for a joint alteration of opinion to take place like that without any evidence of it. It has not been done in other departments. The classification which was set up by this order in Chancery chambers remains the same to-day as then. I would refer a little further to Clause 5, which refers to altered duties. I suggest that any alteration by the Treasury and the Lord Chancellor, whether made with or without an order, could only be made in the spirit of Clause 5 if the duties were altered.

55,087. Mr. Porter mentioned the case of the clerk to the sitting master, and said that those duties which were formerly classified as second class duties are now assigned to a third class clerk. Is not that an alteration?—(Mr. Porter.) That is not quite the position.

55,088. I thought you said those duties were formerly performed by the second class and are now assigned to the third class?—When that office was created in 1902, a first class clerk was transferred to the sitting master. He retired in 1910. It was always understood, I should say, that the Treasury considered that when he went the position should be held by a second class clerk, and in fact a second class was appointed.

55,089. That would be an alteration of the duties of each class within the conditions contemplated by this order?—The duties were not altered.

55,090. The duties of each class were altered. The duties which were formerly performed by a member of the first class were in future to be performed by a member of the second class. That is an alteration of duty?—The class was altered, but the duties remained exactly the same.

55,091. But the duties of a member of the second class were altered, because certain duties which were before performed by a member of the first class were given to a member of the second class?—Yes, but that was a new second class. (Mr. Bannehr.) The same duties were performed. The duties of the sitting master's clerk were not altered in any way. The third class clerk as sitting master's clerk to-day is doing exactly the same duties.

55,092. The phrase is "their duties altered"—that is the duties of the clerks. The duties of certain clerks were altered, if I understand you rightly?—No, the sitting master's clerk's duties have been the same since 1902, when the post was created, until to-day. The duties have not varied in any way at all.

55,093. No, but the duties of a second class clerk have been altered because a second class clerk performs duties now which he did not perform before?—(Mr. Porter.) The person appointed as second class clerk was promoted at that time. When the first class clerk retired a third was promoted to second to fill that place.

55,094. The point is that certain duties were transferred from the first to the second class, and you maintain that that is not within the phrase, "their duties altered"; is that your point?—(Mr. Bannehr.) I contend that the meaning of Clause 5 is, that the status of a clerk may be increased if his duties are increased, and the status of that clerk may be diminished if his duties are diminished, but that it is not within the spirit of that order to reduce his status if his duties remain the same.

55,095. I understand your point. Will you continue?—Of course, I understand that all this is within your purview, and you may agree or disagree with that order, and, therefore, I should like to show that the duties of the clerks in the Taxing Office have not been decreased in any way since 1881 but have been increased.

55,096. I do not think you need enlarge upon that point. I do not think that is material. The point which I understand you wish to bring before us is with reference especially to the senior clerks and the fact that the senior clerks are, while doing the same work, some first and some second class clerks. Will you explain your views on that point?—My view is that clerks who are doing the same work should receive the same pay. The principal clerk to some masters is a first class clerk, and the principal clerk to some masters is a second class clerk. They are all principal clerks. Their classification does not alter their duties or their work; it only varies their pay and pension. I submit that all the principal clerks should be first class clerks.

55,097. As regards the junior clerks, you suggest they should all be second class clerks?—That is my suggestion.

55,098. You suggest that there should be no third class clerks in the office at all?—Yes, I do not think it is an office suitable for third class clerks, unless the duties are varied in some way or other, but they never have been varied.

55,099. You or Mr. Porter told us that one reason why you hold that view is, that the men who are appointed to the Taxing Office have had legal experience before entering that office more than they have had in any of the other offices. That is a point which we have before us. Is there anything in the nature of the work which discriminates your office so completely from the other legal offices that you think you ought to have an entirely different organisation without any third class?—As the office is constituted I can only put it in this way: that the work of the junior clerks is important work; it has been held to be important work on many occasions; and the work generally is interwoven. I do not say that the Taxing Office could not be re-modelled altogether on different lines.

55,100. (Mr. Coward.) How?—I do not propose it. I hardly know. Certain work could be assigned to the principal clerks, certain work could be assigned to second class clerks, and certain work could be assigned to third class clerks, who then, I take it, would be doing clerical work only; but it is not for me exactly to say how the office should be organised. I do not propose it. I only say it could be re-modelled.

55,101. Would it result in a reduction of the personnel of the staff?—I do not think so. The work I consider is interwoven very considerably. Each official is helping the official above him. My suggestion respectfully is that the juniors should be second, and the seniors should be first class clerks.

55,102. (Chairman.) Is there anything further you wish to add on that point?—Upon that point I do not know that there is.

55,103. There is one point which I see mentioned several times in your statement which you submitted. You say that because the office is a small one, therefore promotion is slow. Is there any reason why, if the proportions of the classes were the same, promotion in a small office should be slower than in a large office?—I do not think there is any point in that.

55,104. Is there anything you wish to add?—There is one other point I should like to mention, if I may. I would refer to the enormous gap spoken of by Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie, between the senior clerks at 600*l.* a year and the masters at 1,500*l.* a year. I would respectfully suggest that something might very well be done in the way of delegation of certain taxations to the clerks, which I think could be made to the benefit of the public service; certainly it could be made to the benefit of the senior clerks. In making the suggestion, I would refer to the case of Mr. Corley. That goes back some years, to the time when Taxing Master Bloxam was a taxing master.

55,105. Who was Mr. Corley?—Mr. Bloxam's senior clerk. During the last few years of Taxing Master Bloxam's régime, his work was restricted mainly to lunacy taxations. Until then lunacy taxations had been sprinkled abroad among all the eight taxing masters, but by some arrangement between the masters for some few years before Taxing Master Bloxam retired he did them all. Then upon his retirement a chief clerk in the Lunacy Office, a Mr. Stewart, was appointed by the then Lord Chancellor to be taxing officer in Lunacy in Taxing Master Bloxam's stead. Mr. Stewart knew no more about the inside of a bill than he did of the outside, and he did not attempt to tax; he was taxing officer in name only. Mr. Corley, the principal clerk to Taxing Master Bloxam, taxed under Mr. Stewart, the nominal taxing officer. Mr. Stewart, I believe, only lived three months, and then Mr. Corley was appointed taxing officer in Lunacy, and he has been taxing officer ever since, at a salary of 700*l.* a year. That, I think, is an instance of how taxations might be delegated, or some of them, from the masters to the more experienced members of the staff. In support of that I would further say that there has always been a certain amount of taxation entrusted by the masters to their principal clerks. It depends upon the individuality of the masters. Some masters—one or two in my experience—have insisted on reading every item in every bill that they tax. Master Skirrow did, Master Ryland did, but it is quite within their own power. The masters were appointed with a clerk to assist them in their business originally. Those are the words of the Act appointing the taxing masters.

5 May 1915.] Mr. W. J. BANNEHR, Mr. H. F. BLAKE, and Mr. A. W. PORTER.

55,106. Your suggestion is that certain classes of taxation, I suppose of a simpler kind, might be delegated by the masters to a class of clerks who in consideration of that addition to their work should be given a scale of pay somewhat better than the scale of pay of the existing first class?—Yes, that is my suggestion.

55,107. Do you think it would be possible to draw a clear line between taxations which could be delegated in that way and taxations which must be done by the master himself?—I think so. To be a little more particular Mr. Scott, one of the editors of the principal book on costs, taxed a very large number of bills under Master Davidson for 16 or 17 years. I have taxed a great many bills under Master Shearme, and so has Mr. Box under Master Spofforth. Mr. Blake will speak for himself. Mr. Brett also has taxed, I don't know to what extent, under Master Holme. I think all those masters are perfectly justified in asking the assistance of their clerks to tax. If I were a taxing master I should consider it almost the life of a dog to be expected to be responsible for every item in all the bills that might come before me. This being done, I think, or at least I suggest, is a reason why certain work could or should be delegated, and I think it could be done to the benefit of the public service as I said, and certainly to our benefit. I would mention, for instance, two cases. In 1895 I taxed the cordite case Nobel v. Anderson. Of course, it was subject to appeal to my master, and the parties could go to him on any question they liked. The costs as brought in came to 17,000*l.*, and as certified they were 5,400*l.* odd. That was largely due to a question of principle. The parties did go to my master and said I was wrong. They did not complain of my details at all, but complained that the principle on which I taxed was wrong. The master supported me and they brought in objections, and I know that those objections were settled by counsel, but they did not proceed with those objections; they were content in the end with that taxation by me.

55,108. I think we need not go into cases. The Commission understand your suggestion. (To Mr. Blake.) Have you any point you wish to add to what has already been given in evidence?—No, except that my colleague has not said what I think I can say, that it is very much more difficult for a clerk to tax a bill of costs than it is for a master. The master is clothed with authority to tax the bill, and the clerk is sitting in the next room and people come before him and they have only to open the master's door and go before him. Therefore, it is much more difficult for the clerk.

55,109. The master carries more weight with the parties?—Undoubtedly. I am Master Baker's senior clerk and I do a great deal of taxation for Master Baker in the course of a year, and satisfy the solicitors.

55,110. The present arrangement is that the clerks are divided up between the masters; each master has a senior clerk and a junior clerk, and they are exclusively employed on work arising out of the bills which are assigned to that master?—Yes.

55,111. Is that system necessary, and is it desirable—I mean, is it preferable to a system under which the clerks would not be assigned to particular masters, but would do particular kinds of work. You will understand that a system of that kind where there is not the attachment of particular clerks to particular masters would give much greater flexibility as regards the classification of the clerks and the adaptation of the work they do to the particular scale of salary which they enjoy. What is your opinion on that point?—As the work is at present, I think the principal clerk should be attached to the master, because all sorts of things arise that the master wants to consult the clerk on, he has only to go into the next room to do it. He comes in and asks questions, or sends for me to ask questions, and if we were all over the place the work would be too much distributed.

55,112. It would mean, if the work was distributed, that the master would, instead of sending always for the same clerk, send for the clerk who was dealing with the particular case?—Yes.

55,113. Would any great inconvenience be caused by that difference of system?—No, I do not think so.

55,114. (To Mr. Porter.) What do you say?—I see no difficulty in that respect. In fact, having regard to the point you, sir, have mentioned, and which was mentioned by Mr. Bannehr, of the taxations done by the staff, taking six months, I know in one office half the taxations have been completely done by the senior clerk. Of course, the parties have the right to go to a master; that is quite understood; but as a fact they have not wanted to do that.

55,115. (Mr. Coward.) You say about half the cases?—Yes, half the cases have been done entirely by the senior clerk. Apropos of your observation about reorganising and having the clerks not attached to a master, I should have thought there would have been a great deal of saving, for this reason, that if you have, as you suggest, the staff as a body, and it is the recognised thing that the cases are dealt with in a certain way, the senior clerks taking such and such cases and the second class clerks the smaller cases with the right to all parties to appeal to a tribunal of masters, that, I think, would be a great saving. Perhaps it is hardly for me to suggest it, but as the observation fell from you it occurred to me that there would be a deal of saving.

55,116. (Chairman.) You think an organisation of that kind would work satisfactorily?—The proof of that is given in the case I have illustrated where a senior clerk has done about half the cases for six months with satisfaction to the profession; and if that is done as it were without official recognition, I see no difficulty arising by official recognition of the delegation of such duties.

55,117. (To Mr. Bannehr.) Do you agree?—I think I do. It is rather a difficult question to answer when one really has not considered how it could be worked, but I can conceive that such a system could be adopted with advantage. At the present time the normal duties of a principal clerk are to know all that a master knows practically, and in some cases a little more, because the master does not trouble about the minor scale fees and so on, but the principal clerk has to.

55,118. (Mr. Coward.) Is not the master's duty really confined to such questions as instructions for brief, whether or not two or three counsel shall be allowed for, and whether certain documents were properly copied and delivered to counsel? Is not that the kind of thing the master would deal with?—The masters have different methods. I have pointed out that there are masters who in the past insisted upon reading every bill and every item.

55,119. Are they there now?—No.

55,120. Then we need not deal with them?—No. If I may refer to Master Holme, I do not know except by hearsay, but I understand that his principal clerk reads the bill if it is a King's Bench bill, but does not leave more upon it than you, sir, say, that is instructions for brief, the materiality of certain documents with the brief, which sometimes is a very troublesome question, and the question of the amount of fees to witnesses; but when he reads a bill of costs which are payable out of a trust fund, or an estate, or a fund in court, his principal clerk will exercise a discretion upon all the letters and attendances throughout the bill, and he will reserve the major questions, such as journeys and other things, which I can hardly describe, which become questions of principle, to the master. My master, who is the son of the Master Bloxam whom I mentioned some little time back, and the only Master Bloxam to-day, leans on me, and unless the parties quarrel with what I have done—of course, sometimes they do—he looks upon my taxation of letters and attendances as final; but I understand that Master Holme thinks it his duty to re-read that which his principal clerk has already read.

55,121. (Chairman.) In fact there are considerable differences between the practices of the different masters?—Yes. (Mr. Blake.) I may say that in seven cases out of ten that I take for Master Baker I satisfy the solicitors and they do not wish to see the master at all. (Mr. Porter.) With regard to the items mentioned, “Instructions for brief,” counsel’s fees and witnesses—

55,122. (Mr. Coward.) And documents, I said?—Take the illustration of commercial cases. In the office where I am we do the whole of the commercial cases. I go through these bills before they go to the master. The parties very often see the bills before the appointment, and I have known cases where they have gone into the master and actually done what you have just suggested and said, “We are only before you on ‘instructions for brief’ and witnesses.” That just illustrates the observation made, and, as a fact, it has happened in many commercial cases.

55,123. (Sir John Kempe.) All the masters do practically the same class of work?—Yes, the taxations are distributed over 11 masters. They are balloted for.

55,124. Therefore the system Mr. Bannehr thought might be possible—of having the duties divided into first, second, and third class—could not be carried out without having three classes to each master, unless the Chairman’s suggestion for “pooling” was carried out?—Unless there was a sort of tribunal of appeal of the masters.

55,125. Now, there is no reason for having a first class clerk under one master and a second under another master?—No, they are doing the same responsible work in each case.

Sir PHILIP GREGORY, called and examined.

55,126. (Chairman.) You appear on behalf of the Bar Council?—Yes, as representing the views of the Bar on the subject of the Land Registry.

55,127. You are yourself a barrister?—Yes.

55,128. In which direction does your practice lie?—In conveyancing. For the last 17 years it has been exclusively conveyancing. I may mention, as you ask the question, that I am one of the Conveyancing Counsel to the Court.

55,129. You have had some experience of the work of the Land Registry?—I have had a fair amount of experience of it professionally, probably as much as, if not more than, anybody else; but, of course, as a Commissioner on the Royal Commission of the Land Transfer Acts I had an opportunity of inquiring very carefully into the system. I may also mention that I am the representative of the Bar on the Rule Committee under the Land Transfer Acts, being one of those who advise and assist the Lord Chancellor in making the rules. I have been on that for a good many years.

55,130. The most important work of the Land Registry refers to the registration of title?—Yes.

55,131. Would it be correct to say that ultimately, if that system of registration extends, the whole of the registration of titles of the country will be centred in the Land Registry?—Yes, it will be centred in the Land Registry with district registries to assist. That is contemplated, if I remember rightly, by the Land Transfer Act, 1875.

55,132. Such district registries would, I suppose, be under the general control and supervision of the Central Registry?—Exactly.*

55,133. Will you give us your views as to the qualifications which are necessary for the registrar himself?—The work of the registrar requires: (1) A first-rate knowledge and experience of the complicated system of English Real Property Law, not only for the purpose of conducting the business relating to land when registered, but more particularly for the purpose of dealing with the grant or refusal of absolute title; (2) Skill in dealing with questions of construction, constantly arising on numerous Acts and rules (at present very complicated) under which the office works; (3) Skill in drafting new rules and forms as exigencies require. These are qualifications which are acquired to a greater extent in and by the training and experience of a barrister, than in and by that of a solicitor; and a registrar without the requisite technical knowledge and skill would be unequal to the duties of his office, however great his knowledge of, and capacity for, conducting the business of a solicitor’s office. The registrar should be a lawyer whose opinion on, say, the intricacies of real property settlements, or of the Settled Land Acts, would have weight in the profession. A registrar who has had sufficient experience at the Bar does not require to resort to external advice from counsel, unless the matters involved would occupy more of his time than so highly placed an official can give to their consideration, and in the rare cases where he does so resort, he ought to be fully competent to criticise the opinion of the counsel consulted. The registrar has not only administrative duties, but also certain judicial functions in relation to awards of compensation to persons suffering loss by reason of operations on the register of title which are incapable of rectification. Also the system throws on him numerous duties which are quasi-judicial. Consequently, the registrar should have had some sufficient training at the Bar to fit him for the discharge of these functions and duties. It is therefore submitted that the qualification of 10 years’ standing at the Bar should not be reduced.

55,134. Your conclusion is that it is necessary to maintain the qualification of 10 years’ standing at the Bar for the registrar himself?—Certainly.

55,135. The appointment rests with the Lord Chancellor?—It does.

55,136. Is it your opinion that that should continue to be the method of appointment?—Yes. I certainly hope that nothing will be done to take that away from the Lord Chancellor.

55,137. The suggestion has been made to the Commission by several witnesses that in all legal appointments the Lord Chancellor, if he is the appointing authority, should be assisted by a committee which would report upon the qualifications of the candidates, and that the Lord Chancellor should make the appointment after considering their report. What is your opinion as to that suggestion?—I can see no objection to the Lord Chancellor having any advice or assistance that may be given him; but I should hope that the appointment would really be in his hands, for this reason in particular, that of course he is the person who, as matters stand, is responsible for the administration of the registry, or rather it is not expressly placed under the administrative control of the Lord Chancellor, but it is in practice subject to his supervision. Certainly I think the Bar have complete confidence in the Lord Chancellor making these appointments in a perfectly proper manner. As regards advice and assistance, what you suggest seems to me to be analogous to what we have under the Land Transfer Acts with regard to the making of rules. There the Lord Chancellor makes the rules with the advice and assistance—using the exact words, I think, of the Act—of a committee which is appointed in various ways. There is a judge and a representative of the Bar, a representative of the solicitors, the registrar, and a representative of the Board of Agriculture. But we do not make the rules; the Lord Chancellor makes the rules. It is his responsibility in the end, and he is not bound to follow the advice or assistance that is given to him; so what you suggest is very analogous.

55,138. The suggestion would apply, not only to the appointment of the registrar himself, but to the appointment of all his staff. The Lord Chancellor is the appointing authority for them also, and it is obvious that, for appointments of that kind, a man who is as busy as the Lord Chancellor cannot give personal attention to the detail of the matter. It is suggested, therefore, that a committee to scrutinise the qualifications of applicants might be of great use in obtaining the best appointments to all those posts throughout the office?—Yes. I do not know how the Lord Chancellor dispenses his patronage at present; but the observation I should like to make on that is, that I do hope that the appointments of the registrar and assistant registrars will be retained entirely in the hands of the Lord Chancellor, so that he will give the personal attention to the appointments which he probably has done up to the present time. That is the more important with regard to the assistant registrars, because if the system is extended there will have to be a very much increased number of assistant registrars, and the district registrars will probably be on the same footing as the assistant registrars.* It would be not only the head man, but those of the next important grade, which I certainly hope would be retained exclusively in the Lord Chancellor's hands as regards appointment.

* See Sec. 121 of the Land Transfer Act, 1875.—P. G.

SIR PHILIP GREGORY.

55,139. Are any professional qualifications required in the case of assistant registrars?—They must be barristers, solicitors, or certificated conveyancers of not less than five years' standing. The certificated conveyancer hardly exists now, if he exists at all. All the conveyancing business not done by solicitors is done by barristers.

55,140. You would maintain that qualification as it stands?—Certainly.

55,141. Do you suggest that it would be advantageous to have one solicitor among the assistant registrars?—That, I think, is probably advantageous. Of course, I speak without a knowledge of the inner working of the office, but from what I know of the business I think it would be to the advantage of the office for consultative purposes that in this grade there should be an official having the training of a solicitor. I feel sure that there must be occasions on which it must be very desirable for the registrar, who was only trained as a barrister, to refer to someone who has a knowledge of how a solicitor's business is concerned. We all, in our conveyancing business, are indebted to our professional clients for a great deal of help in the actual working of conveyancing business. We do the technical part, and they do the business part; some of them, indeed, are good at the technical part. At all events, I should think the registrar would be very glad to have a solicitor to refer to on occasions.

55,142. For the rest of the clerical staff, do you consider that professional qualifications are necessary or desirable?—They are not necessary now, but many of the clerks, I understand, have the professional qualifications; that is to say, some of them are barristers; but I am not sure if there is any solicitor amongst them. It has been clearly recognised that, for the working of the office, it is desirable to have some professional qualifications for some of the clerks.

55,143. It was represented to us by some of the first class clerks in the Land Registry that their work was really the work of an assistant registrar, and they claimed that their position ought to be improved, both in title and as regards salary, in order to correspond to that fact. I do not know whether you are sufficiently acquainted with the arrangements of the office to express an opinion on that claim?—No. I cannot express any useful independent opinion upon it. I have an idea that that has found favour with some people, but I know nothing about it, really.

55,144. They told us that in many cases the decision on registrations of absolute title rested with the first class clerks, and they claimed that that was work which might be expected of an assistant registrar but not of a first class clerk?—Exactly. If they have to decide about absolute title, then, from every point of view, they ought to have sufficient legal qualification, because that is just where the qualification is useful, both with regard to the public who are dealing with the registry, and with regard to the question of the Indemnity Fund. It seems to me that the man who has to decide upon whether an absolute title should be granted or not, ought to have the qualification of an assistant registrar, and if he is doing the work of an assistant registrar it seems only fair that he should be given some rank and pay that corresponds to it.

55,145. It was also suggested by some of the witnesses that the work done by the clerical staff can be divided into two parts—work of a more or less routine clerical nature, which is done by the clerks in the junior classes, and work of a really professional character, dealing with examination of title or absolute title, which is done by the higher classes—and they suggested that there should be two grades, the lower grade recruited separately for the clerical work, and the higher grade recruited separately from men with professional qualifications. Are you prepared to express an opinion on that suggestion?—Of course, I am an outsider in the matter of the working either of an office or a Government department, but I should imagine that that was a very sound way of looking at it.

55,146. Have you formed an opinion, from your experience of the office, as to the manner in which the work is performed by the clerical staff generally?—I have had nothing before me, either at the Commission or in my practice, to make me say that it is not done well. As far as I have to do with it, I think the work is quite well done. I do not know whether you are speaking of the work of the registrar and the assistant registrars. I cannot speak too highly of that, if I may venture to say so.

55,147. If the work of the staff generally had been defective in any way, that, no doubt, would have come before you at the Commission on the Land Transfer Acts?—I think it certainly would. Of course, there were questions raised as to whether certain things ought or ought not to have been done—particular cases which involved complaints of the system more than anything else—but I do not remember any complaint about the inefficiency of an official.

55,148. (Mr. Coward.) Probably you would not have had any complaint. I was trying to think how you could have a complaint?—I think it must be so. We could not have had a complaint. Inquiry was directed into the system, but, of course, in order to make good their objections to the system, those who were against it had to show where the system had failed.

55,149. It would have been very gross neglect, if there had been any neglect, that could have been brought before you?—Yes. There were certain cases of failure to note certain things on the register, but they did not come to much, in my recollection. I have not studied the evidence again with a view to this inquiry, but that is the impression left on my mind.

55,150. (Chairman.) The general impression on your mind is that the work is well done?—Yes.

55,151. Then, speaking generally, you do not suggest any modifications in the present arrangements of the office or its organisation?—No, certainly not. All I hope is, as I said, that we shall have things maintained as regards the appointments and the qualifications as they are now.

55,152. (Mr. Boutwood.) In speaking of the qualifications required for the registrar, you said these qualifications are better acquired by a barrister than by a solicitor. Would you mind enlightening my ignorance by developing that a little?—The solicitor's business, as a rule, does not take him into the mysteries of real property law anything like so deeply as a conveyancing expert goes into it. It is the difference between the general practitioner and the specialist. The amount of skill and learning required by the conveyancing barrister in his own department is generally greater than that of a solicitor; otherwise our branch of the Bar would hardly be required. Perhaps you do not understand that the conveyancing branch of the Bar are pure specialists who, as a rule, do not go into court; some do, but there are a certain number who do not go into court. The work of conveyancing is done by the Chancery Bar, who have given themselves to this particular branch, sometimes in conjunction with court

* The qualification of a district registrar is being a barrister or solicitor or certificated conveyancer of not less than 10 years' standing; and an assistant district registrar must be a barrister, solicitor, or certificated conveyancer of not less than 5 years' standing. work, sometimes without; but it is all studied and carried out as an expert branch. We have no privilege as in court; a conveyancer has no privilege in doing any particular work, and he is only appealed to because the solicitors require the advice of an expert.

55,153. (Mr. Coward.) You suggest that the qualification should be allowed to remain?—Yes.

55,154. Without alteration?—Without alteration.

55,155. So that the solicitor would still be available for appointment if he were a proper man?—As assistant registrar, yes.

55,156. The fact is, as you said just now, that the men of the Conveyancing Bar devote themselves exclusively to that work?—Yes; but you must remember that as conveyancing business has contracted during the last few years, for reasons that you are as well acquainted with as I am, the number of men who are pure conveyancers, and therefore exclusively practising as conveyancers without going into court, is getting a great deal less than it was some years ago. Therefore, I do not wish it to be understood that the conveyancing expert is a person who never goes into court, because some of the ablest real property lawyers of the day have gone into court, and one in particular still goes into court. A judge, who recently was appointed, was probably one of the ablest real property lawyers of the day, and his business was chiefly in court. Vice-Chancellor Hall, you will remember, went into court even when he was conveyancing counsel to the Court. But it is a special expert branch of the law.

55,157. The only thing I should like to say upon that qualification of five years' experience at the Bar is, that the probability is that a barrister of five years' experience would not have half the experience that a solicitor in a good office would have after he had served his articles, would he?—I should not like to say that.

55,158. Not as a rule. He might devil for somebody, and then, of course, he would have experience; but five years, if he were doing his own work, would be very little or nothing?—I agree as to his own work; but, of course, the devilling for the other man, and the continuing on as pupil, which is what generally happens, gives the man experience.

55,159. He would continue on as devil, paid or unpaid?—Yes; and all the time he is acquiring the habit of mind with which the conveyancing counsel approaches matters, and he gets more and more familiar with abstruse matters like the Settled Land Acts, settlements, &c.

55,160. I think you will agree that there are men in my branch of the profession who are very skilful conveyancers?—Quite true. I have come across, to my great satisfaction, many in my time, but they are rather rare, and I generally find that they have read in the chambers of a conveyancing counsel.

55,161. (Sir John Kempe.) You say in your précis that, besides the Land Registry, "The only other business connected with land is conducted by the Board of Agriculture and Fisheries." When Sir Charles Fortescue-Brickdale was here, he said he thought that there was a good deal of overlapping by several departments; he thought the Valuation Department of the Inland Revenue overlapped, and also the Board of Agriculture. Do you know the Valuation Department of the Inland Revenue?—That is a new department, and I have not had any experience of that. It does not come into the conveyancing part of it. Perhaps I ought to have said, "the only other business connected with the conveyancing of land."

55,162. Then you could not speak as to the possibility he suggested of these different departments being some day more or less co-ordinated. Would it be possible for the Land Registry to undertake any valuation until the whole of the land had been surveyed and registered all over the kingdom, because it would be a serious thing for taxation purposes to have only bits of the country surveyed and registered?—I do not know what the Valuation Department are doing about that. It would require the combination of the Valuation Department, as it stands and as it works, with the Land Registry as it works. I apprehend that what was suggested was that the two departments should be worked together.

55,163. Yes, more or less in connection?—There is a great advantage in that, probably, but I have not carefully thought over the point. I am aware that in Italy they are able to have what appeared to me to be a very excellent registration system, because they combine the fiscal side of it with the legal side, and that enables the expense of the registration to be partly taken over by the State. When I investigated all that—which I had the advantage of doing some few years ago—it struck me that there might be advantages in saving the landowners the great expense of the whole registration system, if in some way it were thought worth while that the State should take it over, as they would get a benefit from the system for taxation. But I am not sufficient of an expert in Government departments to be able to suggest how that would really work, or whether the Land Registry would not be entirely overdone if they had to take over another department. I am only a theorist on that.

55,164. In fact, the whole system of land registry would have to be made compulsory all over the kingdom. It could only be worked in that way?—That would make it complete, but I do not know why it is necessary that there should be registration before you have valuation, because they are doing that now.

55,165. But there might be only one set of surveys instead of two sets of people doing the survey. That was Sir Charles Fortescue-Brickdale's idea?—That you must register the whole land of the country first before you tacked on another department.

55,166. The only use of the Land Registry to land valuation would be that it keeps a complete register of the whole of the land which could be referred to by the Land Valuation Department?—That would be in considering whether it would be an advantage to the State generally to tack it on.

55,167. (Chairman.) Is not the point this: There is a distinction between the registration and cataloguing of land and the registration of title. You might have a department which was charged with the mapping and registering of the actual facts as regards the land without making it compulsory that the owners of that land should register their title?—Exactly.

55,168. If you had a system of that kind it would serve as the framework for such registration of title as might be effected, and also serve as the framework for valuation for fiscal purposes?—Exactly.

55,169. Therefore you could combine the two without necessarily making registration compulsory?—Precisely. In that way you would have the country mapped out, so that as regards certain portions of it the map should indicate the ownership so as to be binding, and as regards the rest it should not do so.

55,170. (Sir John Kempe.) It is merely making a map of the whole country, dividing it up into holdings without registration necessarily?—But when you come to valuation you have to take the extent of holdings, and that leads you to the ownership.

55,171. It is rather a complicated system, and therefore you could not combine it?—No, I do not recommend that. I only point out the advantages which occurred to me when I was looking into it in Italy. If the two systems could be combined, then the great bugbear of registration of title, that is to say, the expense, would be very materially reduced to the landowner.

55,172. As to recruiting the technical part of the office, you would not consider, I suppose, open competition for that purpose?—No, I should deprecate that very much indeed. I am more of a believer in legal examinations than are a good many of my friends, but I should be sorry to have them treated as a guide or a test for these appointments.

55,173. In the Patent Office there is open competition, and the knowledge required there is very technical, and that office has been very successful?—I do not know anything about that.

55,174. The work there is highly technical, though no doubt it does not require so much legal knowledge?—Yes; but with regard to dealing with conveyancing, the man who is really good must know his law extremely well, but that is not enough; he has also got to learn how to apply it. I have known many men who are profound lawyers who have not risen to what might otherwise be their proper place in the profession, because they have not got, as far as one can see, the power of applying their great knowledge. Several people I know without great knowledge, but by a happy faculty of being able to apply what they do know, they have attained good positions in the profession. Therefore it would not be merely enough for a candidate to pass the examination well or better than another, unless you had some means of finding out that the first man in the examination was also the most practical.

Sir PHILIP GREGORY.

55,175. (Chairman.) With reference to the question of the qualifications for the different posts, at present the staff of the office generally, apart from the registrar and assistant registrars, are recruited without necessarily having any professional qualification. Some of them have it and some have not. Their work after they enter the office is largely concerned with questions of title, and as they move up the office, increasingly so concerned. Would it not be the case that, after a man has been 20 or 30 years in the office, if he is a capable man, he would have become an expert in questions of title?—A man who was not a barrister or solicitor?

55,176. A man who might be a barrister or solicitor, but who had not had any long experience as barrister or solicitor before entering the office?—Yes, of course he would become very experienced in the particular kinds of work that had come before him, but he would never have attempted to draft any deed, or any will, or any difficult agreement, and there are a good many other things which I might enumerate, with which he would never have to do, which would make a great deal of difference in the development of the conveyancing lawyer. Exactly as a mathematician, if he reads his books, acquires a certain kind of knowledge, but it is the problem, or the rider as we call it at Cambridge, which ultimately develops the good mathematician. I think it may be said as regards our work that it is the work of drafting which brings out all the problems which ultimately develop a man most. A clerk in the office would never have to do that. His drafting would be confined to the forms, and so on, that are used in the office, and he would not have to draw difficult deeds but would only be a critic of them. I think he would not become so good as a man who has had outside experience.

55,177. But his work for many years would have been the examination of such deeds and the drawing of proper inferences from them?—Yes.

55,178. Leaving aside for a moment the office of registrar and taking two men who are in the grade below that of assistant registrar, let us suppose that one of them entered the office with five years' experience at the Bar, and that the other entered the office without experience at the Bar, and that both of them have been 20 or 30 years in the office. Could you say that the former would have such an advantage over the latter that he ought to be eligible for the post of assistant registrar and the other not? My point is, whether the 20 or 30 years' experience in the office in scrutinising titles would not be far more important as a qualification for appointment to the post of assistant registrar than the five years' experience which he had had at the Bar before entering the office?—I think there may be exceptions. There may be men who, without the legal training at all, may become qualified in the way you have described; but the greater chance is that the other one who has had the qualification and who has acquired the attitude of mind of the Bar would be the most likely to turn out well.

55,179. (Mr. Coward.) He would have acquired the principles of law too, which he otherwise would never get?—Exactly. He would never have passed the examinations. We know how good the examinations for the solicitors' branch are. Our examinations have gradually become very much better than they were some years ago—more difficult and better organised—and I hope that they will become better as time goes on. The use of an examination for legal purposes is this: it forces the man who is going in for it to read systematically and methodically rather than pick up his knowledge in the way that I did; I was not forced to go in for examination, and, having had enough of examinations, avoided them, and I picked up my knowledge merely from cases. I never could read systematically books in the way that I should have read them if I had been going in for an examination. I have been convinced, from long experience of most intelligent and distinguished pupils whom I may say I have had, that the examinations do an immense lot for a man by forcing him to read systematically through a subject and get it up, and probably it is retained very well; but that which is picked up here and there, just when a point arises, is not the best form of legal knowledge. That is my opinion.

(Mr. Coward.) I am very glad to hear you say so, because it entirely agrees with my own experience.

55,180. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) It happens in other Government departments from time to time that an able young official during his official life, in the Colonial Office and elsewhere, sits for the Bar examination, and is called?—Yes.

55,181. He thereby gets a body of organised and arranged knowledge which is very useful for him in his later work, and he can do official work in the office on legal points. Do you see any objection to something of that kind happening in the Land Registry, that, if we succeed in getting a body of very able officials, they should be encouraged in some cases to qualify themselves by going through a training for the legal examinations, and passing them?—As the regulations stand at present the Land Registry clerks can be admitted as students and called to the Bar, and I understand that some of them have certainly been called to the Bar while there, so they have that opportunity. "Encouragement" suggests to me, of course, a rise of salary—that you raise a man's salary because he becomes a barrister.

55,182. It may be that you would give him a rather easy time for a few months when he is finally cramming up, or arrange his leave, and so forth, or otherwise by way of encouragement than by an increase of salary?—Exactly, I think it would be an extremely good thing. I should be glad if all the clerks, certainly all those who have the difficult matters of absolute title to deal with, had the best qualifications that could be obtained in the way of examinations.

55,183. Were the regulations you refer to regulations of the four Inns of Court?—Yes, the consolidated regulations of the four Inns of Court.

55,184. The officials in certain legal departments are not permitted to sit for those examinations?—That is true.

55,185. Could you say roughly what those departments are? For instance, is it the case that in the Central Office of the High Court the clerks are allowed to sit for the examination?—My impression is that there is a special provision against it—"officer or clerk in any Court of Justice" is one of the prohibitions. A person being an officer or clerk in any Court of Justice cannot be admitted as a student.

55,186. And also no person holding any appointment or performing duties analogous to those of such a clerk?—Yes.

55,187. And it is not held that the duties of the clerks in the Land Registry are analogous to the duties of any officer in a Court of Justice?—I understand from inquiry that I made on purpose, that it has been decided by the Joint Committee, with whom rests the whole of this administration, that a clerk in the Land Registry is not prohibited from becoming a student or a barrister. That is as it stands at present.

55,188. Do you know what is the ratio decidendi of that. What is the reason why one office is included and another is excluded?—I think I must ask to be excused going fully into that, because I am not a member of the Joint Committee, and these matters only come before me from time to time when there is a particular point to be decided.

Mr. W. S. TRATMAN and Mr. G. PLEASS (Mapping Staff, Land Registry), called and examined.

55,189. (Chairman.) (To Mr. Tratman.) What is your position in the Land Registry?—I am a superintendent surveyor, with the added position of examiner, for which I have received an allowance of 50*l.* per annum above my class pay for the last 15 years.

55,190. Did you enter the Land Registry under the circular of 17th August 1898?—I was in the Land Registry three years before the officials from the Ordnance Survey were transferred to the Land Registry, but I believe I come under that circular.

55,191. You had served in the Ordnance Survey before entering the Land Registry?—Yes.

55,192. (To Mr. Pleass.) You are a member of the staff of the Survey and Map Department of the Land Registry?—That is so.

55,193. You entered that office from the Ordnance Survey?—Yes.

55,194. At what date was that?—In November, 1898.

55,195. You wish to put before the Commission your reasons for claiming that you and others in the same position as yourself should be made pensionable?—Yes.

55,196. You entered the Land Registry in response to a circular from the head of the Ordnance Survey, dated 17th August 1898?—That is so.

55,197. Do you base your claim to be made pensionable partly on the terms of that circular?—We do.

55,198. That circular contains the following paragraph: "Employment on the Land Registry will be for five years certain, with probable permanent extension"?—Yes.

55,199. Do you claim that those words "with probable permanent extension" implied that after the first period of five years persons transferred to the Land Registry under this circular would become permanent, and also pensionable?—Yes, that was the idea generally conveyed, that after a probationary period of five years we should be placed on the establishment.

55,200. Is not that paragraph preceded by these words: "Employment on the Land Registry will not be pensionable, but men already possessing any pensionable rights will, it is believed, not forfeit them"?—That is so; but that was very essential, inasmuch as land registration was really on trial for five years. (Mr. Tratman.) Yes, it was a probation period.

55,201. Surely those words "Employment on the Land Registry will not be pensionable" are perfectly general and explicit. It does not say that the first five years' employment only would not be pensionable?—(Mr. Pleass.) No, but we were clearly given to understand so; at least that was the idea conveyed. As a matter of fact, I had an interview with Colonel Washington before I accepted this post, and he conveyed that idea to me, that after a probationary period of five years I should be placed on the establishment.

55,202. But that hardly appears to be consistent with the terms of the circular?—We thought that they were necessary as possibly registration would not be a success in the County of London.

55,203. Surely if you had before you an explicit statement that employment on the Land Registry would not be pensionable, you can hardly claim that there was any expectation of being made pensionable unless there was some equally explicit statement superseding that?—Apart from that, I think we have a great claim after the number of years' continuous service we have served.

55,204. That is another matter. Is that the main ground on which you put your claim, that your service has in fact been permanent and long continued, and that the nature of the work is such that you think the post ought to be made pensionable. Is that the main ground of your claim?—Yes, that our duties are of a permanent nature now.

55,205. You entered the department in 1898?—Yes, in November 1898.

55,206. So that you have now served for nearly 17 years?—Yes.

55,207. Have all the men who entered at the same time under that circular remained also up to the present time?—They are all in the department with the exception of a few. Mr. Hanrahan was pronounced medically unfit in January 1904; Mr. Egan has since died; Mr. Fraser, who came with a pension, retired on a pension; Mr. Baterden, also transferred, died on the 16th August 1908; Mr. Hanson resigned to take up a better appointment in the Malay Settlements. There are also Mr. Tratman and Mr. Whitton, who are both superintendent surveyors, and Mr. Nightingale, a surveyor in the upper division, still in the department.

55,208. Apart from casualties and other incidental resignations, the staff have remained permanently. None have reverted to the Ordnance Survey?—None. (Mr. Tratman.) That was one of the conditions of employment in the Registry, that none of the assistants could revert to the Ordnance Survey.

55,209. (To Mr. Pleass.) In the paper you have submitted to us you also put forward the ground that since you left the Ordnance Survey men in the same position as you who remained in it have become pensionable on certain conditions?—Yes, they have.

55,210. The final document quoted in your paper contains these words: "When a man leaves one department in the public service and enters another, he cannot be affected in any way by changes afterwards introduced in the department he has left, or claim any different treatment to his fellows in the new department on such a ground." That is given as the reason stated by the Treasury for not accepting that argument in favour of your being made pensionable?—Yes, that was the reply with regard to it.

55,211. Have you anything to say in answer to that reply?—We still think we have a claim to have the whole of our continuous service recognised, as we were transferred to form the nucleus of this department—distinctly transferred from one department to another—because we were specialists in this particular kind of work and were specially selected.

55,212. That is rather on a different point. The Treasury say that what happened to your old department cannot affect you after you left it. Have you anything to say in answer to that?—I suppose we have to accept that.

55,213. So it really comes to this, that the substantial ground on which you base your claim is the nature of the work and the permanence of your employment?—Yes, that is so.

55,214. What exactly is your work?—I am unofficially classed as assistant superintendent, but I am officially classed as a surveyor in the upper division.

55,215. What is your salary at present?—23*4l.* per annum, or 15*s.* per day.

55,216. Is your work entirely in the office?—Entirely in the office, and it has been for the past 13 years.

55,217. What is the nature of the work?—I have to assist the superintendents, and there are times when they are on leave, or sick, when I take up their duties.

55,218. But what is the actual work. Is it the work of making the maps from the material supplied by field parties?—No, the superintendents go through the cases and decide whether a surveyor should be sent to the ground. That is the first stage. If it is necessary to send to the ground, the instructions for the surveyor are written by the superintendent surveyor. The surveyor goes to the ground and returns the work to the superintendent who examines it, then the plans are prepared. Often questions arise as to the difference between what our surveyor found on the ground and the particulars in the deed. Then it is necessary to communicate with the solicitor; the solicitor calls and the points are discussed with the superintendent surveyor.

55,219. So that the work is partly the administrative work of directing the operations of the actual surveyors, and partly dealing with questions arising out of a comparison of the results of the survey with the deeds or other materials relating to the land?—That is so, and instructing the draughtsmen as to the carrying out of their plan work.

55,220. Instructing the draughtsman who prepares the actual map or plan?—Yes.

55,221. Does that include questions of boundaries?—Yes, if the boundaries are undefined, it is a question for the superintendent surveyor to decide whether they shall be plotted from the deed.

55,222. Where there is a discrepancy between the data in the deed and the actual facts as found on the ground, the superintendent has to determine how the plan is to be drawn?—That is so.

55,223. Is he the final authority on points of that kind?—Not always. I take it that sometimes it is a legal matter. (Mr. Tratman.) The question of boundaries is left with the superintendent surveyor. Mr. Pleass's position, I might say, is, that acting as assistant surveyor, he takes a lot of the minor work on his shoulders that the superintendent surveyor would ordinarily have to do. The superintendent surveyor hands over to his assistant minor matters.

55,224. (To Mr. Pleass.) Does that complete the statement you wish to put before us as regards your position?—I should just like to invite your attention to the danger of delay in this matter, inasmuch as we have considered our claim to be a legitimate one for the past 12 years; and I regret to say that only last year one of our members, Mr. Egan, died. Had he been established, his widow would have received a gratuity; whereas her application to the Treasury was met with a refusal. I only give this as an instance of a real hardship of an old Government servant dying with the knowledge that his wife would receive nothing. I should like to add that all of us are growing old in the Service, and our aggregate years of service in the two departments average 31 years per man. As our only prospect at present on reaching the age of 60 is to resign with a compassionate allowance, which would be hardly sufficient to support one for more than a few months, we are strongly of opinion that our case is one for immediate attention.

55,225. When the men in the Ordnance Survey were made pensionable, what were the conditions on which they were given pensions?—They were only restored. Pensions were abolished by the Ordnance Survey in 1873 and they were restored again in 1907.

55,226. Was there a reduction of salary of those who were made pensionable?—Yes, I believe there was a reduction of salary.

55,227. Were they made pensionable on the whole of their service?—Yes, the whole of their service.

55,228. Was the whole of that service counted for the full amount of pension. Was not the pension to be calculated on half the period of service from a fixed date up to the time when pensions were given?—They were established after 15 years' service, but only seven and a half years counted towards their pension.

55,229. (To Mr. Tratman.) You have heard Mr. Pleass's evidence. Do you claim that the arguments which he has put forward apply also to yourself and the other superintendent surveyors?—As regards the meaning of the word "permanent" in the circular of the Director-General?

55,230. I meant rather as regards the general ground of permanence and the nature of the employment?—I think it is based on the length of service rather than on the meaning of the Director-General's circular.

55,231. Is there anything further that you wish to add with reference to the special position of the superintendent surveyors?—I wish to add, by way of additional evidence, that the superintendent surveyors and their principal assistants are responsible for the accuracy of the plans prepared for the register in all cases of first registration and transfer of parts of properties, together with the correctness of the index maps as provided for in the Land Transfer rules. The plan plays an important part in the registration of property. The officers in the Land Registry responsible for the verbal particulars in the register are all established servants, while the superintendent surveyors and their assistants responsible for the plans are all temporary assistants, many of whom have attained the maximum salary of their class for many years. Not one single promotion to the establishment has been made in the department which has to prepare and settle the plans, although the Compulsory Act has been in operation for 16 years. As the superintendent surveyors base their claim for establishment upon the importance and responsibility of their duties as well as upon the length of their service, it is thought that the Commissioners should be acquainted with the nature of their duties, and a short statement of those duties has been prepared, together with copies, for the use of each Commissioner (handing in the same). This sets forth shortly the duties of the superintendent surveyors. We have to satisfy ourselves that the correct land is mapped out on the filed plan, general map, and index maps. To decide this, we are guided by the deeds, which frequently contain involved or obsolete descriptions, no plans, or very inexact ones. In cases of old deeds, with merely an open area of land, now built upon, it requires great care and expert knowledge of legal phraseology to interpret the meaning of the grant. In cases of doubt we correspond with or interview the applicants for registration (usually a solicitor). We are continually consulted by the assistants in the Legal Department, who are responsible for the verbal particulars in the register, and we act generally in the capacity of technical advisers. It is part of our duty to call the registrar's attention to questionable extent and claims for registration in excess of what appears to us to be included by the description in the deeds. Our work necessarily entails a good general knowledge of the nature of deeds relating to freehold, head-lease, sub-lease, copyhold, enfranchisement, ground rent, rent charge, mortgage, re-lease, easements, &c., and the various forms used in the registry, such as transfers, charges, discharges, cautions, priority notices, &c.; also, a thorough grasp of the Land Transfer Acts and the rules drawn up from time to time by the Rule Committee, so far as they affect areas and boundaries. We have to use considerable tact in our correspondence and interviews with solicitors, who, in some cases, are prejudiced against the working of the Acts. In connection with this, the registrar has expressed to the officials of the registry, "Especially to those who are brought into more frequent contact with the public" "the Lord Chancellor's high appreciation of the success with which they have performed their duties in circumstances which must often have called for tact, temper, and courtesy." An increasing number of registrations are entered with absolute or good leasehold title, involving the Treasury in pecuniary liability in case of error. As the plans for these titles are dealt with by us, and we take the responsibility for the settlement of the boundaries and initial the plans for the register, it is submitted that this is very important work, which should not be left in the hands of temporary officers.

55,232. You say that your work entails a good knowledge of the nature of deeds relating to various matters?—That is so.

55,233. I suppose that knowledge would be from the point of view of boundaries only, and not from the point of view of title?—Exactly; parcels and boundaries of properties.

55,234. Would not "a good general knowledge of the nature of deeds" be rather too wide a phrase for the knowledge that is required for your work?—Perhaps it is a little, I must admit. "The parcels in the deeds" would be a more correct phrase, perhaps. I may say that the increase in absolute title work during the past year or two has been very marked, and the tendency is for it to increase still further in the future. This class of work largely increases the labour and the responsibility of the superintendent surveyor who deals with the case. A request for a plan for an absolute title comes from the registrar with the following instruction. I quote from a recent case, and it is quite a typical example: "The land to be registered with absolute title is that comprised in the instrument of transfer of 18th March 1915, if it is also conveyed by the deeds of 3rd December 1863, the 10th March 1888, the 6th July 1888, and the 11th July 1910." This means that in the preparation of this one plan alone at least five deeds have to be perused by the superintendent surveyor dealing with the case. In some cases the deeds quoted by the registrar refer to descriptions in other deeds or particulars of sale, which means further research. Then, again, getting back to 1863, brings us to early descriptions and early maps, which have to be consulted, and so on. The registrar does not tell us what extent of land has to be included in the registration within the red line on the plan, but relies entirely upon the plan furnished to him by the superintendent.

5 May 1915.]

Mr. W. S. TRATMAN and Mr. G. PLEASS.

55,235. Then the superintendent has to gather from one or more deeds exactly what the area is to which the particular registration refers?—Exactly.

55,236. And for that purpose he has to peruse the deeds and to understand them, at any rate so far as is necessary for determining the exact area to which they refer?—Exactly, and call the registrar's attention to any question of extent. In the case of absolute title it is very important.

55,237. Your representation is that that work is of so important and responsible a nature that it ought to be done by permanent and pensionable officers?—Exactly.

55,238. (Sir John Kempe.) What authority have your maps? Are they merely drafts which are discussed afterwards and settled by the legal department, or are they in themselves final maps?—They are in themselves final maps.

55,239. But are not they discussed with the clients, whoever they are, by the legal department of the office?—No, we interpret the deed and prepare the plan without reference to the owner, unless a question of doubt arises.

55,240. Then your map is not a mere basis for discussion by the office to enable them to settle it with the owners of the land; it is a final document drawn up for use?—It is a final document.

55,241. (Chairman.) Supposing the owner raised some question upon it, by whom would that be decided?—By the superintendent surveyor, if it should be what we call a mapping question. It may be the definition and meaning of the deed, and then it would have to be referred to the registrar.

55,242. It would depend upon the precise nature of the question, how far it was a legal question and how far it was a surveying question, whether it would be determined by you or referred to the registrar?—Exactly—that is the situation.

55,243. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) Would you be satisfied if you were given about the same terms as were given in 1907, in the matter of pensions to the Ordnance Survey officers?—No, I think that would not satisfy us, considering the fact that we have been upon our maximum for five or six years, and our maximum is a small one.

55,244. But I am talking about pensions now, not salary. I do not see how the fact that you have been at your maximum five or six years is related to the question whether you should be treated differently from the Ordnance Survey people in the matter of pension?—(Mr. Pleass.) We consider that that would be an additional hardship. (Mr. Tratman.) That would mean losing something immediately, would it not, in the way of pay? (Mr. Pleass.) Our salary would be reduced to pay for our pensions.

55,245. As I understand, there was a reduction of salary in that case, but the pension probably very largely outweighed that. I fancy it was universally accepted by the Ordnance Survey people?—The terms are very poor. They had no option in the matter.

55,246. What sort of terms do you ask for now as compared with theirs?—(Mr. Tratman.) I was going to suggest that the superintendents' maximum be considerably increased. In fact what I intended to put forward was that we should be allowed to progress to 500*l.* per annum.

55,247. But confining yourself to the question of pension for the moment, what terms as compared with the Ordnance Survey terms do you ask for?—(Mr. Pleass.) We think that we should not be put on a contributory scheme, and that we should be placed on the establishment without having our pay reduced.

55,248. And with the whole of your back service counted as if you had been in a pensionable position the whole of that time?—(Mr. Tratman.) Yes. (Mr. Pleass.) A certain amount of it to count at least.

Sir KENNETH AUGUSTUS MUIR MACKENZIE, G.C.B., K.C., recalled and further examined.

55,249. (Chairman.) Sir Kenneth, in your former evidence you made a suggestion that all appointments in legal departments should be made by a Minister responsible to Parliament—presumably the Lord Chancellor—and that he should be assisted by a committee to examine and report upon the qualifications of the candidates. Since then we have had evidence from Lord Loreburn among others. Lord Loreburn expressed in many respects the same view as you did, but he suggested that the actual appointments should be made by a committee of the kind which you contemplated, and that the matter should only be referred to the Lord Chancellor if one or more members of the committee dissented from the decision of the committee and asked for a reference to the Lord Chancellor. We should be glad to have your opinion on that suggestion made by Lord Loreburn, and generally your views as to the respective merits of that precise form of scheme and the scheme which you suggested?—I remain of the same opinion as before. I am aware of what Lord Loreburn said on the subject, but I have always looked upon it as a sound principle—our constitution being what it is—that ministerial responsibility should be preserved in the case of public appointments, and I think that we said something to that effect in the report of this Commission on the public service generally. I think that was the opinion prevailing here during our discussions as far as I remember. At any rate, that is my opinion; if the Commission wish to know my opinion it is that it is desirable to retain that.

55,250. In the fourth report of the Commission, in the chapter relating to the professional and technical Civil Service there is this paragraph: "In the second place, though the ultimate power of appointment must, as a result of our constitutional system, remain with the Minister who is responsible to your "Majesty and to Parliament for the administration of each department, the preliminary selection of qualified candidates to be submitted to the Minister for his choice should, we think, be entrusted not to an individual but to a committee?"—That comes to very much the same thing.

55,251. You confirm that?—I wish to adhere to that. I signed that report, and whatever shades of difference there may be amongst us that is what we signed, and I do not know that it has been so far suggested that there is any difference in that respect between the legal departments and other departments of the State. I do not think it was put to Lord Loreburn, and perhaps was not present to his mind, whether there was supposed to be any difference between the legal departments and the other departments of the State so as to make it desirable that there should be a different principle of appointment applied in the one case to that which is applied in the other.

55,252. No. I think that precise point was not put to Lord Loreburn. The point of responsibility to Parliament was put to him, and his reply was, in the first place, that everybody, including a committee of that kind, is actually responsible to Parliament though perhaps not technically responsible?—I remember he said that.

55,253. And also he preferred that the actual appointment should be in the hands of a committee who would not be subject to the political pressure to which a Minister in direct contact with Parliament is exposed. You do not consider that those considerations weigh against your former opinion?—No; the Minister must endure that pressure as far as it exists.

55,254. You attach great weight, you told us before, to that question of responsibility to Parliament?—Yes, I do.

55,255. And for that reason you adhere to the recommendation that patronage should be no longer exercised by judges or other persons who are not responsible to Parliament?—Yes; I feel strongly about that.

55,256. The composition of the proposed committee was also discussed in the course of Lord Loreburn's evidence, and his recommendation was: The permanent secretary to the Lord Chancellor in his individual capacity, a representative of the Treasury, the head of the department concerned, a representative of the Civil Service Commission, and an eminent solicitor. Do you agree with that suggested composition of the committee?—Yes; I should think that that was not a bad committee. It is, however, rather a large committee, for one thing, and there is no absolutely independent member upon it.

55,257. By "independent," do you mean outside the Government service?—I mean outside the kind of influences that bear upon the question of selection. It is proposed that there should be a solicitor. Well, one of the questions that arise in connection with appointments to these offices is whether they should be—I think the Law Society almost goes so far as to say they ought to be—appointed entirely from solicitors; so I should not look upon the solicitor, though a most useful member, as being an entirely independent member. I should like to see some man who is not connected with the profession at all—neither connected with the professions nor with the offices.

55,258. In place of the solicitor?—I do not say in place of the solicitor; I should have said in addition to the solicitor, subject to the objection, as I have already said, that I think the committee is large.

55,259. The representatives of the Treasury and the Civil Service Commission would be independent in that sense; they would have no connection with the professions?—No; they have a strong official connection, and the very things that would make them valuable, namely, the economic view that the Treasury would take, and the general knowledge of all the other departments which the Civil Service Commissioners would bring in, would also make them slightly narrow; they would be chiefly influenced by those considerations which were their own qualifications for being present; and I think if you could get an outside man—a business man—some person connected with the great industrial undertakings, or some man of that sort, to sit upon the committee, it would be an advantage.

55,260. The committee would have a good deal of detailed work if it were to recommend, as regards all appointments and all promotions, which, I think, was the idea. Would not there be some difficulty in getting a man actively connected with any large business undertaking to give the necessary time to it?—I think it would be very difficult.

55,261. In a system of that kind, if it were instituted, would you suggest that applications should be received and a list of candidates kept in the Lord Chancellor's office, as it is at present in the case of the appointments which he makes, or would you have separate registers of applicants for different offices?—I do not think I am prepared to give an opinion about that. I think that if some system, such as we talked about on this Commission before, and such as I am to some extent advocating now, were adopted, or were recommended, you would have to say that it would have to be worked out elsewhere by some sub-committee, or worked out between the Lord Chancellor and the Treasury, or something of that sort, as to how it should work. I am not here prepared to recommend a worked-out scheme for this. It may sound surprising, but I am pretty well content with things as they have gone on for a very great many years.

55,262. Another question which has arisen in the course of the evidence is whether it would be desirable to change the present system under which, generally speaking, new entrants to the service are appointed to the third class, and the higher classes are filled by promotion from the third class. It has been suggested by some witnesses that it would be desirable to have two separate grades—a lower grade, which would do the more mechanical clerical work of filing documents, keeping books, issuing notices, and so forth, and a higher grade, roughly corresponding to the present first and second classes, who would do work of the better kind, requiring in most cases some professional qualifications, and that there should be separate recruitment for that higher grade. At the same time all witnesses who have suggested a system of that kind have added that it would be undesirable entirely to shut the door on promotion from the third class, supposing there was a man of exceptional merit and ability who was qualified for the higher work. Will you give us your opinion on that suggestion?—I think such a system as you speak of is quite workable. I think you could set up a system of that sort for our legal departments, and I have often talked about it in past years. When the present classification was set up I think it was rather indicated that a classification of the sort which exists was what was expected by Parliament in the Officers' Act of 1879, which lays down that they are to be of the first, second, and third class, or some expression of that sort. The whole subject was a great deal considered in those early days—about 1880—and it ended in the establishment of the present system with the first, second, and third classes. I do not think that at that time it was considered by any means settled that everybody was to be appointed in the third class. There is no doubt that, as matters stand, if a vacancy occurred of a post in the first class the person having the right of appointment at present might exercise his legal right to appoint straightway to the first class from outside; but it has gradually come, as a matter of working, to be the case that men have been appointed in the first instance in the third class. I should not like to disclaim having had a good deal to do with that. My own personal influence in the matter has always gone in that direction. I have always held, as I think I have expressed in the Commission, the view that the general principle of appointing at the bottom and giving every man a chance of rising to the top is the best principle. My natural feeling is in favour of it. I should not be at all prepared to admit that it had not worked well on the whole in those parts of the legal departments where it was possible to apply it. Of course, there have been objections and there have been difficulties, but not more than one expects in every system which you have to deal with; but I think on the whole it has worked well, and I should be rather sorry to see an inferior class of men brought in in the third class—I mean a set of men who would be given to understand that, subject to very exceptional abilities displayed by them, they would never rise beyond 200*l.* a year. I should be sorry to see that; I think the objection, which has been, I have no doubt, mentioned here, that those men come in and then only have very inferior work to do, and may be for many years kept upon that routine work and so deteriorate, ought to be removed, and might have been removed more than it has been, by giving those men more share, or more opportunity of sharing, in the better work and seeing the better work as it goes on. I do not think that men have actually been precluded from seeing better work, because, as a matter of fact, the good men who have been appointed in the third class have nearly always succeeded in showing their merits to the heads of the departments, and when questions of promotion have been under consideration, I have never had any difficulty in finding out who were the men in the third class who showed promise and who were good men. I think the man who has no spirit, and as to whom those who appointed him have been deceived as to his promise of ability, does succeed in proceeding in a humdrum way and never has his eyes open to any better work than that which is immediately under his hands; such are the men who, thereby, to my mind, have not proved that they are worth more than 200*l.* a year, and I neither expect them to be promoted nor wish them to be promoted.

Sir KENNETH AUGUSTUS MUIR MACKENZIE, G.C.B., K.C.

55,263. As a matter of fact, under the present system, are not they very often promoted? What we gathered was that, though theoretically, promotion was by selection, in practice it did go very much by seniority?—Selection is very difficult to manage. It requires great resolution of every kind. If the responsibility lies with you you are appealed to in every kind of way, and it is difficult rigidly to refuse to promote a man, especially when the heads of his office will not go the length of telling you that he really is unfit. The responsibility does not lie absolutely with them, and so they will not take it, and they leave it to you; then you, on the other hand, find it very difficult, not having got the full strength of their views behind you, to shut the door against such a man. So that men do eventually get promoted, I have no doubt, in some instances, who are not supposed to be promoted, when you lay down the principle that promotion is to be by selection.

55,264. Do you think that the suggested committee would be able more rigidly to apply the principle of selection?—I do not know. It is very very difficult to say. I think it is the old story: If you have got a really strong, competent single man at the head it is the best thing you can have; but next to that, probably, some sort of a committee is better than a weak man.

55,265. The committee could, of course, take steps to get systematic information as to the merits of a man?—So can a single man, certainly; and it is his duty to do so.

55,266. To go back to the main point, I gather that you prefer, on the whole, the system of promotion from the bottom rather than the system of division into two grades?—Yes, I think I do; but I am not saying that you could not work such a system as you suggest. It is not my proposal, but if I were remaining in my office and were told by the Lord Chancellor to carry out a recommendation from this Commission on those lines, I do not foresee any difficulty about it. It has its merits.

55,267. It was pressed upon the Commission, especially with reference to certain departments—the Land Registry, for instance?—I dare say. The Land Registry is not really one of the legal departments; it is a different thing by itself; and if it is a proper moment to say it, I think, probably, it was a mistake in the first instance to give the same organisation to the Land Registry as that which we already had in the legal departments. I am personally, no doubt, responsible for that to some extent, and I think it is now pretty well proved that the other kind of system would have been better in the Land Registry.

55,268. It was suggested that there were very definitely two different kinds of work—professional work such as the scrutiny of title and the clerical work connected with the applications—and that these two kinds of work should be represented by two different grades of officers?—Yes; but what it means, I think, is this: With the exception of those men who are to do inferior clerical work and the mere routine work, the great mass of the business in the Land Registry is business that has to be done by professional men of a class different really from any of our clerks in the legal departments. The way our legal departments are organised is, that the clerks only go up to 600*l.* a year. It means a different class of men really from the men who are expected to deal with the work in the Land Registry.

55,269. It was also suggested, I think, by some of the witnesses who dealt with the Chancery departments that the system of two grades which exists in one of the Chancery departments, in the Registrars Office, would be applicable to Chancery chambers as well?—As I said before, you could work out such a system, but I do not know that it would be any better than what we have already, which I think, no doubt with faults, has done fairly satisfactorily. Of course I do not know what evidence you have had before you upon the subject. I have not had time to go through the evidence. I do not know whether you have had positive evidence before you that the work in chambers is not satisfactorily done, and that you want an alteration of staff. I am not aware of such evidence.

55,270. I think we have no evidence that the work is not satisfactorily done?—No, I should be very much surprised to see evidence to that effect, because I do not think it would be fair on the men.

55,271. The evidence was, I think, rather to this effect: That for the better work in those offices it was desirable to have men with previous legal experience, but that that was not wanted for the purely clerical work of the lower kinds?—No; but you can organise, and to some extent the work is organised in Chancery chambers, so that a man when he first comes in is presented with work for which you do not require a man with professional qualifications. What we do now generally is, to appoint a man with legal training, because we expect him after a time to qualify himself for going up, at any rate, to 600*l.* a year.

55,272. It was represented also from the point of view of the individual, that the man who has had previous legal experience must come in at the age of, say, 24 or 25; and that if a man with some previous qualifications comes in at that age at the bottom of the third class, and works slowly upwards, the scale of pay is inadequate for his age and responsibilities?—I think, of course, there is something to be said for that, but judging from the applications that there are for those offices, and from the men whom we certainly are able to appoint to those offices, I should say that the salaries prove themselves to be sufficient. I think that there is a good deal of advantage in everybody having some practical acquaintance with what the routine work is at the bottom of an office. I believe that that is in mercantile life recognised. I think we heard here that even for a man who has expectations, and who is expecting to blossom out into a partner or a director, it is a very good thing that he should sit on a high stool for a time in the first instance.

55,273. Would not that be qualified by the very important condition that the period of sitting on the high stool should not be too prolonged?—I quite agree.

55,274. I gather that on the whole, although you think that the system of two grades would be workable, you would prefer to retain the present system except in the Land Registry?—Yes, I think so. I should doubt if any case had been made out before you for making an alteration. When you consider all the difficulties of transition and so forth, I should have doubted whether there was a case; but I do not know what has been said before you.

55,275. There are other questions that have arisen with regard to classification. It has been pointed out that in certain offices the classification into three classes does not really correspond to the actual division of the work. For instance, in the Taxing Office there are the three classes of clerks, but the organisation of the office is that each taxing master has a senior and a junior clerk. The senior clerk is either a first class or a second class clerk, as it may happen, for the purposes of pay, and some discontent is caused by the fact that men who are occupying the same position in the office and doing identical work are in different classes for the purposes of pay?—It is not very easy, perhaps, to explain how that arises. It was settled in 1880, when our establishment was placed upon its present footing, that the practice was to continue in the Taxing Office of each taxing master having a principal clerk who had from 500*l.* to 600*l.* a year, and then a junior clerk on the lowest scale. There were two or three considerations which led to that position being modified. One was that it so appeared that the Taxing Office was differently organised from the rest of the departments; that you there, instead of having first, second, and third class clerks, had first and third class clerks only. Then there came in this consideration—which, at any rate, always weighed with me very much—a desire to transfer from one department to another, and you would get cases where you might wish to transfer a man who was in the third class in another department and to benefit him at the same time, because you wished to transfer him as he showed himself a good man, and you wanted to put him somewhere. You could not transfer him from the third class into a first class clerkship. So I think you would find, if you investigated the history, that there was more than one case of a man being transferred to the Taxing Office, but transferred with the position and salary of the intermediate scale as a second class clerk. Then a third thing was this: Of course there is a tendency in every one of the departments in an establishment organised like that, for promotion to go up inside that particular department or section. Well, it is a very strong order and quite inconsistent with the practice in the other parts of the establishment, that a man should jump up from the third class to the first. A case of this sort would arise: Upon a taxing master losing his principal clerk, he would say, “Well, my junior clerk is a “very good man, and if you consult me I should “like to have him,” and he, perhaps, makes out a very strong case for having this man. If this man was appointed originally on the principle that I have always advocated—that is, of getting rather a high class man who would be able to look forward to promotion—it is quite on the cards that this third class clerk really has a very fair case for promotion, and, as far as I had to do with it, I should say, “Well, I think “we ought to do something for this man, but he cannot “be pitchforked at once into the first class.” So it came about that we constituted a certain proportion of the clerkships there as second class clerkships, and by that means we made a sort of ladder, by means of which he was able to get on towards the top. In that way the second class clerkships came into the Taxing Department, though the man who had risen a step would have to do the work of principal clerk for his taxing master, notwithstanding that he did not receive a salary of 500*l.* to 600*l.* a year. I do not know if I have made it clear, but that is how it arose.

Sir KENNETH AUGUSTUS MUIR MACKENZIE, G.C.B., K.C.

55,276. Quite so. The clerks in the Taxing Office who appeared before the Commission represented that when that office was originally constituted on its present footing in the year 1881 there were only two classes of clerks, and they were first and second class?—I think that was so.

55,277. And they thought they had some right to complain of the subsequent changes which had resulted in the creation of a third class, and therefore a considerable reduction in the general scale of pay for the work?—I am surprised at your acquaintance with ancient history. I had forgotten that; but that was so. What happened at that time was, that having settled what was to be the form of the establishment we then had to squeeze all the existing men into that. All the offices were separate, and different offices with their own scales of salaries and their own classification. We had in the first instance to squeeze that into our new mould, and difficult personal questions did arise at that time as to whether a man whose salary was of a certain amount was to be deemed to come into the second class or into the third class. Now that you mention it, I have a recollection that that was one of the storms we had to encounter at that time.

55,278. When the present organisation was first created the existing men were placed in the first and second class, and that arose from the fact of the level of their previous salaries?—That is what it was; but I thought at that time they were made first and third class, and that is my recollection.

55,279. Their statement was that they were made first and second class, and they complained of the subsequent introduction of the third class?—I am afraid my recollection may be at fault.

55,280. At any rate, the exact placing at that time depended on their previous salaries, and did not imply any decision at that time as to what the future organisation of the office was to be?—No.

55,281. They also suggested that this difficulty of classification might be got over by doing away with the system under which one senior and one junior clerk are assigned to each taxing master, and pooling the clerks in the office, so to speak, giving them certain work and not necessarily the work coming from a particular master; and if that was done it would be possible to make a distinction between the work of the first class and the work of the second class?—May I ask who suggested that?

55,282. That suggestion was put to three clerks from the office whom we had before us yesterday. When that question was put to them they said with some emphasis they thought it could be done, and that it would be an improvement upon the present system. We have not heard any evidence from a master on that particular point?—I think it would be important to have evidence from a master before deciding that. I have always believed myself, from the sort of evidence that has been before me, that that kind of pooling could not be done in that office. I have accepted that, although my disposition is in favour of pooling. I should always be inclined myself to think that you could pool. My recollection is that the masters, at any rate, have always been against any idea of that sort, and that really no suggestion from a responsible quarter has ever been made in that sense.

55,283. A similar difficulty as regards classification exists in the Chancery Registrars' Office. I think you mentioned that when you gave evidence before?—Yes. There has been somewhat the same consideration that I was mentioning in regard to the Taxing Office. There has been a considerable desire to make the classification and the scales of salary and so forth, in the Chancery Registrars' Office, more like what it is in the other departments, and I do not think there is any very strong reason against it. The office bears a very different complexion now from what it was some years ago, because a strong attempt has been made—perhaps it would be frank to say that I have made a strong attempt—to bring men from other departments into that office, and also to break down the old system under which the Chancery Registrars' Office was organised. That was, as you know, a system under which only young solicitors' clerks could be brought in in the first instance, and having been brought in they had nothing to do but to exist in order to become full-blossomed registrars, and with salaries at that time which were much higher than any other salaries in the Supreme Court. That system of succession has, of course, now, you may say practically, disappeared. I do not suppose anybody could be found to say a word in favour of it; I have never heard of anybody. The committee known as Mr. Justice Kekewich's Committee made a strong recommendation that that right of succession should no longer exist, and that the appointments both to the registrarships and to the clerkships should be much more open than they have been until recently. The organisation of the clerkships in the Chancery Registrars' Office is really more like what you have been referring to than what it is anywhere else, because there is a class of clerks that used to be called assistant clerks, who were a set of men entirely precluded from exalted office; they were almost hewers of wood and drawers of water in a class by themselves altogether beneath and outside those who were called principal clerks to registrars and who eventually became registrars. In recent years the appointments to that lower class of officers who under the modern establishment are called third class clerks, have been of a better class of men in a great many instances, and where they have shown themselves good men they have in some instances been transferred to other offices, both to the Central Office, where they have had a chance of going up, and also on to the Chancery side where two or three of them have done extremely well. But there is no opportunity for those men at present to go up in their own department of the Chancery Registrars.

55,284. You told us that the present principal clerks had been appointed with notice that they would have no statutory right of succession to registrarships?—Yes.

55,285. Mr. Registrar Farmer in his evidence made this statement: "Though it is a fact that the principal clerks in the office have no right to succession, there is not the slightest doubt that those who were qualified under the Act came into the office on a tacit understanding that they would in due course succeed to the registrarship." Do you agree with that statement?—I quite concur in the word "tacit," but not otherwise, I think.

55,286. Mr. Farmer made that statement, and I called his attention to the evidence you had given on that point. He said in reply to the words you had used, which I quoted to him, "I think that was a correct statement, with this proviso, that I think the clerks coming in came in on the understanding that they would succeed. I think that is the way they understood it"?—Mr. Farmer did not say that he had any statement in writing or any verbal statement, or any statement as far as I can make out, except a tacit statement from me, or from any other authority, did he?

55,287. No. He did not assert that any statement had been made. He put it in that way, that it was a tacit understanding?—There may have been a tacit understanding, but I do not know what a tacit understanding is.

55,288. (Mr. Coward.) I was going to ask him at the time to give us an explanation of what the understanding was?—I do not know, I am sure. Understandings are very often things that seem to require only one party—I know that.

55,289. Especially when the word is used by a lawyer?—I understand the word "agreement."

55,290. (Chairman.) You do not admit that there was any understanding of any sort on which any claim to succession could be founded?—Absolutely none. I am sure that no man in the department would say that he had ever heard from me that he had any claim. I was going to say any expectation, but I think, perhaps, it would go rather far if I was to say no expectation, because I can quite imagine that in talking to a man about the office I should say "Well, if you show yourself a very good man of course you have got a very good chance of getting a registrarship." I can quite understand my saying that. I should be sure to say that, I think.

55,291. Turning to the Land Registry again, if there were two grades there, I presume for the higher grade some professional qualifications would be required?—Unquestionably they ought to be professional men.

55,292. Barristers or solicitors?—Yes.

55,293. It was represented to us by the first class clerks in the Land Registry that the expectations they had formed on entering the Service had not been realised, and that the work they were doing was better work than corresponded to the position and salary of a first class clerk. They asked for some improvement of their position both as regards the designation of their class and as regards their salaries. Will you give us your opinion on those claims?—I am inclined to think that there is some justification for their view. There has no doubt been a good deal of disappointment in the Land Registry. It was thought when the Land Transfer Acts were passed in the nineties that the registration of title to land would extend all over the country, and I have not the least doubt that many of the men who went into the Land Registry looked forward to it as a rising department. Well, it has remained, to a great extent, stationary; there has been great opposition to the extension of the system of registration of title—perfectly legitimate opposition. There is a great deal to be said on both sides; but the result has been that men who went in with the expectation that they were going into a department that would grow very large have been disappointed. You cannot establish a very strong claim upon that; to a great extent, of course, it is a speculation. If things had gone as it was expected at the time by many people that they would go, many of those men no doubt would have got into very good positions; they would have been the heads of local registries, which were intended to be established, and in other ways they would have got on much better than they have got on. I think that probably the limit of pay which arises from the organisation of the legal departments having been imposed upon the Land Registry—I mean the limit of 600*l.* a year—is one that is hardly appropriate to, at any rate, some of those men.

55,294. They represented that the first class clerks generally were doing work of the same kind as is done by the assistant registrars, and were giving final decisions on questions of absolute title?—It is so. There is one thing which has to be borne in mind in discussing the staff of the Land Registry, if we are discussing it at the same time as the staff of the legal departments, namely, that the Land Registry is a self-supporting institution. The Land Registry has to raise its own fees and pay its own way, and if it is not doing a very large and flourishing business its income does not enable it, of course, to pay its officers so highly as it might wish to pay them. If you want to pay them more highly, you would perhaps have to raise the fees for registration, which would be an objectionable thing to do. That is a difficulty. The legal departments themselves are not in the same position as many of the public departments of the State, where the salaries are borne upon the votes and paid for out of the taxes. In the legal departments all these payments that we are speaking of—the salaries of the officers and so forth—are paid out of the fees.

55,295. But can you properly take that into account in determining the proper salaries to be paid?—In the Land Registry I think you must take that into account. You say that the first class clerks ought to be paid more money. Very well, that is all right. Where is the money to come from? The only way you can get the money is by raising the fees. It is not certain that you would get it then, because very likely the work would diminish.

55,296. On the other hand, if you apply the principle of remuneration depending on whether a department pays its way or not throughout the Civil Service, would not you arrive at some surprising results?—I dare say you would.

55,297. Would not that lead to a very much higher scale of salaries in the Post Office, for instance, than in the Admiralty or in the War Office?—Yes, I suppose it would.

55,298. I would suggest that in fixing salaries it is necessary to look at the work and the proper scale of remuneration for that work in the State service, and not to the actual financial result of the department?—I do not think anybody can doubt that your principle is absolutely sound, but you cannot work it out without asking the question which I asked just now, "Where is the money to come from?" In the case of the other departments of the State the Treasury has to propose the money on the Estimates of the House of Commons but with the Land Registry and the Office of the Public Trustee that is not so. By Act of Parliament they have to raise by fees enough to cover their own expenses, and they would have to raise their fees in order to increase the salaries.

55,299. (Mr. Coward.) That would offer a strong bar to any extension of the Land Transfer Act, would it not?—Yes, of course.

55,300. (Chairman.) Then you would say that those two offices are in a peculiar position because of the statutory limitation of the amount of their expenses?—Yes, it is a great difficulty; but your question was whether I thought that the first class clerks in the Land

Registry had a case for being better paid. I think they have.

55,301. Do you attach any importance to their claim for a change of designation?—I do not attach any importance to it either way. If it is any pleasure to them I do not see why they should not be otherwise named.

55,302. If a higher and a lower grade were created in the Land Registry in that way, what would be your view as to the position of the lower grade. As regards recruitment, you suggested that open competition might be applied throughout the legal departments. Would you apply open competition in that case?—Yes, if it is for a class of men who are—subject to very very rare exceptions—not to rise above something like 200*l.* a year. I think we made some limit in the former Report of this Commission on those lines.

55,303. The lower grade there would roughly correspond to that junior clerical class which was recommended by the former Report of this Commission?—Yes.

55,304. Do you agree generally with the statement made by Sir Charles Brickdale in his evidence on that point?—Yes. Is that inconsistent with agreeing that open competition is at any rate admissible?

55,305. I suppose, if it was desired to recruit especially law clerks, some form of limited competition, or some form of competition with the qualification of service of that kind would be the appropriate method—open competition among clerks possessing some legal experience?—I have never myself been able to see the difficulty about that, but witnesses here I think have spoken about it as being impossible. I am not sure that the Chief Civil Service Commissioner did not say so.

55,306. Mr. Leathes stated, I think, not that it would be impossible, but that the definition of service as solicitors' clerk would present difficulties—that it would be difficult to discriminate between an office boy and a clerk who was really doing work of some value. Do you think that those difficulties could be got over?—I should have thought so. I am unable to see the difficulty myself. If I was told to work out a scheme on those lines I am sure I could do it, though I am not prepared to say now how I should do it.

55,307. In your previous evidence, I think the question was mentioned of the possibility of having an intermediate grade between the masters and the first class clerks for performing in a more economical manner some of the minor work which is now done by the masters. Some witnesses have expressed an opinion contrary to that suggestion, on the ground that, if a man in the position of a master has to deal with a case, it is desirable that he should deal with it continuously, and that there would be loss of force and loss of time in transferring particular points which might in themselves be less important but which arose in the same case?—I think there is a great deal to be said for that view. I understand that view being held by the masters. I do not like to express a very strong opinion as coming from my own authority upon that question of the intermediate grade, which is a very difficult question; but it happens that I have very high authority for saying that a scheme of that kind could be worked out and was desirable to be worked out. I think the name of Mr. Justice Pearson may have come before you in connection with what was called the Chancery Committee in 1885, which introduced a good many changes and a good many improvements at that time. Whether Mr. Justice Pearson's scheme appears in an appendix to that report I do not remember.

55,308. It does appear, in the report.—I am only speaking from my recollection of conversations with Mr. Justice Pearson, but he used to tell me that, in his opinion, you could organise the Chancery Division, and that it would be better organised if you had a smaller number of masters (that is to say, officers paid on the scale of 1,500*l.* a year) and more of a pyramid of officers, such as you generally see in a public department. I think he thought that one master with a salary of that kind in each judge's chambers was enough, and that he should have under him two assistant masters with salaries of from 800*l.* to 1,000*l.*

a year, or something of that sort, and two grades of clerks below that doing responsible work; and, finally, some sort of routine copying clerks at the bottom. I think that was his kind of scheme. I think it had the advantage of costing less money, but I do not think that entered very much into his mind particularly; he was only thinking of the best way of working the office.

55,309. (Mr. Coward.) He would say, would he not, that there would be more control centred in one individual at the head?—I have very little doubt but that was the main thing.

55,310. I was proposing to ask you whether that was not a very desirable thing?—Therefore, if I may use the expression, I was brought up by Mr. Justice Pearson to consider that that would be a very good organisation for the Chancery Division.

55,311. (Chairman.) Mr. Justice Pearson's phrase was that "At present there are too many generals and too few captains." That expressed the basis of his suggested reform?—Yes, that was his view. If Mr. Justice Pearson thought that that organisation could be constituted for the work, I am perfectly satisfied that it would work well. It must not be understood for a moment that I am suggesting that I do not think that the work is well done in Chancery chambers now; I think it is very well done.

55,312. But you suggest that those at the head—"the generals," as Mr. Justice Pearson called them—are more numerous than necessary, and could be replaced to some extent by officers of an intermediate class?—I believe there would be an economic result, and I think Mr. Justice Pearson himself went further and thought that it would have good administrative results, too.

55,313. Apart from the question of the particular grading of the officers, do you think that the staff in the Chancery offices is greater than is required at the present time?—My own disposition is to think that amongst the clerks, as well as amongst the officers, there is a greater proportion of the higher-paid grades than you would find in other public departments, and I should have thought there was no necessity for them.

55,314. We have had figures before us showing that there has been a very large diminution in the amount of Chancery business in the last 25 years—a diminution of 30 to 40 per cent.—and that there has been no corresponding diminution in the staff of the Chancery offices?—I am not quite satisfied that that is the fact. There was a considerable diminution made in the staff of the Chancery Division when a separate department of the Companies Winding-up was established. I do not say that actually, when you count the addition of that new department, the reduction was anything substantial; but actually in Chancery chambers, in the Chancery Division itself, there was a reduction. I do not know what evidence has been before you about the great reduction in Chancery business.

55,315. The evidence was the evidence of the judicial statistics?—Statistics are very difficult things to deal with. There was a very great change made in 1883 (which was subsequent to the establishment on the footing on which we still have it), when there was the introduction of a thing Mr. Coward would understand well that was called an "originating summons." The meaning of that was, that instead of having to throw the whole of an estate into Chancery and administer the whole of it in Chancery, as you used to have to do, if any question arose in relation to it you could, on what is called an "originating summons," simply bring before the Court the one particular question in relation to the estate that you wanted to have decided. Of course, that did make a very considerable difference. In many cases you got rid of all the work connected with a large estate. On the other hand, I think, there was a great multiplication of the smaller questions, and I do not know whether it is really true that the amount of business has diminished to any very great degree.

55,316. The comparison made was with the period ranging from 1888 to 1892, which was subsequent to the change of practice of which you have spoken.

Sir KENNETH AUGUSTUS MUIR MACKENZIE, G.C.B., K.C.

Taking a comparison with that period, the reduction in the number of summonses was about 35 per cent., the reduction in the number of orders made in chambers was about one-third, and the reduction in the number of accounts passed was about 45 per cent. Those figures were put to Master Fox. He was asked whether that diminution in the statistical number of cases had been set off by any increase in the importance and length of the cases, and he said that there was some set-off in importance, but not in length. Those figures would indicate a very substantial diminution?—They would.

55,317. Taking that period as the starting point—1888 to 1892—there has not been any considerable diminution in the staff of the Chancery Chambers?—No.

55,318. Does not that suggest that the staff at the present time must be very ample for the work to be done?—I should think that it was ample for the work to be done.

55,319. And could probably be diminished?—I think you would probably find if you went into the question of diminishing it, that the way the work is divided between the masters and the clerks, and amongst the clerks themselves, creates a good deal of practical difficulty in actually diminishing the number of any one of the ranks of clerks. I cannot go into detail in the matter just now, but I have several times gone into the question and have never succeeded in making any progress with it; that is all I can say. I mean by that, that reasons were given or difficulties arose which made me drop it at the time—meaning that I think there were good reasons, and that they were real difficulties, although I do not say that, to my mind, they were always absolutely conclusive.

55,320. Did those difficulties arise principally from the allotment of particular clerks to particular masters—the system of water-tight compartments in which each master works?—I think that has always been one of the difficulties.

55,321. Those difficulties would to some extent disappear, would they not, if an alteration on the lines suggested by Mr. Justice Pearson were made?—Yes, I think so.

55,322. A question has arisen in the course of the evidence given as regards the detailed internal administration of the offices. You told us that in the Central Office, for instance, a committee of control, selected among the masters, is responsible for discipline, and so forth; but some evidence was given which seemed to show that there was a certain lack of contact between the controlling authority and the details of the offices. The committee of control is not constantly meeting; the masters who compose it are not themselves constantly in contact with the individuals who do the work of the office, and there seemed to be a lack of some suitable machinery for dealing with such questions as punctual attendance, arrangements for leave, sick leave, and questions of minor discipline of all sorts. A suggestion has been made that an officer, corresponding to the officer who in some of the departments of the Civil Service is called the chief clerk, would be useful. He would serve as the link between the controlling authority and the actual details of the office, and he would be, to some extent, the executive officer of the controlling authority. Such an officer would also be charged, under the controlling authority, with the details of the distribution of the work, the transfer of men from one particular kind of work to another, and so forth. How does that suggestion strike you?—I do not think it strikes me very favourably. I am sorry to hear that evidence has been given before you to make you think that the committee of control did not look deep enough into the affairs of the department. I should have thought they ought to do so, and that it was desirable that they should.

55,323. (Mr. Coward.) I think they themselves said that complaints or questions very rarely came before them?—I do not know that I have thought very much about it. It never occurred to me to have an officer of that kind. I should feel a little afraid that too much power might get into the hands of such a man, and I am not at all sure that, if there was such a man existing, it would diminish discontent, if there be any discontent. I think, on the whole, people would rather be managed as to their discipline, and as to their promotion, exchanges, and so on, by the highest person possible; I think men do not like to think that their fortunes are in the hands of somebody very little removed from themselves.

55,324. (Mr. Boutwood.) Do you attach very much importance to what is usually called discipline?—Yes, I think I do. I am not at all sure that I understand exactly what you mean.

55,325. I mean the discipline that has been mentioned, I do not say in this part of the inquiry, but certainly in the earlier part?—Do you mean somebody looking out to see whether men are doing their work or not?

55,326. In the earlier part of our inquiry the witnesses certainly spoke as if the efficiency of the office, and the salvation of men almost, depended on the fact that there was someone standing at men's heels to see that they did not do this or that all the day long?—No, I do not attach much importance to that; in fact, I think it is a bad idea. But I think it is important that there should be somebody who knows the office and knows what is going on.

55,327. (Chairman.) In certain branches there is a single officer who is responsible under a committee for the detailed arrangements; for instance, the Scrivenery Department. The Scrivenery Department is managed by a committee, but there is the superintendent of the Scrivenery Department who is responsible to the committee, and carries out the detailed arrangements under the committee. Similarly, the subordinate staff—the messengers and so on—are under the control of a superintendent, under the direction, ultimately, of the committee of control, I presume?—No; the superintendent is responsible to nobody but the Lord Chancellor. The committee of control have nothing to do with that. That army of men goes over the whole building.

55,328. The authority which is ultimately responsible has an intermediate officer who is responsible for the detail. It is true that in the case of the messenger staff the ultimate authority is further removed from the detail than in the case of the committee of control?—I think your proposal would be rather—taking the instance of the superintendent—as if he required somebody below him to be moving about and knowing what was going on amongst his people.

55,329. Perhaps the Scrivenery Department is a better illustration: There you have a committee of management and an executive officer. The committee of management no doubt could manage the Scrivenery Department just as the committee of control manages the Central Office, but they would find it much more difficult, I imagine, without a superintendent to deal with the details?—I think the main business of the superintendent of the Scrivenery Department is to manage the money affairs—the way in which they are paid for their work, and the way their earnings are pooled and distributed, and so on. That is his main business—giving out the work to them and so forth.

55,330. Does not he act generally as the executive officer of the Scrivenery Committee?—He is the head of that office.

55,331. The question arises in an even more marked form, I think, in the Chancery chambers where there is no committee of control and where there is no general authority, so far as I understand, for dealing with the whole staff?—There is nothing in Chancery chambers called by the name of "Committee of Control," but there is a committee of the masters just now, to whom the Lord Chancellor refers for advice and assistance with regard to points connected with the Chancery chambers, as to discipline, the work, and so on. He would refer to them if there was any question of not filling up a vacancy, on the ground that there is sufficient staff without doing so.

55,332. (Mr. Coward.) But he would never have referred to him such questions as the organisation of the office and the mode in which the work is done. That would not come before him?—I think they are the people to whom the question would first of all be referred if there was any question raised about the organisation.

Sir KENNETH AUGUSTUS MUIR MACKENZIE, G.C.B., K.C.

55,333. But it would be a question that would be so unlikely to be raised outside?—Yes, I think so.

55,334. (Chairman.) Owing to the system of watertight compartments, no master knows anything about the clerks who are working in another master's office?—He has not much opportunity. The idea of constituting a committee was that they should inform themselves, and that it should be recognised amongst their colleagues that they were entitled to inquire as to what was going on in all the chambers.

55,335. Has that committee existed for long?—No, it has only existed for two or three years.

55,336. On the whole, your opinion is against the creation of any office of that kind which has been suggested?—I do not at present see the advantage of it.

55,337. Turning to the Lunacy departments, in Master Theobald's evidence suggestions were made as to a change in the present arrangements for the visitors. He suggested that the legal visitor was unnecessary, and that if an extensive reform were to be introduced it would be desirable to substitute for the present system of visitors working from the centre a larger number of local visitors. In that way he thought greater efficiency would be obtained, and also, though he did not suggest that the present system was inefficient in any way, there would be very great economy in the amount of travelling that the visitors have to perform. Are you prepared to express an opinion on that point?—I cannot help thinking that Master Theobald's remarks were on the supposition that the Lord Chancellor's visitors would be amalgamated with the Commissioners in Lunacy, because I cannot see how it could be worked if you leave the office as it is now, but Parliament deliberately, two or three years ago, against my advice, thought fit to leave things as they are now.

55,338. Are you prepared to express an opinion as regards Master Theobald's suggestion of localised visitors?—I think that Master Theobald made proposals of that kind when it was intended to amalgamate the Chancery establishment with the Commissioners in Lunacy, and I remember thinking at the time that there was a great deal to be said for it; but it does not seem to me that it would apply to the present limited state of things as it remains, that is to say, as applied to a limited number of propertied lunatics, who come within the Lord Chancellor's jurisdiction, and who are visited by the three visitors spoken of—two medical and one legal visitor. To begin with, I should have thought a system of local visitors probably would be very expensive, because, although it is true you would have a different class of visitors who would only perhaps have a fee for the occasion or some small retaining fee, there would be a very large number of them to cover the whole face of the country, and even though each would only have a small amount of money, I should think it would probably amount to a great deal more than the salaries of the present three gentlemen. Then it seems to me there would be many disadvantages. I think it is very important that the visitors in these cases, as long as you keep up the principle of it, should be men of very high rank and position, such as they are just now. Sir James Crichton-Browne and Dr. Nicolson are men of the very highest possible attainments in their own department—there is no question about that. I think that it is a very good thing that men of that calibre should visit and report on this class of persons. I should have thought that you would not get the same kind of valuable information and that you would not have the same confidence where you just call in some local man to go and call at the house (say) of the neighbouring squire who was a lunatic. I do not think you would get the same kind of authority, and you would lose also the uniformity of view which I think is very important. I have, of course, had a very great deal to do with this personally, because the special reports come in to the Lord Chancellor every month from these visitors, and it is my duty to go through them and to call the Lord Chancellor's attention to anything that is novel or special. It makes an enormous difference whether you know the man who is making this class of reports, which are of a very intimate and confidential kind. I can imagine the immense difference it would make to anybody who had to deal with them if he knew the man who made the reports and how much reliance could be placed on his observations and remarks. As long as this system of having propertied lunatics of a certain selected class remains—as to which I think there is a great deal to be said on the other side—and as Parliament for some considerable period of time has left this alone and the question will not be opened again, I suppose, for many years, I think the present system is a good one; I do not think what Master Theobald suggests would be at all an improvement.

55,339. The question also came up whether the visitors ought not to be in subordination to or at any rate in more organic relation with the masters. At present they are responsible solely to the Lord Chancellor; they report to him, and, although the masters in Lunacy can make requisitions to the visitors to visit particular places, they have no authority over them. The question is whether as a matter of organisation it would not be advantageous to make the visitors part of the masters' office?—I have no doubt you are aware that they form one Board for the purpose of considering the reports that are to be made to the Lord Chancellor. The reports of the visitors are made after a meeting at which the masters attend. The masters themselves are members of the Board, and they take part in directing that the reports should be sent to the Lord Chancellor.

55,340. We were told that the visitors' reports to the Lord Chancellor were not seen by the masters at all unless they specially asked for one?—That may be the way that it works, but the report is sent to the Lord Chancellor by the secretary in the name of the Board, stating that there was present at the Board so and so, and so and so, and so and so, which includes the masters.

55,341. We were told that the Board did no business at all, but that it was simply a meeting for conversation?—I dare say you may describe what they do as conversation. What it purports to be, and what it certainly is on occasion, is that the visitor reads his report to the Board, and the Board, on hearing the report and after making any observations that they think fit, direct that the report is to be sent to the Lord Chancellor. That is stated on the face of every report.

55,342. Then is it the case that all the reports from the visitors are, formally at any rate, approved by the Board and forwarded in the name of the Board?—Certainly, unquestionably.

55,343. So that theoretically, at any rate, all the reports come before the Board before they go to the Lord Chancellor?—Yes, I believe they do actually and physically. It is only after they have been before the Board that they go in the name of the Board to the Lord Chancellor—not in the name of the visitors. The report is signed by the particular visitor who has in fact visited the patient and made a report, but the report is forwarded to the Lord Chancellor in the name of the Board.

55,344. (Sir Donald MacAlister.) How often does the Board meet?—I suppose they meet every month for the purpose of forwarding these reports.

55,345. Then Master Theobald cannot have meant that some particular report which he wanted could not come before him for months, although he wanted it at the moment?—No, I do not think he can have meant that.

55,346. (Chairman.) Apart from any question of a large reform, including some amalgamation of the Chancery lunatic system with the Board of Control, you do not think any change in the position of the visitors is desirable?—No, I think not. The jurisdiction over lunatics, so found by inquisition, having been left by Parliament as it is, I do not think there is any opportunity for large reform or any great change. The whole thing was so fully before Parliament at the time that I think those who are interested in it must have been fully aware of what they were doing or leaving undone.

55,347. (Miss Haldane.) Would you agree with the evidence we had from Lord Loreburn about it being desirable that there should be a woman visitor?—The difficulty about that is the small number of visitors that we have just now. There are two medical visitors and one legal visitor, and they certainly are at least enough, and there is a little difficulty in adding to the number.

Sir KENNETH AUGUSTUS MUIR MACKENZIE, G.C.B., K.C.

But I do think that a woman visitor would be a good thing. I have often seen cases where I have thought that, excellent though the visitors are, they were cases where a woman visitor would have been very desirable, and on the whole would have been more appropriate to the occasion.

55,348. In fact, if the legal profession were open to women at present, one of the legal members might be a woman?—That, of course, might be. It would be a legal visitor, and you would not ask questions as to what its sex might be.

55,349. (Chairman.) Is it necessary to have a legal visitor at all? That question was also raised?—I think a lay visitor as opposed to a medical visitor is a great advantage. I think the sort of idea in the present system is that out of three visits one is by a layman. They take turns or circuits, I think they call them, with the result, at least in theory, and to a great extent in practice, that every third visit is by a layman. I do not think it is very important that the layman should be a lawyer, but I think there is an advantage in his being a layman. There are questions that arise with reference to the property, and questions of a general kind that are not of a medical kind, on which I think it is an advantage that a layman should see the patients and be in a position to discuss those questions at the Board, if discussion arose. When the whole of this subject was recently discussed in Parliament with reference to the Lunacy Commission (what is now called the Board of Control) they clearly recognised that it was advantageous to have legal people and lay people, and not to have the whole administration in the hands of the medical profession.

55,350. There is one question concerning the organisation of the Central Office, about which I should like to ask you. Master Kershaw suggested in his evidence that it would be desirable to separate the Crown Office and the Associates Department from the rest of the Central Office, and also that the registrar of the Court of Criminal Appeal should be a separate officer. He was of opinion that the work in the Crown Office and the Associates Department was so different from the work in the other departments of the Central Office that it was not convenient to transfer men freely between those departments and the other departments, and that it would be more satisfactory to organise them on a separate basis and make them a separate office. What is your opinion on that point?—My opinion is very strongly against that. I think that the taking out of those departments from the Central Office would be a retrograde movement; it would be going back on a principle which has been worked out under the Officers Act, 1879. I think it would be a great pity that there should be diminished opportunities of transferring clerks, which is one of the things mentioned. His office, at this moment, is almost entirely manned by people who have been transferred. It has made it a very good office, as I dare say he told you, and it has been greatly to the advantage of the men who are transferred. We have actually transferred some men recently back from there. We have been setting up a new department, and we transferred one or two of those men into the new department who had shown themselves good men—we were creating a place a little bit better, and these men got the advantage of it. I should have thought it a very great pity if they had been precluded from transfer by any new artificial separation. I think you said something about the separation of the registrar of the Court of Criminal Appeal. I think that would be the greatest possible pity, as illustrated by the position of Mr. Kershaw himself. Mr. Kershaw was appointed to the office of registrar of the Court of Criminal Appeal when that Court was constituted a few years ago. It was a comparatively small office in itself then. Mr. Kershaw did very good work there, and, when Sir James Mellor retired from the head of the Crown Office in the King's Bench Division, the then Lord Chief Justice arranged with the Lord Chancellor that Mr. Kershaw should be made the master of the Crown Office. One of the reasons for it was that there is a great deal of similarity and connection between Crown Office work—that is, appeals from the magistrates and so forth, to what is called the Crown Court—and the Criminal Jurisdiction under the Court of Criminal Appeal Act, and it was thought a very good thing to have a man in the position of the master of the Crown Office as head of the whole business, with such assistance underneath him and under his direction as might be necessary; so that we have, dealing immediately with the business of the magistrature of the Court of Criminal Appeal, an assistant master, who is Mr. Lawrance, a son of the late judge. I think that is a very much better arrangement. I am entirely opposed to Mr. Kershaw's suggestion.

55,351. Mr. Kershaw's suggestion was that the work of the registrar of the Court of Criminal Appeal is very heavy, often very urgent, and much of it has to be performed by himself personally; and he suggested that there is really more work than one man can properly perform. If that is the case, would you meet it by giving him further assistance rather than by separating the offices?—I do not think he does require further assistance. I have not studied his evidence, but my own belief at this moment is that the business of the Crown Office, which also comprises the Associates Department and the business of the registrar of the Court of Criminal Appeal, is amply provided for by the present arrangements, where you have the master of the Crown Office with three assistant masters. One assistant master, Mr. Lawrance, devotes himself to the Criminal Appeal work, Mr. Lawford devotes himself to the Associates work, and Mr. Coleridge is in the Crown Office part of the department.

55,352. There is one point on which I should like to ask you to clear up an obscurity with reference to the Supreme Court of Judicature (Officers) Act, 1879. In that Act there are two sections which apply to questions of pensions for officers of the Supreme Court; Section 20 lays down that an officer of the Supreme Court appointed after the commencement of this Act shall not be entitled to a pension unless he has a Civil Service certificate, and goes on to say: "the Lord Chancellor may from time to time with the concurrence of the Treasury declare that this section shall not apply to any office or class of offices specified in the Order." There is also Section 17, which gives the Lord Chancellor power to declare that a certain office requires special and professional qualifications, and that renders it lawful for the Treasury to add a certain number of years to service for the purposes of pension. Have both those sections been applied in practice?—Certainly.

55,353. Have orders been made under both those sections?—Certainly.

55,354. Do they apply to different classes of cases or to the same class?—The effect of Section 20 is that masters and registrars and all that class of people who are appointed late in life and who have professional qualifications and are not subjected to any examination and so forth, do not have Civil Service certificates. When they come to apply for a pension on retirement—for instance, I shall have to do it in the course of a few days—they have to state, under a particular clause in the application which says, "Give the date of your Civil Service certificate," "I have not got one because I am exempt under Section 20."

55,355. Then numerous orders have been made under that section?—I believe they have been made. I remember certain orders. When a new office has been created of this class we always have to make an order, with the consent of the Treasury, under Section 20.

55,356. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) Could we have a list of offices affected by these orders?—I should think you could have a list of who they are, roughly. The masters and registrars are a very distinct class in our organisation—it is the upper class to whom the orders apply.

55,357. (Chairman.) Orders have also been made under Section 17?—Yes, Section 17 is, almost verbatim, Section 4 of the Superannuation Act, is it not? When all this class of officers were brought as nearly as could be at the time into the Civil Service, it was almost necessary that Section 17 should be put in force.

55,358. When an order has been made under Section 20, exempting the holder of an office from the necessity of having a Civil Service certificate, has an order also been made usually under Section 17?—Not invariably, but usually.

Sir KENNETH AUGUSTUS MUIR MACKENZIE, G.C.B., K.C.

55,359. The class of officers exempted under Section 20 would usually be officers to which the professional qualification clause would also apply?—One would have answered that simply, yes, a few years ago; but, of course, in recent times there has been an objection to adding years. The subject was dealt with by the Royal Commission; we had it before us and we recommended the abolition of Clause 4, and I think Clause 4 has been abolished, but I do not think that anything which has been done touches Clause 17 of the Judicature Act as far as I know. I should expect, if I approached the Treasury with regard to some office under Section 17, to be told that the Treasury intended to act upon the analogy of the repeal of Section 4. Of course, all the masters and registrars have an addition of years under the old practice.

55,360. In your former evidence you expressed an opinion as to the fixing of an age for retirement?—Yes.

55,361. We have had some further evidence on that point, and I think I may say that, generally speaking, though some witnesses preferred to have no limit of age at all, the majority of the witnesses accepted the view that the Civil Service limits should apply to the clerical offices generally, and that the age of 70 should apply to offices, such as those of masters and registrars, of a judicial or semi-judicial character. Have you anything to add to the opinions you have already expressed on that point?—The only thing I have to add is, that I feel so strongly about it that I am resigning my own office on the ground that I shall be 70 in a few days.

55,362. (Mr. Matheson.) A question about the grading of clerks. Is it not rather bad economy to have in an office like the Probate Registry, for instance, something like 103 clerks and to use for them entirely a class of men who have some professional experience, and who really, so far as one can gather, are, many of them, rather above the work which occupies a great deal of their time?—I think there is a disadvantage in that. It is probably one of the chief disadvantages that arises under our present system, which has its disadvantages, although on the whole I think it is the best system.

55,363. I find a difficulty in the numbers. Taking the Probate Registry, there are a total of 103 clerks, of whom 64 are third class clerks. Many of those men in the third class are really men of rather high qualifications who come in in the hope that ultimately they may rise to the first class; but the very fact that the third class occupies so large a proportion of the whole must mean, I think, that for a very considerable time they are doing inferior work, and I cannot help thinking that it tends to produce both slackness and discontent. I should like to know whether you think that can be met in any way. So far, it seems to me the evidence is rather in favour—certainly in some offices—of making a more or less distinct class below?—I thought, perhaps, you were coming to that. It does look to me—supposing that is the case—that with those 64 men of the third class in the Probate Registry, it might be that you should take a certain proportion of that number and make it into a fourth class, or give it some other name, and not allow any work of quite so routine a nature as you are referring to to appertain to any of the clerks who are appointed with such qualifications as enable them to look forward to better things.

55,364. (Sir John Kempe.) I rather gather that you think the proposal for a selection committee is more suitable for the higher grades of official life than for first entrants?—Yes, I think so.

55,365. In fact, you are rather inclined to the open competition principle for these lower posts?—Yes.

55,366. I suppose, too, the fact that there are uniform scales of pay rather points to a uniform method of appointment and not to the appointment by different people, which results, of course, in different classes of men being in the Service. A uniform scale would rather suggest a more uniform system of appointment than can be got by individual appointments?—I am not sure that I quite follow that, but I do not see, as I said before, any difficulty in introducing open competition for the lowest grade of our clerks.

55,367. At any rate, do you not think that a system of personal selection rather results in giving men a feeling of a personal and individual claim rather than as being members of one big body. Do not you think it makes it more difficult on questions of promotion by selection and retirement on a limit of age if a man is appointed for individual reasons, than would be the case in a body of men who got in by open competition. Is not that one of the reasons of the difficulty of promotion by selection?—Do you mean that a man who is appointed by a particular authority would expect that authority to look after him and promote him?

55,368. Something of that feeling?—I should not have thought there was much in that; but I think that is one of the objections that appertains to the system of simple patronage. I agree that it is one of the elements.

55,369. If he gets in by open competition he is in a general service, and he feels he has got to conform to general rules, and does not have any claim to personal selection or promotion?—I think there is a great deal of truth in that.

55,370. If any alterations are made, would there be any difficulty in applying a new system in consequence of any rights; that is to say, would there be a right of promotion by seniority or a right of staying on after a fixed age. Would you have to compensate men for that, do you think?—I do not think so. I do not think our clerks have got any title of that kind. I think there is no doubt that the Lord Chancellor and the Treasury, if a man had been appointed without any limit of age being then named were turned out at a limit of age afterwards introduced, would take into consideration that question when they were arranging about his superannuation; but I do not think he has any legal claim under our system.

55,371. You think you could give up the system of promotion by seniority at once and go to selection?—Certainly. There is no difficulty with regard to seniority. No man has any claim to promotion by seniority in any of our departments.

55,372. You spoke of law departments being supported solely by fees. That has reference only to the personnel, because, looking at the Estimates, I see the total cost of the Supreme Court, taking all the buildings, stationery, and everything, is far beyond the fees collected?—I do not think I am prepared to say that at this moment. There are certain things, of course, like the salaries of the judges and so on, that are on the Consolidated Fund, and which, in principle, are supposed to be given to the suitor for nothing, but the suitor is supposed to pay for his own proceedings.

55,373. The cost of the vote for the Supreme Court is covered by the gross receipts, but not more than that. Everything else, the buildings, the stationery, and the judges are provided for separately and cost as much again?—The matter of the buildings is rather a complicated one. It is a very large question that is embodied, I think, in an Act of 1865, which was called the Courts of Justice Buildings Act, when there was a great financial operation by Mr. Gladstone, who took possession of the suitors' money and built the Law Courts. It was a very fine operation and a very long story, which I will not enter into. I think, on the whole, the suitor did not get the best of the arrangement which was then made, and that you will find that the suitor does indeed pay for everything that he ought to pay for. I do not think the suitor is a charge on the country in any way, except as to those things which, on principle, going back to Magna Charta, he ought to have for nothing. There is a scale of fees for proceedings in the Supreme Court that is laid down by the Lord Chancellor, with the concurrence of three other judges of the Supreme Court and the Treasury, to cover so much, at any rate, of the cost of the administration of justice as is considered proper in point of principle to fall upon the suitor and not to be paid for by the country. So between those two authorities—the Lord Chancellor, who is supposed to represent the suitor, and the Treasury, which is supposed to represent the public purse and to represent the knowledge of finance—there is an agreement that the scale of fees shall be so arranged as to raise money enough to cover all that class of expenditure.

Sir KENNETH AUGUSTUS MUIR MACKENZIE, G.C.B., K.C.

55,374. (Mr. Coward.) The scale of fees applies to all cases, whether small or great; it is the same scale. You pay, for instance, 2*l.* to enter a case for trial whether you have 20*l.* involved or 200,000*l.*?—Yes.

55,375. (Sir John Kempe.) I appreciate your point that the buildings are provided by the suitor. I understand that the fees would cover the ordinary expenses?—Yes.

55,376. The Land Registry fees cover still more—the buildings and all?—I suppose if there was a deficit upon our account the Treasury would call upon the Lord Chancellor to revise and raise his scale of fees.

55,377. Might not you get it out of the Building Fund?—I do not say the Lord Chancellor would be compelled by statute to provide a balance. It was an agreement made in 1884.

55,378. I suppose you would fall back on the suitors' fund; that is to say, the Treasury, having taken the suitors' funds, would have to pay the difference so far as the buildings are concerned?—Yes, I think they would.

55,379. (Miss Haldane.) As I gather, you see no objection to men coming in in the lower clerical class by open competition. I want to know whether you would see any objection to also admitting to that competition, women?—You know that my views in favour of the employment of women are very strong, and I really see no objection. There is the objection just now of habit, and there is a sort of objection which, I think, I mentioned on a former occasion, that we have said that the class from whom these men are best recruited is a class that contains no women at present, so that until you get women employed as clerks in solicitors' offices, and until you get them admitted into the legal profession, it is rather difficult to see how they could come in, or, at least, how they would be likely to come into our offices.

55,380. You think the first step should be to have them admitted to the legal profession?—I am inclined to think so; but still I am so strongly in favour of the employment of women that I do not think I would wait for that if I was kept too long.

55,381. In fact, you think they might apply their qualifications otherwise, supposing there was a delay in that desirable result?—Yes.

55,382. We have a good deal of evidence about, for instance, the Scrivenery Department, and it struck some of us that a great deal of that work might very usefully be done by women; in fact, one has sometimes thought that a department like that might be almost entirely a women's department, like some of the Post Office departments?—I think so. I have had a good deal to do with the Office of the Public Trustee, and we recognise them there to the very full.

55,383. There, I believe, since we had evidence about it, a great many more places have been filled by women?—Yes. I am not quite sure whether they are employing women just now in the Central Scrivenery Department of the Law Courts or not.

55,384. (Chairman.) I think they have one woman typist?—There is no question that they might have them. I do not understand why they have not.

55,385. (Miss Haldane.) Also, I think, from the evidence we have heard, some of us have been inclined to think that typewriting might be used a great deal more than it is used, and that that would be an additional reason for employing women?—I am not very sure about that. I think I would rather not express an opinion as to whether typewriting could be much used in our legal offices at the Royal Courts of Justice. I have not really considered it very much. I should be surprised, of course, to be told that it could not be done, because it is done universally everywhere now; but I think it is quite possible that you might find, when you ask those who are concerned with the actual work, that they were not very willing to accept the suggestion.

55,386. Still you would not make the admission of women dependent upon the use of typewriting?—No.

55,387. You spoke quite strongly on the subject of the admission of women to various departments when you last gave evidence. Is there anything you would like to say in further application of that?—No, I do not think so. You may recollect that I went very far in that direction.

55,388. You went very far indeed, and you adhere to your views on that point?—I adhere to them now.

55,389. (Sir Donald MacAlister.) Supposing we decided that it was desirable to establish a lower grade clerical class, purely and simply clerical, and a higher grade which might aspire to higher posts, how would you propose to recruit the higher class apart from promotions?—I suppose that they would, under the proposals that are at present under consideration by the Commission, be appointed by a sort of Appointment Board.

55,390. And not by competition?—I should rather doubt whether you could use competition for that higher class.

55,391. (Mr. Boutwood.) It would be wholly professional, would it not?—The higher class would be almost entirely professional, I think, and I do not think you could make them subject to open competition. But I do not feel very strongly upon the subject. I have not really very fully considered it I am afraid.

55,392. (Sir Donald MacAlister.) I am anxious just to know whether you think the higher class should be purely professional, because, if so, I was going to ask you why?—Because I think if you had the kind of division of work that that implies, all, or almost all, of the work would be legal work in the professional sense; it would be entirely professional work. I think it would have to be a man who was actually called to the Bar, or actually admitted as a solicitor, or at any rate had gone completely through both the intellectual and the practical training for one or other of those branches of the profession.

55,393. Supposing these offices were open only to barristers or admitted solicitors, would there be any difficulty in having a competitive examination. The age is not prohibitive, is it?—I think we settled here when we discussed this question before that open competition was not applicable to people above a certain age—27, I think, was the age mentioned.

55,394. But you are not contemplating that age for the higher grade, are you?—I think it would be very near that.

55,395. Then your answer would be, as I understand it, that the higher grade would be recruited at an age something like 27, that professional qualifications would be required, and that open competition would therefore not be applicable?—It looks like that, but I do not wish to feel too much bound by it, because this is not a scheme of mine, you understand. It is only suggested to me here as to what I think about it. I do not feel certain as to what would be the age or what could be the difficulties of open competition. Though the way that you have stated it seems to me about as good as one could wish to hear it stated, yet I should not like to be completely bound as to that being the system that would be carried out, and as to whether there might not be another system whereby you could bring in open competition. After what has taken place in this Commission before, I should not like to say anything that kept open competition out of the legal departments where it can properly be brought in.

55,396. (Sir John Kempe.) What do you mean by the higher grades—the masters or the registrars?—No, I was meaning the first and second class clerks.

55,397. (Mr. Coward.) There is one question that the Chairman did not refer to, and that is the possible amalgamation of the offices of the masters and registrars. I do not know whether you have considered that. At present masters make orders in chambers, those orders go to the registrars, and we find that it takes probably three weeks to get an order perfected. It has been suggested that there has been an immense waste of time and waste of everything, and that it might be possible to arrange a scheme by which the masters should complete and perfect the orders that are made by them. I do not know whether you have had that within your mind at all?—I have always thought for years that it ought to be done. I rather thought that I had committed myself to a recommendation of that point in one of my papers. I am still of the same opinion. I have thought it was feasible and desirable.

6 May 1915.]

Sir KENNETH AUGUSTUS MUIR MACKENZIE, G.C.B., K.C.

55,398. A very great difficulty that I should like to see the answer to is, how these offices can be conducted, so that there shall be someone who shall have control and see what is done, so that there shall be no wastage. Personally, I have not been able to find out what the answer to that is. I do not know whether you could help me?—I do not know whether you have amongst the documents before you the Report of the Legal Offices Committee of 1874. I think Lord Bramwell was a member of that committee or commission, and he made a recommendation that there should be an officer appointed, whom he proposed to be an officer with a higher salary than anybody in the Royal Courts of Justice; he described him as a somewhat peripatetic person who should be always moving about and keeping himself au fait with the whole of the Royal Courts of Justice. Such a person never has been appointed, and I do not think I should like to occupy the office myself if it were offered to me.

55,399. Nor do you think it would be effective?—No, I do not think it would be effective.

55,400. I do not myself think that that would do. But it is extremely difficult to see how you could have a control which should be effective?—No; I think with the class of men that you appoint as masters, registrars, and so forth, you ought to be able to have confidence that they would themselves work up to the full measure, and that they would see that their subordinates did the same.

55,401. Take a master, for instance: the master has certain work to perform; he has summonses brought before him, and applications made to him. As far as I can make out, he does not exercise control over those who are beneath him. When we have had before us clerks in these offices they have been unable to tell us what they do in the day; time after time we have asked them what they do and what work they have to perform. There should be somebody there who should be able to control, and be able to tell exactly what every clerk does every day. I do not see why there should be any great difference between the work that should be done by the master and that which I, personally, or anybody in my position, has to do; it seems to me very much the same. I could tell what people do. But we do not seem to have the same experience and explanation afforded by those in position here. The master comes and does his work, and out he goes. It seems to me a difficulty to get somebody who shall control the offices, and see that there are sufficient men to do the work, and not too many, so that there is no overlapping. There was one gentleman, a clerk, who gave evidence yesterday, who said, "we help each other." We know what helping each other means. I do not know whether you can give us any light and leading upon this, but I should be very grateful to you if you could?—I do not know that I can. I feel rather inclined to appeal to the committee of control, if you appoint a committee of control who are supposed to do what they do now—make a report at the end of every year to the Lord Chancellor. I received the report for last year from the Central Office about three days ago, signed by the senior master on behalf of the committee of control, and giving a report as to what was the state of the office. I should have said that those who made themselves responsible for a report of that kind ought to be able to give an answer to the sort of question that you are putting—I do not say an answer in detail; you do not expect them to be walking about all day long to see who is doing anything, but to be able to give a sound and satisfactory answer to the question, "what do they do in room so-and-so?"

55,402. I should, myself, like to consider it from this kind of standpoint: Take a solicitor's office; you may have a great many clerks—not so many as in the legal departments, who come to just about 208—but there are a great many solicitor's offices with a fourth of that number. In my place, if we wanted some Chancery work done, I and my partners would equally send it to the man who has that under his control. We do not have a divided office so that each man has his own compartment, as it were. That is rather what I think is done to a considerable extent in these offices—in the Chancery offices, for instance. I cannot think that can be right. Perhaps it is not a question that I ought to propound to you?—I have a sort of general feeling that I should like to be able to answer any question that is put to me, but I do not feel prepared at the moment to make a statement in detail about either what is the exact practice amongst the clerks in the office, or, indeed, what it ought to be. I could quite understand this Commission saying that they were not entirely satisfied with the account that was given to them; that they had views as to what were the lines upon which the chambers ought to be worked for the future; and that they recommended that that should be carefully looked into. I could quite understand your doing that, but it will not be my function, I regret to say, to carry out those views. If I were remaining in office, I should, of course, upon a suggestion of that sort, proceed to look into it in detail, but I do not think I could give you, or could be expected to give you, a detailed answer to your question just now.

55,403. There is another thing, that is, that these people in these offices have very easy hours and very long vacations. They leave each day at 4 o'clock. The kind of suggestion they make with regard to the hours is this: They say those are very easy hours, but the solicitors do not want to be there beyond that time, having letters to write, and so on—which is perfectly true; but it is a matter of surprise to me that there should not be, if the work is properly done, a great deal of work to do after those hours are ended. I do not know whether you have considered that?—I have considered it often. I entirely agree with you.

55,404. Similarly, with regard to the vacations, the same thing arises. People ought to have proper vacations?—I have never concealed the opinion that I consider the Long Vacation ridiculous.

55,405. The Lord Chancellor says that there should be none?—I have always been of that opinion.

55,406. The courts should be continually open?—So I have always thought.

55,407. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) You told us that part of the effect of the Judicature Acts was the transference of the control of the various legal departments, which had hitherto been largely independent, to the single control of the Lord Chancellor. Has that process gone on as completely in the case of the various probate offices as in the case of the other legal departments. Is the control of the Lord Chancellor over the Probate Registry of the same character as his control over the other legal departments?—No, certainly not.

55,408. Could you indicate shortly the main points of difference between the two measures of control?—It is very short, because, although the Lord Chancellor is responsible for the constitution of the office—I do not know whether the order was before you which was made in 1882 under which the Lord Chancellor, the President of the Probate Division, and the Treasury constituted the office with so many first, so many second, and so many third class clerks like the other departments. All that goes on there is under the direct control, without interference from the Lord Chancellor, of the President of the Probate Division.

55,409. Are the departments under the President of the Probate Division the only exceptions of that kind in the London legal departments. Are all the others controlled by the Lord Chancellor?—I should say it is the only exception, including the Admiralty Registry—all the offices of that Division.

55,410. Do you know any reason except the historical reason why that exception should in fact be made?—I think the general principle of the Judicature Acts is that the President of the Division should rule in that Division, and manage it. The Lord Chancellor is President of the Chancery Division. Besides being President of the whole of the Supreme Court, he is also in that respect a member of the High Court of Justice and he is President of the Chancery Division. That makes him manager of the Chancery Division. Then the Common Law Divisions, which existed when that general enactment was made, were amalgamated under that later Act of 1879, by which certain offices were combined together into the Central Office, and the control of the Central Office was given, in the words of the statute, to the masters who were reconstituted by that Act. The supreme control over them I do not think is very clear upon the Act of Parliament. I have always thought that it was open to the contention, if they had chosen to make it, of the Lord Chief Justice and the Master of the Rolls that they were joint authorities over the office with the Lord Chancellor; but as a matter of fact it has worked otherwise, and there being no one person who can be called, as President, the authority over the Central Office, the Lord Chancellor has acted as that authority.

55,411. So that, in fact, the Lord Chancellor is now responsible for the administration not only of the Chancery departments but of the Common Law departments?—Practically, yes.

55,412. Putting aside that very interesting historical reason, do you see any reason in the public interest why the process which has in fact been applied to the Common Law departments should not be applied to the department under the presidency of the Probate Judge?—I think the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty are so much apart from the ordinary legal work that the President of the Probate Division would always require to have, and properly would have, a very important voice in the working of that department, although, according to the principle of the Judicature Acts, the Chancellor ought to be finally responsible, and on the principle that he is the Minister, and the only Minister, responsible to Parliament in the matter, I think it would be desirable that his authority in the matter should be more definitely expressed than it is at present. That is my own opinion, which is given without any suggestion that the Probate Office has not been, ever since I can recollect, extremely well worked. I do not imagine that there would have been any difference if the Lord Chancellor had interfered unless I am more ignorant of the facts than I believe myself to be.

55,413. Would you say that if the Lord Chancellor were made definitely and clearly responsible to Parliament for the administration of all these legal departments it would be necessary to follow the analogy of other Government departments and provide him with a sufficient administrative department of his own through which he could exercise his control?—I can conceive my successor having a view of that kind. It happens that things have grown up during my time, whether it be for good or for bad, so much under my control that I do not feel as if, looking back, I wanted to say that there need be anything different.

55,414. But I think you agreed, for one thing, when we were talking about this before, that it would be very desirable that the Lord Chancellor should have someone in the nature of a Political Under Secretary of State to assist him in Parliament?—That I have a very strong opinion upon, as I ventured to state before.

55,415. Looking at the actual department of the Lord Chancellor's officers, there is yourself and there is Mr. Liddell—who are obviously high officers—then there are, excluding messengers, three gentlemen with salaries between 200*l.* and 450*l.*, and two gentlemen with salaries below 200*l.*, and no one else. Do you think that if one were building up an important office to control the administration of the whole of the judicial services again that would be exactly the office one would build up?—I doubt whether it would be.

55,416. You put forward to us the principle that there should be a pyramid. There is no sign of a pyramid in that office?—No, I do not think there is. There is only one pyramid.

55,417. It is not clear, for instance, that here you are training your successor?—No, that is certain.

55,418. You are not training your successor?—No.

55,419. Do not you think it would be desirable to reconsider the general structure of the Lord Chancellor's personal office?—I must say I think it is very difficult for me to answer that.

55,420. No one can answer it so well because no one has so long an experience of its difficulties and the way in which those difficulties can be overcome by personal zeal. In each of the legal departments there is someone who is either generally described as senior master or senior registrar?—Yes.

55,421. And he is generally given a somewhat larger salary, and has a kind of responsibility for the administration of the office?—That is so.

55,422. Would you agree first that that kind of responsibility is at present somewhat ill-defined?—It certainly is ill-defined.

55,423. Would you agree also that in principle there has sprung up the habit of using the word "senior" to mean "age." The senior registrar or the senior master means the master or registrar who has held his office longest?—That is who he is, in fact. The master or registrar becomes senior master or senior registrar because he has been the one longest there.

55,424. Is that the case by statute? To change that would one have to change the statute?—As far as the statute is concerned the senior master only applies to the Central Office on what is sometimes called the Common Law side. It has been a recent creation which has nothing to do with the statute in the department of the Chancery chambers. I think the Bankruptcy registrar is called the senior registrar in the statute.

55,425. Do you think it would be an advantage to have one of the high officers in each of those departments made responsible for the administration more definitely than the senior officer is now, and that he should be appointed by the Lord Chancellor for other reasons than seniority solely?—I think there would be an advantage, but I do not think it very likely that it could be carried out. The masters and registrars are all on an equality. The senior is only primus inter pares, and, elsewhere than in the Central Office and perhaps the Bankruptcy Office, it has only been as a matter of convenience that the correspondence with reference to the office should be carried on with some one person.

55,426. But, putting aside the difficulties of tradition in the way, if such an arrangement could be made, do you think it would be a good arrangement?—I do.

55,427. I want to read you a very few words from the evidence of Master Fox. He was asked, "Is the discipline of the office also in compartments?" and he answered, "Yes, certainly. Each master is responsible for the discipline in his own department." He then explained that a group of three masters keeps a time-book; but when asked, "You have no means of knowing what the custom with regard to time-books may be in the chambers of any other master except those 'three'?" he answered, "No, I do not know." Then he stated that clerks were allowed, he believed, something like 20 minutes' grace; that is to say, they may enter themselves as being punctually there if they are not more than 20 minutes late; but he said if there was any difference in that respect the master concerned would not know of such a difference. He then stated that there is no means of knowing whether any uniformity of practice exists as to the period during which a clerk may be away for sickness without your attention being brought to it; he said, the master responsible would communicate with Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie, but when he was asked whether any steps were taken to secure uniformity of practice in that respect, he answered, "No." From the point of administration, do you think that that is wholly satisfactory?—No, I do not think it is.

55,428. Do you think it would be desirable to secure uniformity in such elementary matters as what the meaning of an entry in a book stating that you are there by 10 o'clock is, or how long a man could be absent through sickness without the attention of the Lord Chancellor being called to it?—Yes, I should have thought there was practical uniformity throughout the chambers of the Chancery Division in that respect. But if Master Fox says otherwise, he knows better than I do, and he may be entirely relied upon as to anything he says.

55,429. When I asked him whether any measures were taken to secure uniformity of practice, his full answer was, "No; I think really the practice there is governed by the Lord Chancellor's secretary"—who is yourself?—Yes.

6 May 1915.]

Sir KENNETH AUGUSTUS MUIR MACKENZIE, G.C.B., K.C.

55,430. Are you aware of having laid down any definite rules to secure uniformity in that respect?—No, I cannot say that. Of course, the communications that come from me are, no doubt, pretty much the same, whether they are written to one master or another, and in that respect I should have thought that they would have had the effect of producing considerable uniformity. I should say that I have not observed any unreasonable diversity in the communications that I have had upon these subjects from different masters.

55,431. (Chairman.) When communicating about a question of that kind relating to a clerk in Chancery chambers, or a question of sick leave, do you communicate with the particular master under whom the clerk is working or with the committee of masters which you mentioned exists?—The communication would almost certainly be with the master under whom he is working. If some general question arose, or was suggested to me, out of the particular cases that come before me, I should probably write to the senior master to say that there was such a practice which appeared to be growing up, and I should like to know what he thought about it, or would he ask the other masters on the committee what they thought about it.

55,432. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) You said that for officers leading in the ordinary course of promotion to the more important and administrative work of these departments, in your judgment professional qualifications are necessary?—I think so, certainly, for the upper class.

55,433. Would you agree that care ought to be taken that those professional qualifications should represent a serious and important degree of training, and that you should not limit your area of possible applicants by insisting upon such a qualification as a few months as office boy in a solicitor's office or some other unreal qualification?—I am sure you do not mean to suggest that I would propose what I thought was any unreal qualification.

55,434. No. I want your great authority on that side—that great care should be taken not to limit the area of selection in any way, unless for full and sufficient reasons represented by a high degree of training and qualification?—My view is—though there I am not sure that I am quite at one with some of the officers in the department—that a man with no very high degree or no very great length of professional qualifications or training, and who is a man of ability, may come in at the bottom in the third class, and that such a man is able to train himself in the office, so that in course of time he may be quite an efficient clerk fit to go up to such a salary as 600*l.* a year.

55,435. That is to say, if you are going to bring in a boy of 18 to 20 it is very much more important that he should be a boy of ability than that he should have had a few months or years' experience as office boy in an office?—I am inclined to go with you there. I think ability is the first thing.

55,436. Then you said you would only discuss the question of the proposed committee to advise the Lord Chancellor as a hypothesis, and that you were not responsible for it?—No, I am not.

55,437. Discussing it in that way, hypothetically, do you think it would be a better arrangement that that committee should confine itself to original appointments or that it should also give responsible advice on questions of promotion?—I rather think that the sort of committee which Lord Loreburn described ought to be confined to original appointments.

55,438. You will remember that in our fourth report we proposed to make it normal that inside each office there should be a strictly official committee representing various forms of experience, and that that strictly official committee should recommend to the head of the office on matters of promotion. Do you think that that would be a possible arrangement in the legal offices?—I can see nothing in the nature of the legal offices to make that recommendation of ours not apply to them, and, as I think I agreed to that recommendation, I should not like to make any independent recommendation of my own with reference to the legal offices.

55,439. You said after the action of Parliament in deliberately refusing a large reconstruction of the lunacy arrangements you thought that the keeping up of a lay, or in this case a legal, visitor was necessary?—I think it is a good thing.

55,440. We had Mr. Mansfield here and he told us that his main work was done by travelling, that he was travelling anything from 110 to 120 days in the year, and that on the other days, to use his words, "Perhaps I ought not to say that my duties do not exist, but they are not onerous." If his work is so useful, would it not be possible for us to get a little more of it?—Of course it would be a very good thing both for him and everybody else if he could have more; but it must be limited by the number of patients who come in under that jurisdiction. When a vacancy occurred through the retirement of Mr. Palmer, who was the legal visitor, the question whether the office should be filled up or not was very carefully considered, and, I think, it was kept vacant for a little time, but I cannot be sure about that, at the moment. But it was then in contemplation to unite that office with the Commissioners in Lunacy; in fact, it never occurred to me for a moment that that was not going to be done; I thought it was certainly going to be done. Mr. Mansfield was told, and very willingly accepted the idea, that he would become part of the new consolidated office, and would take such business as could properly be assigned to him.

55,441. But if under the existing system the amount of work falls off to a seriously large extent, it would be obviously better to employ someone who was only giving part of his time to the work?—If you could find an appropriate person for that work.

55,442. With regard to the employment of women, putting aside the higher administrative inspectorial employment of women, there have been two main forms—the employment of women as typists and the employment of women in clerical work in departments and sub-departments where practically the whole of the clerical work is done by women. Is it not the case that in the Post Office, where they employ a lot of women clerks, as a rule they have a sub-department of work staffed by women?—No doubt that is so.

55,443. Supposing it was suggested that the work of storing, registering, and handling wills in the Probate Registry at Somers House could be gradually turned into such a department, manned, if I may say so, throughout by women, do you think that that might be a good arrangement from the point of view of the public interest?—I do not think my evidence is of much worth with regard to that particular office, because I do not know it intimately; but I cannot imagine that there could be any difficulty or objection.

55,444. Or that the work done there is unsuitable for skilled women?—No, I cannot conceive that it could be.

55,445. (Mr. Shipley.) It seemed to me from the evidence we have had that the Lord Chancellor has work that would occupy five or six busy and active men. Have any steps ever been taken to relieve of some of this work a very overworked man with immense responsibility?—No attempt that I know of.

55,446. The work is, I should think, becoming increasingly responsible, and he is increasingly overworked?—There is, no doubt, a great deal to do.

55,447. There has been no inquiry as to whether some of his work could be given to somebody else?—No, I think not.

55,448. (Mrs. Deane Streetfeild.) Mr. Graham Wallas asked you a question with regard to the visitors in the Lunacy Department, and you said that there might be some difficulty about the employment of a woman visitor, because the work at present was hardly more than could be done by those who are already doing it?—Yes.

55,449. Would not it, perhaps, be desirable in that case that a woman should be employed part time in special cases?—Yes, I see no objection to that at all. I think it is a very good suggestion, if I may say so.

55,450. (Chairman.) You told us that in the Central Office appointments are made in rotation by the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Chief Justice, and the Master of the Rolls, and also that there was a separate arrangement for the appointment of the masters and the appointment of the clerks. Is it the case that that arrangement has been to some extent modified as regards the appointment of the masters?—A change came when there was the consolidation of the different Taxing Offices. A practical arrangement was arrived at, at the time, that the Lord Chancellor should appoint to any vacancy that occurred in the enlarged Taxing Office, and that on the other hand only the Lord Chief Justice and the Master of the Rolls should appoint to any vacancy arising among the masters in the ordinary Central Office.

6 May 1915.]

Sir KENNETH AUGUSTUS MUIR MACKENZIE, G.C.B., K.C.

55,451. That arrangement applies to the masters only, and not to the clerks?—It applies to the masters only. There is no actual arrangement existing in writing, but that is the practice at this moment; it might be changed at any time if these three authorities were to be dissatisfied with what was going on.

55,452. Turning now to the provincial offices, I should like in the first place to be clear as to the present arrangements with regard to the registrars and the combination of the different offices. It is the case, is it not, that the High Court registrar and the Probate registrar are the same person in three places—Manchester, Liverpool, and Ipswich?—That is so.

55,453. And nowhere else?—As far as I recollect at the moment, nowhere else at present.

55,454. The High Court and County Court registrars are the same person at all other places where there is a High Court registry—some 86 in number?—Yes, I think everywhere.

55,455. But the Probate and the County Court registrars are nowhere combined in the same persons?—Except for a time at Ipswich.

55,456. At Ipswich he is the Probate registrar and the High Court registrar?—And, I think, also for a time the County Court registrar.

55,457. I think he was at one time, but is so no longer?—It will appear in the Law List.

55,458. In your former evidence you told us that the County Court registrar is everywhere appointed by the judge of the County Court, subject to the approval of the Lord Chancellor?—Yes.

55,459. And that the result of that was that where the offices of the County Court registrar and the High Court registrar were combined, in effect and in practice, the appointment rested with the County Court judge, subject to the approval of the Lord Chancellor?—Yes, practically.

55,460. And you suggested in those cases, at any rate, the appointment ought to be made by the Lord Chancellor?—It seems to me so, and I think that a clause to that effect in the County Court Bill has been two or three times before Parliament. I think it may be taken, as far as the Government is concerned, that is their view, but whether it would pass I do not know. It might be that there is some opposition to it. I do not know why there should be.

55,461. In the case of the other County Courts where there is not a High Court registry also, would you leave the appointment to be made as it is at present by the County Court judge, with the approval of the Lord Chancellor?—My own general opinion, as you know, is against appointments being in the hands of anybody but responsible Ministers; but the practical difficulty, the intolerable burden which it would be to have to appoint to the small registries, is so great that I do not think it would be on the whole a very wise and practical proposal to say that the Lord Chancellor should appoint to all the County Court registries.

55,462. In practice, does the present system give satisfaction in its results. Are suitable persons appointed to be County Court registrars?—I think so. The approval of the Lord Chancellor is by no means perfunctory. I do that business myself; I write to the County Court judges, and they are always very pleasant to deal with about it. There is no difficulty about communicating with them and learning from them exactly who it is that they propose to appoint and on what grounds.

55,463. And you see no great objection, except the general objection on principle, to leaving that matter as it is?—No; but I do feel strongly about the High Court registries in those big places—first of all, upon the ground that a High Court officer ought not to be appointed by a County Court judge; and, secondly, that the appointments are large and important appointments. The class of people I refer to have all substantial salaries, and some of them high salaries, and I do not think it is consistent with the general practice with regard to appointments in the public service that they should be made by anyone except somebody of very high authority. I doubt whether the practical result would be very different, because the person who would be immediately consulted about the appointment on a vacancy occurring in one of those registries would almost certainly be the County Court judge. He knows about the place, and he knows the solicitors down there, out of whom one would be selected. But I think it would be desirable to put the thing the other way—to leave it to the Lord Chancellor to appoint where it is a High Court registry, feeling sure that he would consult the County Court judge on the subject.

55,464. At present only a small number of the County Court registrars are whole-time officers and pensionable—some 12, I think?—Very few. I do not recollect the number, but it must be a small number. A sort of effort is made upon every vacancy to get hold of a man who will give up his whole time; but, of course, it is only in some of the very large courts under the present system that you can get that. Under the law at present, every County Court district must have a separate registrar, and of course, therefore, it is only in places where the district comprises some really large towns you get an office where there is so much to do, and the pay is so high, that you can get a whole-timer.

55,465. Then you would be in favour of increasing the number of whole-time pensionable officers where it is practicable to do so?—Yes, I think so. We have always had reason to believe that a strong opinion is felt about that in Parliament. When the present County Court Act was passed in 1888, there was very great difficulty in preventing Parliament from enacting that every registrar was to be an officer kept out of practice, and in that sense a whole-timer. We managed to avoid that, and to get the Act passed without it, because in an immense number of districts you could not get a decent man under those circumstances, as there is a very small amount of money to give him, and he would have too little to do to keep him in proper condition.

55,466. Would it be possible to make more whole-time posts by uniting more than one court under one registrar?—I think that would be a very good thing to do.

55,467. It has been done in a few cases?—Yes, done by what is really an artificial arrangement. There is power to make a big district with so many places in which courts are held; but it really almost approaches to an evasion of the Act. I do not think it quite merits the condemnation of being called an evasion, but it is not exactly what the Act meant.

55,468. It has also been suggested by some witnesses that the number of small courts might be reduced; that the improvement in communications has rendered it unnecessary to have such a very large number of small courts in unimportant places?—That is a very difficult question. It is often recommended, especially by a County Court judge soon after he is appointed, that one or two small places should be abolished; but the opposition to it at once is so great that it becomes practically impossible to do it, and, generally, after a time the County Court judge ceases to hold so strong a view upon the subject.

55,469. (Mr. Coward.) It is like the question of the circuit system?—Very much the same.

55,470. The same principles apply; that is to say, you get the same local influences?—Yes, and I think, on the whole, the case is stronger for preserving the County Courts in small places than the circuits for small places, because it has more to do with the poor suitor, and the general sentiment about bringing the County Court judge to the poor suitor's door is stronger in the case of these small suitors than it is in the case of the more magnificent class of suitor who deals with the High Court.

6 May 1915.]

Sir KENNETH AUGUSTUS MUIR MACKENZIE, G.C.B., K.C.

55,471. But the peculiarity of it is that many places have grown up which are much larger than those in which the County Court exists, and which have no County Court?—That is so.

55,472. Yet if you were trying to move the court, from my experience with regard to circuits, you would find it quite impossible?—Many years ago Sir Francis Mowatt and I undertook to the Lord Chancellor and the Treasury that we would make a revision of all the County Courts, but, as a matter of fact, we never did it. It was sought to rectify it by a large use of Bradshaw, but it has never been done, and it would be very difficult to do it for the same reason that you referred to, which makes it so very difficult to make a reasonable arrangement with regard to the circuits.

55,473. (Chairman.) A similar question arises with regard to the smaller probate registries?—Yes, it is the same thing.

55,474. In the case of the smaller probate registries, the system being an older one, the divergence between their situation and the centres of population is even greater?—There is no doubt that they no longer correspond to the centres of population in the way in which, I suppose, they did when they were first instituted.

55,475. Would not it be desirable to make a change there and either to abolish some of the smaller registries or to concentrate them in larger centres of population?—I should have thought it was a reasonable thing to do, and probably a useful thing to do.

55,476. It has also been suggested by some witnesses that it would be advisable entirely to abolish the territorial limits which apply to the work of the different registries and to allow a will to be presented for probate wherever it may be desired?—You are referring now only to probate districts and not to the district registries of the High Court?

55,477. I am speaking now of the probate registries?—I do not think I am competent to answer that question. I cannot see any objection myself, but there may be objections of which I am not aware.

55,478. It was pointed out to us that considerable inconvenience arises from the present system. An instance was given of a man whose work is in Liverpool, whose business man is in Liverpool, but who happens to live on the other side of the river. If his will is to be proved at the district registry it must be proved at Chester and not in Liverpool. Any inconvenience of that kind, it was suggested, would be avoided if the territorial limits were abolished, and if, in a case such as that, his representatives were at liberty to prove the will at Liverpool or anywhere they pleased?—I have not considered that question. I can only say that, speaking off-hand, I should have thought the abolition of these artificial districts would be a good thing.

55,479. Would it be possible or desirable to combine the probate registry with the High Court and County Court registries?—I have myself thought that it ought to be done.

55,480. That you should have the same registrar and a combined office?—Yes.

55,481. If the changes which you have recommended in the manner of making appointments to the legal offices were carried out that would facilitate the combination of the three posts of registrar of the High Court, registrar of the County Court, and Probate registrar?—Yes, I think so.

55,482. The combination of those offices again would facilitate the solution of the difficulty which exists in creating more whole-time pensionable posts?—I think so. I cannot help thinking that if the idea were carried out of having an important and authoritative sort of Appointments Board—such a thing as Lord Loreburn, at any rate, proposed—to some extent the objection to the judges having the ultimate authority and calling the office their appointment would be considerably mitigated; it is not quite the same thing as the appointments being absolutely in their own hands. Then if you take the suggestion that, I think, more commends itself to this Commission, namely, that you have a strong committee, but that you leave the ultimate responsibility in the hands of the Minister, I still think that in that case, treating the Lord Chief Justice or the President of the Probate Division as the ultimate authority, the objection is very much less than it is under the present circumstances. Assuming you take the appointment out of their hands, I am not sure that they ought not to have some voice or some representation upon the committee which deals with the appointments that come under their authority.

55,483. It was suggested that the head of the department should be a member of the committee for appointments in each department. Taking the case of the Probate Registry, I suppose that would be the senior registrar. Would that be sufficient representation of the President of the Division, or do you suggest that there should be separate representation of the President of the Division?—Of course, according to my personal view, the best thing is to abolish the right of the judge to appoint straight away—not with any reflection on the way a judge has exercised his power, but because, on principle, I think it ought to be in the hands of a Minister of the State. But if you are making an appointment within the department of which he has the practical management, as is the case with the Probate Division, I am not sure that he ought not to be at least made a necessary consultee, if not a necessary concurring party. I suggest that that requires some consideration if you are constituting a system abolishing all patronage except in the hands of a Minister of State.

55,484. In considering the probate registries a question arises with regard to what is termed the "agency business" done by the District Probate Registrars. We understand that in theory none of the registries do any business by correspondence, but that a system exists under which the registrars receive correspondence and do what is necessary to present the papers and so forth and assist to put them in order, and for that they charge certain fees. A question arose in the first place whether that was a proper system, and in the second place whether it would not be desirable that all registries, including the Principal Registry, should, as part of their normal duties, transact business by post as well as with personal applicants. Will you give us your opinion on that question?—Now that you mention it, I think there was some correspondence upon that subject some years ago between the Lord Chancellor and the President, and, I think, with the Law Society. My impression is that objection on principle was taken to that receiving of agency fees, but things were left alone because there was strong evidence of practical convenience that, as a matter of fact, it was a very useful thing to do, and that it was not large and at not an unreasonable cost, and that the registrars did not thereby obtain any very unreasonable addition to their remuneration. It was something of that sort; and it was left alone, according to my recollection. But I should have thought that taking fees and doing the agency business in a somewhat irregular way for money was a bad thing in principle and ought not to be allowed to continue. On the other hand, I cannot see why it should not be established, within whatever may be thought the proper limits, that business might be done by correspondence in those cases.

55,485. It would seem that that would be a convenience to the public in many cases?—Yes, probably. In fact, I think the practice that is referred to shows that it is a convenient thing. It has been allowed to continue, as I believe, just because it was a convenience; and, if it was a convenience, one does not quite see why it should not be part of the duty of the officer to act accordingly.

55,486. Certain registrars who gave evidence did not raise any objection to its being made a part of their official duties provided they received in some form an equivalent to the fees they at present receive. Do you think they would have a claim to receive an equivalent if that system were adopted?—It depends upon the amount of work they have to do and the salary they get. I think a registrar who gets a reasonable salary and has very little to do, might very reasonably be told to do this business which is put upon him without any increase to his salary. On the other hand, if his salary is very meagre and this is a substantial amount of business, one would naturally give him something.

55,487. (Mr. Coward.) If anyone came into his office and asked a question he would have to answer it?—Certainly.

55,488. If you take a case like Lewes, which has a district registry while Brighton has not, if a solicitor at Brighton wants to prove a will in the district registry he has either to go to Lewes or else communicate with the district registry and pay a fee for doing it, which seems absurd?—Yes.

55,489. (Chairman.) The staff employed by the district registries of the three kinds—County Court, Probate, and High Court—are, generally speaking, unpensionable and are appointed by the registrars themselves?—That is entirely so with the County Court and district registries. In the case of the probate registries I do not recollect at the moment how it is. I think they are on a different footing.

55,490. In the case of the probate registries the salaries are all fixed, we are told, under a scheme approved by the Treasury and the President of the division, and therefore they are not in the same position as the staff at the other registries, who are paid out of a lump sum?—No.

55,491. The clerks are appointed by the district registrar and are not pensionable?—The question whether they are pensionable or not is one which, I think, was raised as the subject of a long correspondence—a three-cornered correspondence between the Treasury, the Lord Chancellor, and one of the district probate registries, and the opinion of the law officers was taken two or three times; but those opinions, I think, did not agree with one another.

55,492. We were told a good deal about that, and it appeared that the last opinion on which the Treasury is now acting is that they are not pensionable?—Yes, I believe so.

55,493. Our attention has been called by several witnesses to the difficulty arising from the fact that these clerks are not pensionable; that when they grow old and past their work they cannot be turned out, except to go to the workhouse. The question arises whether that state of things could be remedied in any way. The suggestion has been made that for all these staffs—some of them are whole-time people and some are part-time, and some do work for the registrar in his private capacity as well as in his public capacity—a contributory pension system could be devised which would meet the case. Are you prepared to express an opinion on that?—I think a contributory system would be a very valuable thing for the clerks. I should like very much to see something of that sort exist.

55,494. We were told that a system of that kind does exist, for instance, for Poor Law officers, many of whom are part-time officers. You do not see prima facie any reason why such a system should not be devised?—None. But do you suggest that that should apply throughout all those offices?

55,495. It has been suggested that a system might be devised that would apply throughout, and would include even the part-timers?—Of course, there is a great distinction between the officers of a whole-time registrar and the officers of a registrar who practises privately, and whose official business does not occupy him more than a fraction of his time. There is a great distinction between those two. I can quite imagine the clerks in an office where the whole of their time is occupied on official business, saying that they did not see what the difference is between them and the clerks in the High Courts of Justice, and that they did not see why they should not be on the same system of salary and pension as those clerks. I should like to know whether you do not see a distinction between those two classes of clerks when you ask me a question about a contributory system.

55,496. I would suggest that the salaries of all those clerks, including those who are employed under a whole-time pensionable registrar, have been fixed on the basis of a non-pensionable system, and that therefore there would be nothing unreasonable, if they were made pensionable, in requiring from them a contribution to a contributory system, or in making some modification in their salaries in respect of the fact that they were being made pensionable, and that therefore they would have no real ground for complaint if they were included in a contributory system together with the part-time officers in the other registries?—I should not like to commit myself to that. The subject of the positions of clerks in offices like those of the solicitors to public departments was a good deal considered by this Commission, and we made recommendations about them, and I rather think that the clerks in the whole-time registries would be very much in that position. If consistency is desirable, I would suppose that the Commission would make a similar recommendation about the clerks in these whole-time offices to that which they made about the clerks in the offices of solicitors appointed to public departments. The whole subject has been before you in a Report of a Committee presided over by Sir David Brynmor Jones, I think.

55,497. That report deals with the question, so far as concerns the County Court registries?—Yes; that, practically, raises the whole question.

55,498. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) We were told by the high bailiff of the Birmingham County Court that an arrangement is now in existence by which he receives, out of a salary of 1,000*l.*, 750*l.*, and that 250*l.* goes to his predecessor (who is ill and is unable to do his duty) as a sort of superannuation allowance; and he stated that that arrangement is permitted and sanctioned by the Lord Chancellor. Are there many of those arrangements for what I may call quasi superannuation allowances, by reserving part of the salary of the post for the ex-holder?—I do not recollect any, and I am bound to state that, until you mentioned it, I had forgotten about Birmingham.

55,499. (The Secretary.) In the proof of his evidence he struck out "Lord Chancellor" and substituted "the judge"?—That looks as if it had not received any formal sanction from the Lord Chancellor, and I do not know that it was a matter that required it; but I should think it is quite on the cards that the judge told me how he thought he could work the matter, and I may have told him that I thought it was all right. That is possible.

55,500. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) You see no difficulty in such a system—that when a post is not pensionable, part of the salary attached to that post should be reserved for the late holder of it?—I do not think it is right in principle. It does not sound to me very good business; but there are occasions when one has to depart from principle, I think, in order to work a good arrangement. I should not like you to condemn it as a corrupt and wicked thing, even in your own mind. If you would at all care to see what happened I will undertake to say, though I have forgotten it, that nothing of that sort would have been done unless I was perfectly clear in my own mind that it was in the public interest that it should be done.

55,501. It has high authority in the case of the Church?—But that is by statute.

55,502. Besides the agency fees which certain officials take, there are a number of other small fees which they are allowed to charge for, copies and things of that kind, in the probate registries, and I think in the County Court registries sometimes?—In the County Court registries the remuneration is made up entirely by fees that are taken, part of which are paid over to the Treasury and part of which the officer retains for his own use.

55,503. The officer retains up to a certain point?—Yes; that is all done under statutory authority.

55,504. In the matter of the war emergency legislation, the question of whether the registrar will in any particular case charge a fee or not we were told was left to the discretion of the registrar. A registrar complained to us that the discretion left to him was whether or not he should give somebody half a crown out of his own pocket. Obviously that creates a difficult position?—Yes, if it is so; but without the Act and the rules before me you will not be surprised if I cannot answer you. I do not carry all those rules in my head at the moment, although I have a responsibility as to all of them.

6 May 1915.]

Sir KENNETH AUGUSTUS MUIR MACKENZIE, G.C.B., K.C.

55,505. Speaking generally, you will agree that it is undesirable to pay in legal matters by results, is it not?—Yes, but it is recognised in the County Court. We could not get on without it in the County Court, I am afraid.

55,506. It has been complained, for instance, that the officers of the court cannot help being unconsciously influenced in such matters as imprisonment for debt by the fact that a court which takes a high standard in that respect gets larger fees than a court which is not so ready to take such a standard?—I am quite ready to admit that payment by results is a bad system if one could get rid of it.

55,507. With regard to the agency business, it is understood that the agency business is to be done outside official hours?—I do not know.

55,508. But when we had three clerks before us the other day they all stated that when the unpaid public business did not take up their full time, they were in the habit of doing the agency business for which they and their employers were paid. That would constitute an irregularity and they seemed to admit that. If the thing was done at any rate irregularly in office hours that fact would have to be carefully considered in basing any claim for compensation?—Yes, I think so.

55,509. You could hardly compensate a man for the loss of work which he had hitherto been doing irregularly in office hours?—No, but if you take the case of a man who has got two hours' work to do in the day and is also asked to do some agency business, do you suggest that he must wait until 5 o'clock before he does the agency business?

55,510. That seems to me to be what has been laid down by the majesty of the law. I find it difficult to keep my respect for the law in the presence of that regulation; but it is the fact, I think?—I should think that worked itself out, in spite of the law, in a reasonable manner.

55,511. But in a manner which makes it seem a little more absurd that compensation should be demanded when that work is ordered to be done in official hours as part of the official business?—Yes, I think it makes the case a weak one.

Mr. E. W. H. MILLAR (Secretary).

Sir JAMES MILLER DODDS, K.C.B. (Under Secretary for Scotland), called and examined.

55,512. (Chairman.) What is the office that you hold?—I am Under Secretary for Scotland.

55,513. How long have you held that office?—Since 1909.

55,514. Had you been for some time in the Scottish office before that?—I have been in the Scottish office since 1889.

55,515. In those capacities you have acquired a considerable knowledge of the legal departments in Scotland?—A general knowledge.

55,516. I will ask you to give us some general facts with regard to the legal departments that come under the view of the Commission. In the first place I will read you some paragraphs from the Fourth Report of the Commissioners who inquired into the Courts of Law in Scotland in 1870, and will ask you whether the matter therein contained is correct at the present time: "The judicial system of Scotland may be described in general terms as consisting of a Supreme Civil Court called the Court of Session, a Supreme Criminal Court called the Court of Justiciary, and certain inferior or subordinate courts, acting in different localities and exercising various kinds of jurisdiction. In the Scottish judicial system there never has existed that division of courts into Courts of Common Law and Courts of Equity which exists in England, consequently none of the inconveniences attributed to such a division have at any time been experienced in Scotland." Then it says the Court of Session "exercises jurisdiction, original or appellate, in all classes of questions litigated in civil causes, whether of the nature of common law or equity suits, or maritime causes, or arising in bankruptcy, or relating to status or to wills, and also in exchequer matters." . . . "The Court of Session, as already indicated, is the Supreme Court in civilibus only. It does not administer the criminal law of the country. The Supreme Court in criminalibus is the Court of Justiciary, which exercises jurisdiction in all matters of crime, either at Edinburgh or at certain towns where circuits are held at stated periods." . . . "Besides the Court of Session or Supreme Civil Court, and the Court of Justiciary, or Supreme Criminal Court, the judicial system of Scotland comprises several inferior courts, exercising within certain localities and under certain restrictions, jurisdiction, civil or criminal, subject to review and correction in the former case by the Court of Session, and in the latter case by the Court of Justiciary, unless such review is specially excluded by statute." Is that correct at the present time?—That is generally still a true statement of the position.

55,517. Are the departments with which we have to deal, generally speaking, those which carry on the clerical work and the work of record connected with the courts described in those paragraphs?—That is so.

55,518. We should like to have a brief statement of what those departments are and the nature of the work with which they deal. In the first place there is the Lord Advocate's Department?—Yes. The Lord Advocate is chief legal adviser to the Crown in Scotland. He has general charge of criminal business, and is the head of the public prosecution system which prevails in Scotland. He is also responsible for pursuing and defending civil actions, as representing the Crown, and acting as counsel for the Crown generally.

55,519. He also advises the Secretary for Scotland and the Crown with regard to many legal appointments, does he not?—The position can be stated in this way: The office of Secretary for Scotland was founded in the year 1885. Up to then the Minister for home business in Scotland had been the Home Secretary. The Lord Advocate, so far as he was attached to any department, was attached to the Home Office, and advised the Home Office in very many matters relating to Scotland. Among other things he nominated to various legal appointments in Scotland, and the Home Secretary is understood to have habitually acted on such nominations. When the Secretary for Scotland's office was established, a special saving clause was inserted in the Act establishing it, which saved the privileges of the Lord Advocate; and, in consequence of that saving, nominations which were formerly made by the Home Secretary to the Crown now proceed, as regards most legal appointments, upon the Lord Advocate's nomination to the Secretary for Scotland. He also is available to the Secretary for Scotland in dealing with legal matters generally, and we can always rely upon his advising in all such questions.

Sir JAMES MILLER DODDS, K.C.B.

55,520. Are the offices directly under the Lord Advocate mainly concerned with the criminal part of his work?—Only his own office—the Crown Office—and the officers connected with it, including, under recent legislation, the Procurators Fiscal, or Public Prosecutors, throughout Scotland.

55,521. Apart from the Procurators Fiscal, the establishment directly under the Lord Advocate is comparatively small?—Comparatively small and largely political, coming in and going out with the Government.

55,522. The principal officer under him is the Crown Agent?—The principal solicitor under him is the Crown Agent. There are also the Advocates Depute, who, under the Lord Advocate, conduct criminal prosecutions in the High Court.

55,523. We shall, no doubt, hear later in greater detail as to the nature of that establishment. Coming now to the Court of Session, what are the offices dealing with the business of the Court of Session?—Perhaps I should explain very shortly the constitution of the Court. The Court of Session consists of what is called the Inner House and the Outer House. The Inner House consists of two courts called the First and Second Division, each of which consists of four judges, the one presided over by the principal judge in Scotland, the Lord President of the Court of Session.

55,524. He is also Lord Justice-General?—He is also Lord Justice-General, and in that capacity is head of the Court of Justiciary. The other division is presided over by the Lord Justice Clerk. That accounts for two courts.

55,525. Comprising eight judges?—Yes, eight judges. There are also five other courts, in each of which a single judge sits, called a Lord Ordinary. There are thus 13 judges of the Court of Session in all.

55,526. The five Lords Ordinary form the Outer House?—Yes, collectively their courts are called the Outer House. An action originating in the Court of Session is brought in the first instance as a rule before a Lord Ordinary. Appeals from inferior courts go to one of the divisions of the Inner House. The Inner House thus chiefly exercises appellate jurisdiction, but it has also some original jurisdiction.

55,527. Cases heard, in the first instance, by a Lord Ordinary in the Outer House, if an appeal is desired, pass to one of the divisions of the Inner House?—Yes, and finally, if desired, to the Houses of Lords.

55,528. Will you tell us what the offices under the Court of Session are?—The principal officer under the Court of Session is the Principal Clerk of Session. Formerly there were several principal clerks, but under legislation, which ended by an Act in 1913, there is now only one principal clerk of session. He gives personal attendance at every sitting of the Court; he is responsible for the technical language and form of the judgments, interlocutors, and orders of the Court, and discharges generally, with the staff of the Court, the functions of clerk of the Court. Under the principal clerk there are five depute clerks, one attached to each Court of the Outer House. Their duties are similar to those in fact of ordinary clerks of the Court. Then there are two depute clerks for the Inner House, one for each division; there are five assistant clerks, one to each depute clerk, and there are two ordinary clerks, one of whom is attached to each division. Then the junior Lord Ordinary in the Outer House takes summary and preliminary business in what is known as the Bill Chamber; and there is a staff attached to that department also—a small staff consisting of three clerks. Some of the judges of the Court sit as a Court of Teinds. “Teind” is roughly the Scotch equivalent of tithe. The Court of Teinds conducts business relating to teinds, such as the augmentation of the stipends of ministers of the Church of Scotland, and the disjunction and erection of new churches and new parishes.

55,529. These are very technical matters?—Very technical.

55,530. But small in volume?—Small in volume, but involving difficult questions of title, and so on.

55,531. Then there are some minor departments?—Yes, there are offices under various names. One is called the Keeper of the Minute Book and of Edictal Citations. His duty is to arrange and preserve copies of such citations; that is, citations of parties not resident in Scotland, and so on, and to arrange for publication the entries in the minute book kept in the office of the principal and depute clerks of session; he has a clerk with an allowance. Then there is the extractor of the Court of Session, whose duty is to issue extracts of decrees of the Court; there is also an assistant.

55,532. Does he draft the decrees?—No. I understand the decrees—that is to say, the interlocutors, the findings of the Court—are drafted by the clerks. His duty is simply to issue extracts as required. He has an assistant extractor and an allowance for clerks. Then there are the keepers of the rolls of the Inner House—two officers who also act as clerks to the heads of the two divisions. There are the judges’ clerks, who are attached personally to each judge. There is further the auditor to the Court of Session, an officer appointed to tax expenses found due by the Court, roughly corresponding to the taxing master in the English court. He also taxes other accounts remitted to him and draws fees for doing so; he has an allowance for a clerk. Finally, there are the macers or officers of the court.

55,533. Corresponding to the ushers in the English courts?—Yes, I suppose that is the nearest analogy. They are charged with the duties of ushers, the preservation of silence, and attendance on the judges. There are seven macers of the Court of Session.

55,534. Then there is a department of the Accountant of Court?—The accountant of court is charged with the supervision of trustees in bankruptcy and judicial factors. He has a staff under him.

55,535. If funds are paid into court are they placed in the charge of the accountant of court?—I understand so.

55,536. Turning to the Court of Justiciary, what is the office dealing with the business of that court?—Perhaps I should explain that the Court of Justiciary is simply composed of the judges of the Court of Session sitting to try criminal cases. The principal officer of the court is the clerk of justiciary, an advocate at the Scottish Bar not under restriction as to practice. He has the general supervision of the Justiciary Office and has two clerks attached to him. He is also in charge, under the court, of the records of the Justiciary Court.

55,537. That completes the account of the offices directly concerned with the current business of the courts?—That is so. Perhaps I might point out that the total numbers are comparatively small—only 51. That does not include the office of the Court of Justiciary or the Accountant of Court, but it includes, I think, all the others I have specified.

55,538. The staff of the offices of the Court of Justiciary and the Accountant of Court would only mean 10 or 12 more?—Yes.

55,539. Will you tell us now about the group of offices in the Register House; in the first place, those which are under the Deputy Clerk Register?—The Register House Department represents offices which originally were under the control of a high officer of state in Scotland called the Lord Clerk Register, whose principal functions were the duties of the custody and control of records. Scotch courts have always been very careful of their records. By the passing of the Lord Clerk Register (Scotland) Act, 1879, his office was made almost entirely titular, and his rights and duties in regard to the public registers, the records, and Rolls of Scotland and to the keepers and other officers thereof were transferred, subject to the provisions of the Act, to an officer called the Deputy Clerk Register. In the Register House there is a Record Department for the custody of records, largely legal but also including a number of the old historical records of Scotland.

55,540. Do the current records, which after a number of years are transferred to the Record Department, include only the legal records, or do they also include the records of the other Scottish departments?—That is a question which must come up some day. At the present time I do not think I could say that there is any absolute rule laid down except as regards the legal records. The question of the final disposal, for instance, of the records of my own office has never, so far as I remember, been settled.

Sir JAMES MILLER DODDS, K.C.B.

55,541. It has not been long enough in existence for the question to arise?—Not long enough in existence to make it absolutely necessary. There is also the Historical Department, the head of which is the curator of the Historical Department, which has the immediate supervision of the more ancient records, and supervises, under the Deputy Clerk Register, the publication of historical documents which is constantly going on; he has a small staff. Then there is, what numerically is by far the most important part of the Register House—the general registry of Sasines, which is the office where all writs relating to land and heritages in Scotland are recorded.

55,542. Those documents are copied and kept in bound volumes?—Yes, and passed over every year to the Deputy Clerk Register for preservation. They are of great importance, because on priority of record in this register depend rights over real property in Scotland. The Registry of Sasines accounts for about 120 out of a total of about 180 in the staff of the Register House departments.

55,543. Does that include the engrossing staff?—That includes the engrossing staff, both in and out of the Registry of Sasines. Then there is the Register of Deeds. There is a keeper of the Register of Deeds, who records in the books of council and session deeds and other writings, not being writs which require registration in the Register of Sasines; he has a small staff under him. There is further the Director of Chancery; he records decrees of services of heirs and deals with certain Royal warrants which have to pass the Great Seal.

55,544. Those are departments which are all under the general control of the Deputy Clerk Register?—Those are the departments which are covered by the Act of 1879, which I have mentioned.

55,545. Are there any other departments which are actually lodged in the Register House?—I understand that the office of the keeper of the Signet is in the Register House. The Keeper of the Signet is the Lord Clerk Register; he has a deputy keeper, and, under him, there is a substitute keeper and a clerk. The Signet is the King's Seal for judicial proceedings, and requires to be impressed on summonses. The deputy keeper also holds a very honourable office, which entitles him to preside at the meetings of the Society of Writers to the Signet, and the substitute keeper and clerk draw up the minutes of those meetings.

55,546. Then, except for the impressing of the Seal, that office is concerned more with the affairs of the Writers to the Signet than with the affairs of any court?—I understand so. Then there is the clerk to the Admission of Notaries who prepares and transcribes the Commissions of Notaries Public, presents petitions to the Court of Session for their admission, and so on.

55,547. Will you now take the Scottish Land Court?—The Scottish Land Court under that name was established in 1911 by the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act.

55,548. In succession to the Crofters Commission?—Yes, but with much wider scope. Its main duty is to fix fair rents for small holdings, to decide upon the application of compulsory powers of acquisition for small holdings, and to deal with the creation of small holdings on the application of the Board of Agriculture for Scotland.

55,549. How is the Land Court constituted?—It is constituted under a Chairman, and there are four other members of the Court.

55,550. The Chairman and the members of the Court are in the position of judges, and are paid out of the Consolidated Fund?—That is so.

55,551. And there is a staff for carrying out the work?—Yes, a small staff.

55,552. Turning to the system of local courts, will you describe generally the arrangement of the Sheriff Courts?—The Sheriff Courts system of Scotland is the product of the history of the country during the last 200 years. There are 15 officers, who between them have jurisdiction over the whole of Scotland, called Sheriffs—Sheriffs Depute, or more commonly Sheriffs Principal. They are the successors of the old Hereditary Sheriffs of Scotland, and are not merely judicial officers, but have considerable administrative functions. They are in some respects more analogous to the French préfets than anything you have in England.

55,553. Are they always advocates?—They have always been advocates.

55,554. And non-resident in their jurisdiction?—Usually non-resident in their jurisdiction. They are permitted to practise and are paid out of the Consolidated Fund. Under them there are 56 Sheriffs Substitute. As there are 33 counties it is obvious that in some counties there is more than one Sheriff Substitute. In Glasgow and in Edinburgh there are several. The Sheriffs Substitute have a very wide jurisdiction. On the Civil side the nearest analogy in England would be the County Court judge, but I understand that the Scottish Sheriffs' jurisdiction is wider. They also have a wide criminal jurisdiction. Under our Scottish system the Sheriff Courts are the courts having the local criminal jurisdiction in counties. In burghs the petty criminal jurisdiction, which in England would be exercised by the justices, is exercised by Baillies who are Town Councillors, and are selected by the general body of the Town Council from its own members.

55,555. Are they paid out of local funds?—They are not paid at all; they are unpaid. The Crown does not contribute to the cost of those Burgh Courts.

55,556. Their cost is entirely supported by local funds?—Yes.

55,557. Then, apart from these Burgh Courts, the Sheriff Courts carry on the whole local jurisdiction both civil and criminal of the country?—That is so. Of course, we exclude the Circuit Courts and the justices.

55,558. (Mr. Coward.) And the Courts in Edinburgh?—Naturally; they are common to the whole of Scotland, of course.

55,559. The courts in Edinburgh have joint jurisdiction, have they not?—The courts in Edinburgh have—you mean the Court of Justiciary and the Court of Session?

55,560. I was speaking of the civil business only?—In certain cases a litigant may choose the Sheriff Court or the Court of Session.

55,561. (Chairman.) What staff is attached to the Sheriff Courts?—In every county in Scotland there is one Sheriff Clerk who is attached to the sheriff at the principal town of the county. He is the only officer whose salary appears on the Estimates, but in each case he has a staff of deputies and clerks whom he pays out of an allowance which is made to him and which appears on the Estimates. He is responsible for the deputies and clerks; he appoints them and discharges them, and answers for their actions.

55,562. And he fixes their remuneration out of the fixed allowance which is given him for the purpose?—I think, in some cases, he submits a schedule of salaries, which are therefore known to the Scottish Office and to the Treasury, but, generally speaking, he is responsible for the administration of his own office.

55,563. Are his duties purely clerical or does he do any of the minor judicial work of the Court?—Speaking generally, they are purely the duties of a clerk of court. He has practically no duties corresponding to those of officers known as masters or registrars in English courts; he has no judicial duties.

55,564. You have already mentioned the Procurators Fiscal under the Lord Advocate. Are their duties generally concerned with the prosecution of crime in the Scottish Courts?—Yes, the duty of the Procurator Fiscal is to investigate criminal charges, to prosecute before the Sheriffs Court, to initiate prosecutions in cases indicted before the Court of Justiciary, to institute inquiries in cases of sudden or suspicious death, &c. There is no coroner in Scotland. Perhaps I ought to say there are also Procurators Fiscal or Public Prosecutors in the Burgh Courts and in the Justice of the Peace Courts, but they are not paid by the Exchequer. The Justice of the Peace Court has nothing like the prominence in our Scottish judicial system which it has in England.

55,565. Are the Procurators Fiscal appointed by the Lord Advocate?—Yes, under recent legislation. There are 50 Procurators Fiscal, and their staff, where they require a staff, is paid under a similar system to that of the Sheriff Clerks, namely, by allowances from the Treasury to the Procurator Fiscal for Deputes and clerks. There are 43 Procurators Fiscal Deputes.

55,566. Are the Sheriff Clerks all whole-time officers?—Not necessarily.

55,567. The Sheriffs Substitute, I presume, are?—Yes, they are.

55,568. Are the Procurators Fiscal whole-time officers?—As a rule. Perhaps I should explain, as regards the Sheriff Clerks, the question of restricting them to their public duties is considered as a vacancy occurs, and, if it is thought desirable, both in their case and in the case of the Procurators Fiscal, they are so restricted.

55,569. Does that complete the list of the departments of the Service under our view?—I think so. There is one official who is mentioned in the Estimates before the Sheriff Clerks, namely, the Commissary Clerk of Midlothian.

55,570. What is his position?—The Commissary Clerk roughly corresponds to the local probate official, and in the other counties of Scotland his duties are now merged in the office of Sheriff Clerk; but the Commissary Clerk of Midlothian is still retained, and has exclusive jurisdiction as respects the estates of persons who die domiciled away from Scotland—"furth of Scotland," as the old phrase is. He has a staff allowance from the Treasury.

55,571. What are the powers of the Secretary for Scotland as regards the control of those various departments?—The general powers of the Secretary for Scotland are those inherited from the Home Secretary. Under the Secretary for Scotland Act 1885, he took over the statute and common law powers of the Home Secretary except in certain spheres, which were specified in the Act. The sphere of law and justice was included in the transfer. Since 1885 a few Acts have been passed conferring direct powers on the Secretary for Scotland in regard to the appointments under discussion. In the first place he recommends to the Crown for legal appointments; in the majority of the cases on the nomination of the Lord Advocate as already explained. He and the Lord Advocate are, of course, always in Parliament, and between them answer for the legal departments in Scotland. Estimates for the legal departments do not pass through the Scottish office, but all changes in salary, applications for pensions, resignations, and so on, do so pass as a general rule. In dealing with the legal departments, the Secretary for Scotland has the advantage of the advice of the Lord Advocate, with whom he habitually consults.

55,572. Apart from the question of appointment, with which we will deal presently, what powers of control as regards discipline and organisation has the Secretary for Scotland?—So far as the staff of the Court of Session is concerned, he has no direct power of control. This control is vested by statute in the Principal Clerk of Session subject to the further powers of the President and the Court. The Principal Clerk can suspend offending officials up to six months.

55,573. Does that imply that the Principal Clerk has disciplinary powers in matters short of that?—I think that would be an extreme step. Short of that he could act, no doubt, by warning; but I am not familiar with the details of this.

55,574. If it is a question of actual dismissal, then the Court has control?—Then the Court has power to dismiss for malversation or neglect of duty. In my experience it has never come to a question of invoking these powers except in a single case, and in that case it did not proceed to dismissal, because the clerk ultimately handed in his resignation to the Secretary for Scotland.

55,575. In matters of distribution of work, distribution of staff, and re-allotment of duties, has the Principal Clerk of Session complete power?—He has power for this purpose under an Act of 1889.

55,576. Except so far as he is hampered by legislation?—By legislation and by the salaries.

55,577. The statutory regulation of the details of the court is very minute?—It is very minute, and possibly there is room for improvement in this respect.

55,578. What is the position as regards the Register House departments?—As regards the Register House departments, the Secretary for Scotland exercises a general power of disciplinary control on appeal from the principal officers of those departments. The Deputy Clerk Register within his sphere, and the Keeper of Sasines within his sphere, control their own departments subject to this appeal.

55,579. Have they the power of dismissal?—Before dismissing they would certainly refer to the Secretary for Scotland.

55,580. And in case of minor punishments the officer concerned would have a right of appeal?—That is so.

55,581. What is the position as regards the Sheriffs Courts and the Procurators Fiscal?—I am not familiar with the details of the disciplinary control, but it may be taken that the Sheriff Clerk within his sphere and the Procurator Fiscal within his, controls his deputies and clerks, and deals with them in a disciplinary way.

55,582. Who controls the Procurators Fiscal. Has the Lord Advocate a power of dismissal?—No, the Procurator Fiscal is under the same regulations as the Sheriff Substitute; he can only be dismissed on a report received from the two principal judges of the Court of Session made to the Secretary for Scotland. The person who would move the court, I take it, would be the Lord Advocate.

55,583. In the case of the Land Court, what is the control?—As to the Land Court the question has not really come up, but I assume that the Land Court, which appoints its own staff, can control and would have power to deal with offending members of the staff.

55,584. If there are questions with regard to any of those departments as to an alteration in the numbers of the staff or in their scales of pay, either in the way of increase or decrease, how would they be dealt with?—They would be dealt with as a rule by correspondence conducted through the Secretary for Scotland's department with the Treasury. That is the general practice.

55,585. The question would be initiated by the department concerned, which would correspond with the Scottish Office?—Yes.

55,586. And the Scottish Office would correspond with the Treasury if it was a matter of finance?—Yes, if it was a matter affecting finance.

55,587. So the Scottish Office comes in in all questions of changes in salaries and numbers?—Yes.

55,588. Does that apply to the local system as well?—Yes, that applies also to the local system. While I say that is the general system, I do not wish to be taken as saying that it is never done differently.

55,589. Is that what you consider the proper course?—It is the convenient course in my experience.

55,590. Does that apply to the local system also, if it were a question of a change in the fixed allowance of a Sheriff Clerk or a Procurator Fiscal?—Yes.

55,591. Correspondence in that case would come from the individual Sheriff Clerk to the Scottish Office?—It might reach the Scottish Office either from the individual Sheriff Clerk or through the Lord Advocate; there is no very strict rule laid down.

55,592. If there was a case for diminishing the allowance of a Sheriff Clerk or a Procurator Fiscal, who would initiate that?—I take it that it would be initiated as a rule in the Treasury through the King's Remembrancer in Edinburgh, who is the Treasury watch-dog in these matters.

55,593. It would be his business to look out for places where economy is possible?—I think so. Of course, my own department, so far as its knowledge goes, would consider it its duty to take similar action where it was required. For instance, the Principal Clerks of Session, when one of them retired in 1912, were reduced from two to one, and 1,000*l.* a year was saved in that way.

Sir JAMES MILLER DODDS, K.C.B.

55,594. That was also a matter on which recommendations were made by the Committee on Minor Legal Appointments?—I do not think it recommended a reduction to one, according to my present recollection.

55,595. Perhaps I should rather say that that question was raised in some of the memoranda attached to the report of that Committee?—The general report did not recommend a reduction to one Principal Clerk of Session.

55,596. Do you consider that that system of control is satisfactory?—It is perhaps not entirely consistent and systematic, but in practice in my experience it works fairly well.

55,597. What strikes me at first sight about it is that the powers are considerably divided. Taking the case of the officers of the Court of Session, for instance, the power of appointment is with one authority, the current discipline is with another authority, and the ultimate power of dismissal is with a third authority. Does not that division of authority create some confusion in practice?—I should reduce your three to two, if I may presume to do so, because I do not think one can readily admit that the Principal Clerk of Session is a different authority from the Court.

55,598. Is it not the case that he has statutory powers of control quite apart from the Court?—That may be, but I am sure that in practice he always consults with the Court.

55,599. Do you consider that as regards the position of the Secretary for Scotland and his office, the powers of control are adequate and satisfactory?—I think so. In my experience we have always managed to preserve our control as appeared necessary within the sphere of the Secretary for Scotland, which, as I explained, does not extend over all the departments with which you are dealing.

55,600. Do you consider it satisfactory, in the case of the local courts, as regards the subordinate staff?—With the existing system I do not see that it would be easy to introduce any different arrangement so long as the Sheriff Clerk in his sphere and the Procurator Fiscal in his receive a lump sum allowance, and become responsible for the appointments that are made out of it. You must either take away his responsibility, or, if you are going to preserve it, you must, I think, leave the main disciplinary powers with him.

55,601. What do you mean precisely by "his responsibility"?—Take the case of the Sheriff Clerk; I have not the warrant before me here, but my recollection of it is that it contains a clause to the effect that he may appoint deputies for whom he shall answer. Supposing there was, for instance, malversation on the part of a deputy, the Sheriff Clerk would be responsible to find the money.

55,602. He is financially responsible for their defalcations?—I understand that he is financially responsible.

55,603. Do you attach importance to that financial responsibility of the Sheriff Clerk and the Procurator Fiscal for the subordinate staff?—I think on the present system it is the consequence of the existing arrangements. If you tell a man that he is to employ his own staff, and if you do not control his appointment of his own staff, I think you are bound to make him responsible for the doings of that staff; otherwise, the State presumably would be answerable for people whom it did not really control.

55,604. But supposing you had a different system of appointment?—That is a different matter.

55,605. Will you tell us now about the method of appointment in the various offices which you have described. In the first place the Lord Advocate's officers are, I suppose, appointed by the Lord Advocate himself?—Yes, including the Crown Agent, the Advocates Depute, and the Procurators Fiscal.

55,606. Then as regards the officers of the Court of Session?—As regards the officers proper of the Court of Session—those specified on page 332 of the current Estimates, whose number is 51 in all—I find that 30 are appointed by the Crown, on the recommendation of the Secretary for Scotland, following on the nomination of the Lord Advocate.

55,607. Does that include practically all the staff with the exception of the judges' clerks and the subordinate officers?—I think that is so. Even the seven macers are appointed by the Crown.

55,608. That is to say, as you have told us, they are appointed on the recommendation of the Secretary for Scotland, who consults the Lord Advocate?—He accepts the Lord Advocate's nomination, so that the substantial patronage is with the Lord Advocate. Then in the Court of Justiciary, the Clerk of Justiciary is appointed by the Crown; he appoints his own assistant clerks, two in number, with the Lord Advocate's approval. The Accountant of Court is appointed by the Crown; his staff is regulated by the Secretary for Scotland, and receives Civil Service certificates.

55,609. What exactly does "appointment by the Crown" mean. Is there a warrant under the Great Seal?—In some cases under the Great Seal, in some cases not.

55,610. What is its meaning as regards tenure of office. Do the officers who are appointed by the Crown differ in their tenure from those who are appointed otherwise?—The general tenure is ad vitam aut culpam; but in the majority of warrants we now insert the provision that they are liable to retire at 70 years of age if called upon to do so.

55,611. Does it make a difference as regards the necessity for a Civil Service certificate?—Yes, a Crown warrant, as a rule, entitles to pension without a Civil Service certificate.

55,612. Do you see any necessity for retaining the Crown appointment in the case of all these officers in the Court of Session?—Personally I do not, but as the substantial patronage is vested in the Lord Advocate I think he ought to be consulted on this point.

55,613. What is the method of appointment in the Register House departments?—The Deputy Clerk Register and the Keeper of Sasines are appointed by the Crown. The rest of the staff are appointed by competition subject to the possession of certain qualifications. There is a special examination. The staff have to possess legal knowledge; and, in addition to that, they are examined in general knowledge, and the examination is a competitive examination.

55,614. Does that apply to the whole of the staff?—The Deputy Keeper of Records, the Keeper of Deeds, and the Curator of the Historical Department are appointed by the Secretary for Scotland. The rules as to competition do not apply to them. The rest of the staff is appointed in the way I have described.

55,615. Do those appointments which are made by the Secretary for Scotland differ otherwise than as regards the formal warrant of appointment from the Crown appointments?—I think not.

55,616. Do they differ as regards tenure?—Speaking from recollection, I think all those officers are subject to the ordinary Civil Service rules of retirement, possibly at 60 and compulsorily at 65, except in the case of the Deputy Clerk Register and the Keeper of Sasines, in whose warrants there occurs the requirement to retire at 70.

55,617. You have mentioned that there is a considerable engrossing staff. How are they appointed?—They are paid out of allowances in the hands of the principal officers. Of course the statement as to examinations which I have made does not apply to this staff; they are selected and appointed by the principal officers themselves, and are paid by the piece.

55,618. What is the position of the small Chancery Department?—The principal officer of the Chancery Department is the Interim Director, who was appointed by the Court of Session. It is under consideration whether this department, which is very small, should be abolished and the duties of it merged in those of an officer of another department.

55,619. Can you say how long the present Interim Director has held his office?—I am afraid I do not remember when he was appointed.

55,620. In the Land Court you told us that the staff is appointed by the Court?—The staff is appointed by the Court, except the principal clerk, who is appointed by the Secretary for Scotland. The present principal clerk was taken over from the Crofters Commission.

55,621. Turning now to the local organisation, by whom are the Sheriffs Substitute appointed?—They are appointed by the Crown on the recommendation of the Secretary for Scotland and on the substantial patronage of the Lord Advocate, from the members of the Scottish Bar, and, in some cases, of the solicitors' branch of the Scottish legal profession.

55,622. And the Sheriff Clerks?—They are appointed by the Secretary of Scotland on the Lord Advocate's nomination. Their staff is provided for by an allowance.

55,623. They are not Crown appointments?—They are not Crown appointments.

55,624. You said their staff is entirely appointed by the Sheriff Clerks themselves?—That is so.

55,625. The Procurators Fiscal, you told us, are appointed by the Lord Advocate?—That is so.

55,626. And their staff is appointed by the Procurators Fiscal themselves?—Yes.

55,627. You are acquainted with the report of the Minor Legal Appointments Committee on the local offices?—I have not had time to look at it in any detail recently; but I read it, of course, when it was made.

55,628. One question raised before that committee was whether the staff of the local courts should be put on a permanent footing and made pensionable. Are you in accord with the recommendation they made on that matter?—I have some hesitation in giving an opinion without having had more time to go into it than I have recently; but generally my opinion coincides with that of the committee, that the allowance system is not a satisfactory system for the State to employ.

55,629. Did the recommendations of the committee deal with the question of those local offices as a whole?—They were unable to deal with the office of Sheriff Clerk in any substantial way because it was not included in the remit. Their remit included the office of Sheriff Clerk Depute, and they were hampered in dealing with the question in a general way because it is obviously a difficult matter to deal with pensions of subordinates when you cannot deal with the principal.

55,630. But in spite of that difficulty they expressed a preference for a pensionable system for this subordinate staff?—They did.

55,631. Would you infer from that that if their hands had been free they would have recommended a similar system for the principals?—That is the inference I would draw from their conclusions.

55,632. Were the Procurators Fiscal within the reference?—They were not included.

55,633. So that a similar difficulty arose in dealing with the subordinate staff of the Procurators Fiscal?—It would have arisen equally.

55,634. Did the committee report on the staff of the Procurators Fiscal?—Not according to my recollection.

55,635. Your observations as regards the position of the staff in the Sheriff Court offices would apply equally to the staff under the Procurators Fiscal?—Yes; and, if I may say so, to similar arrangements made in regard to various offices connected with the Court of Session.

55,636. You have told us already that you consider the number of Crown appointments is greater than necessary, and that it might with advantage be reduced?—I think so, as a personal opinion.

55,637. Are there any other points in connection with the present system of appointment on which you have suggestions to make?—I think one question which has frequently forced itself upon my observation is, that the statutes relating especially to the Court of Session are very badly in need of consolidation. I am aware that the Statute Law Committee has had the matter lately under consideration, and I hope that something may come of it.

55,638. There are a number of statutes, some of them regulating matters of very minute detail, are there not?—That is so. One reason why such recommendations as those of the Minor Legal Appointments Committee are not carried into effect so promptly as they might be, is that legislation is necessary. Several statutes, perhaps, have to be repealed, and all that takes time, and it is not very easy to get such legislation through the House of Commons under existing conditions.

55,639. Does the present method of appointment depend upon statutory enactments for the most part?—So far as Crown appointments go it depends upon statute.

55,640. If any reduction were made in the number of Crown appointments, that could only be done by legislation?—By legislation only.

55,641. Do you think that the present system, as regards the nominating authorities, is satisfactory?—I have already expressed the opinion, as a personal opinion, that it would be expedient that the number of Crown appointments should be reduced. I think that Ministers would be quite willing to see those appointments reduced; but I suggest that the Lord Advocate, as substantially responsible, should be consulted on this point.

55,642. Under the existing system, have the appointments to the higher posts been made, as a rule, from outside or by promotion from inside the offices?—As a rule, I think, from outside.

55,643. Have political considerations often come in in the selection of persons to be appointed to the higher posts?—Officially I am not in a position to say.

55,644. Unofficially, can you say whether it is a matter of common knowledge that that is the case?—I think it is.

55,645. From the point of view of the proper organisation of the Service, do you see objections to that system?—I am not prepared to say that the system has had undesirable results, looked at all round. I think it is to some extent out of date, and not in harmony with modern desires and conditions. When I look at the result of the competitive system in the non-legal branches of the Civil Service, I am unable to find any reason which satisfies me why it should not be extended more to the legal branches of the Service than has hitherto been done in Scotland.

55,646. In the offices where the Secretary for Scotland and the Treasury have had a freer hand—I mean especially in the Register House Departments—appointment by competition has been introduced?—That is so.

55,647. If they had a freer hand in the other departments also, is it likely that system would be further extended?—I think that is a fair presumption.

55,648. In the case of the English legal departments, witnesses of weight have recommended to the Commission that the high appointing authority, which, in the case of the English offices is more often than not the Lord Chancellor, should be assisted by a committee who would scrutinise applications, and make recommendations to him with regard to candidates. Do you think that there would be any advantage in adopting a similar scheme in Scotland?—I think in Scotland you have to remember that you are dealing with a comparatively small sphere and with a comparatively restricted choice. Where new legislation involves an enormous sudden addition to the numbers of Civil servants in a particular sphere, I think, as has actually happened, it is reasonable, and even necessary, that a Minister should be assisted by a committee of the sort described. In dealing with the appointments which have been under consideration to-day, I am unable to see that any advantage would arise out of the appointment of such a committee.

55,649. From your review of the departments attached to the Court of Session, it would appear that there are a number of small departments or sub-departments, each generally with a statutory warrant for its existence, and without any common line of promotion between them all. Would there be advantage in combining those departments and making them into a single service?—I have considerable hesitation in speaking on that point. I do not think I have sufficient knowledge of the working of the internal organisation of the Court of Session to justify me in expressing an opinion.

55,650. You have told us that in the Register House Departments the ordinary Civil Service rules

Sir JAMES MILLER DODDS, K.C.B.

apply to a great extent as regards hours of attendance, as regards vacations, and as regards the age for retirements. Do you consider that those rules might be made of general application to the other legal departments?—As regards hours of attendance and vacations I hesitate to speak for the reason I have already given. As regards retirement, personally I am unable to see why legal officers should be placed in a different position from an ordinary Civil servant.

55,651. If, in the case of the local courts and the local staffs, the service were organised in a different manner, and the staff were made pensionable, would it not naturally follow that such Civil Service regulations as are applicable should apply there also?—I think so.

55,652. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) We have before us the reports of the Departmental Committee on Minor Legal Appointments, and another Committee on the Engrossing Staff. Could you tell us, in short, whether any of the recommendations of those committees have been carried out either by legislation or by administration?—So far as the Engrossing Staff goes the recommendations have, speaking generally, been carried out. So far as the recommendation of the Committee on Minor Legal Appointments goes, it has been partially carried out. I must beg to remind you that there are various reports appended to this report, and they do not always agree; there has been considerable difficulty in coming to definite conclusions, but in one important matter in which one of the members at least thought a reduction should be made, that reduction has been made by the abolition of one of the principal clerks of session.

55,653. But for the moment that is the only recommendation in this main Report upon the Minor Legal Appointments which, so far as you remember, has been carried out?—The only definite recommendation. On the other hand, of course, the recommendations of the committee have been kept in view, and various schemes have been proposed from time to time which have not come to maturity so far; but in making appointments the various recommendations of the committee have been kept in view.

55,654. Then there is an important memorandum on page 17 by Mr. Haldane. Could you tell us whether, speaking broadly, you are in agreement with that recommendation?—I am not prepared to give an opinion.

55,655. On page 11 of the Report of the Committee on Minor Legal Appointments, I want to refer you to a matter to which you have also referred in evidence. They say, as apparently a matter of common notoriety, "In this way all political appointments would be eliminated." Confining yourself to common notoriety, is it the case that each successive Lord Advocate, if he belongs to this or that political party, confines his nominations to members of that party. Is that the general custom?—I do not think that is the absolute custom, and it is within my knowledge that many appointments have been made by way of promotion. But, speaking generally, I believe the position is correct, that as a rule appointments made by a political party are made from members of that party.

55,656. What the Americans call the "spoils system" prevails?—I take that from you.

55,657. Is there any department of legal organisation in Scotland over which the Lord Chancellor has anything whatever to do?—No.

55,658. In Scotland he has no power?—He has to do with justices of the peace of course.

55,659. He appoints justices of the peace, but beyond that he has no functions?—In regard to none of the departments with which we have been dealing to-day.

55,660. (Mr. Coward.) What is the position of a Sheriff Substitute? What is his salary?—His salary roughly, extends from 700*l.* to 1,400*l.* a year.

55,661. That is a good deal less than the salary of our County Court judges?—I think his position may be defined generally by saying that he has wider duties, harder work, and less pay than a County Court judge.

55,662. Has not he concurrent jurisdiction in almost everything with the Court of Session in Edinburgh?—I do not think I should put it so high as that. I would prefer that you should address questions as to jurisdiction to a lawyer; but in certain matters of civil jurisdiction a litigant has a choice.

55,663. (Sir John Kempe.) I do not think we have had before us any statement of grievances from any of the Scottish legal departments, except the Engrossing Department. Do you know whether any grievances are coming from the clerks in those departments?—I am not aware of any.

55,664. They are satisfied with their pay?—I am not in a position to say that they are satisfied with it.

55,665. They do not complain of it, at any rate. Complaints do not come to the Treasury?—There was a recent committee which inquired into the position of the engrossing clerks in the Registry of Sasines, in 1913. That was the last occasion on which their grievances were referred to a committee, and various recommendations were made which have been carried out.

55,666. No doubt we shall hear more of that?—I think it is quite possible.

55,667. I see you do not pretend in the Scottish legal offices to put the fees at a sufficient rate to pay for the expenses, as they claim to do in England?—I have not gone into that question recently. I am afraid the figures are not before my mind at present.

55,668. For the Courts of Law, Vote 11, I see the estimated receipts are 58,000*l.*, and the cost of the department 69,000*l.*, without any of the Consolidated Fund charges, or the building charges, and so on. The Land Court does not pretend to pay its way. In England the Land Registry does something more than pay its way. The Scottish Land Court is not a registry, I suppose?—No, the Scottish Land Court is the successor to the Crofters Commission.

55,669. (Sir John Kempe.) I find I was generalising too much. The Register House departments do manage to pay their way on the whole.

Sir JAMES PATTEN MACDOUGALL, K.C.B., Registrar-General for Scotland and Deputy Clerk Register (accompanied by Mr. GEORGE AUGUSTUS JAMES LEE, W.S., Deputy Keeper of the Records), called and examined.

55,670. (Chairman.) What are the offices that you hold?—I hold at present the offices of Deputy Clerk Register, Keeper of the Records, and Registrar-General for Scotland.

55,671. How long have you held those posts?—I have held them since 1909. Prior to that I was Vice-President and Chairman of the Local Government Board for Scotland, which was constituted under the Act of 1894. I had been legal secretary to the Lord Advocate and I had been concerned with the passing of the Local Government Act of 1894, which was the Act which created parish councils in Scotland, and, on the passing of that Act, I was appointed legal member of that Board. I was legal member till 1904, I think, when I was promoted to be Vice-President and Chairman of the Board. Prior to 1894 I had been, as I said, legal secretary to the Lord Advocate in two Governments—in 1886 and 1892.

55,672. As Deputy Clerk Register and Keeper of the Records you are at the head of the various departments which may be described as the Register House departments?—That is so. There is the General Register House which is concerned with registrations of title and is the Record Office proper. Then there is what we call the new Register House, which deals with the registration of births, deaths, and marriages, in which office the Registrar-General's work goes on. That is the distinction between the two. The two houses are adjoining houses.

55,673. You combine both offices in your own person?—I do so. According to statute, the Deputy Clerk Register is also Registrar-General without special appointment or additional salary. That is the provision in the Act of 1879.

55,674. This Commission is dealing at present specially with the Legal Departments; we shall be obliged if you will tell us what are the various departments under your supervision and what the work of each is?—In the first place, the work of the Record Department consists generally of the arrangement, classification, and cataloguing of the various classes of records. I may explain that the relation with the Sasines Office system is that I issue volumes from the Record Office which go to the Keeper of the Register of Sasines and he gets in the writs relating to heritable rights in Scotland, which are registered in these volumes, and, having been registered there, they come back to me in the volumes which are kept in the Record Office. So the two offices are very closely allied—in fact, the one follows from the other. The Keeper of the Register of Sasines is the person who frames the record, the Keeper of the Record is the person who keeps the record. Having been framed in the Sasines Office, the record comes across to the Record Office and is there preserved.

55,675. What records do you keep besides the records that come from the Sasines Office?—There are a number of Court records—what are called the processes, that is the Court proceedings—which all come down and are kept stored there.

55,676. Both civil and criminal?—Not criminal, but civil only.

55,677. Does that apply to the Court of Session only or to the local courts also?—That applies to the Court of Session only.

55,678. You have nothing to do with the records of the Sheriff Courts, for instance?—I have been for some time moving towards getting the Sheriff Court Records transferred to the Register House, because I dare say it may be known to some members of the Commission that very great dissatisfaction has been expressed in different centres in Scotland as to the state of the Sheriff Court Records. I have had experience myself—and attention has been called to it in Parliament—that now they have got into a very bad state; proper attention is not paid to them and the desire is to have them examined. They have been retained locally for a great number of years and they are falling into a state of very great disorder, and it is altogether very unsatisfactory. Sir Herbert Maxwell, amongst others, called attention to it only last year in connection with his county, and others have called attention to it in connection with their counties; and I think there is a general desire that something should be done to have those records transferred, as well as the Court of Session documents, to the Register House.

55,679. Would that require legislation to carry out?—Yes, I think it probably would. It is quite possible that the sheriffs themselves might have power to do it, but I rather think some legislation would be necessary. It is a doubtful point, and I should not like to commit myself about it.

55,680. Have you also the custody of any records which are not of a definitely legal character, such as records from the Scottish departments?—Yes, we have some. Only the other day I had occasion to have inquiries made about some old records relating to destitution in the Highlands—a vast number of papers connected with parliamentary inquiries in the early fifties. There are a great number of documents of that sort. Then we have certain Ecclesiastical Records for safe-keeping, including those of the recent Churches (Scotland) Act Commission.

55,681. Is there any system under which the records of the departments—for instance, the Local Government Board in Scotland—are transferred to your custody after a certain period?—I have heard that spoken of, but we have not yet got any of the Local Government Board Records. The Local Government Board is really only a creature of statute since 1894, and I do not think we have any of their papers yet; but they remain in the department. I think it is proposed that the Scottish Office should send papers to us, but not much has been heard of it lately.

55,682. There is no regular system about those departmental records?—No.

55,683. I gather that the bulk of the current records which you keep are legal?—Yes.

55,684. What is the work of the department in connection with those records?—They look after them, they have to catalogue and classify them, and they have to make them accessible to the public for search purposes. The public come there with the view, in the first place, of searching the titles and other legal documents. The staff of the Record Department is not large, and it is employed really in looking after those who come for searching purposes, and in the indexing and calendaring of those documents.

55,685. Are the records sufficiently and satisfactorily indexed and catalogued?—Yes, at any rate from 1781 onwards.

55,686. Are the indexes up to date?—Not quite, but they are up to date from the year I have stated. We now have power to increase the Index Department for the purpose of dealing with a number of old documents, and bringing them all up to date.

55,687. You have a special sub-department for dealing with the old records—the Historical Department?—Yes, the Curator of the Historical Department and his Assistant deal with the Historical part of the Record Office.

55,688. It will be convenient now if you will tell us what is the staff of the Record Department and of the Historical Department? The Historical Department, you say, has two officers only?—The Historical Department consists of two officers only.

55,689. What is the staff of the Record Department?—The staff of the Record Department consists of the Deputy-Keeper of Records, a chief clerk, a first class clerk, three second class clerks, a typist, the curator, and the assistant curator.

55,690. The last two being the officers of the Historical Department?—Yes.

55,691. (Sir John Kempe.) There are four second class clerks in the Estimates?—The fourth has not yet been appointed.

55,692. (Chairman.) What are the scales of pay of the first class and the second class clerks?—300*l.* to 400*l.* in the first class, and 80*l.* to 250*l.* in the second class.

55,693. Is that work which requires any legal or technical knowledge?—I think it certainly does in the Record Office; in fact, as the Commission probably knows, a legal examination is required at the present moment. Recently we had a change made and the provision now is, that in order to qualify for it and for admission to the staff of the Register House, the candidate must have the intermediate certificate of the Education Department or have passed the second general knowledge examination or substitutes prescribed for the Law Agents, and have served for five years in a conveyancer's office or the alternative of a university degree plus three years in a conveyancer's office.

55,694. Perhaps it will be convenient to deal with the conditions of appointment later. You have also the General Register of Sasines. What is the work of that department?—The work of that department is concerned with the registration of all deeds affecting real property in Scotland, its transmission and burdens, and the preparation of indexes, and what is known as the search sheets and the issue of such searches as may be asked from that department.

55,695. That department has a very considerable staff?—A very considerable staff.

55,696. What are the numbers and classification of that staff?—There is the keeper, 6 assistant keepers, one accountant, 6 chief clerks, 13 first class clerks, and 48 second class clerks.

55,697. The first class clerks and the second class clerks have the same scales of pay as the corresponding classes in the Record Department?—That is so.

55,698. Does that number include the engrossing staff, or is that a separate staff?—The engrossing staff are quite separate.

13 May 1915.] Sir JAMES PATTEN MACDOUGALL, K.C.B., accompanied by Mr. GEORGE AUGUSTUS JAMES LEE, W.S.

55,699. For that staff some technical and legal knowledge is required?—Yes, for that staff, exclusive of the engrossing staff.

55,700. What is the work of the Register of Deeds?—The work of the Register of Deeds is confined to registration for preservation of personal deeds (such as wills and marriage contracts), the preparation of indexes, the issuing of extracts or officially certified copies, the principal deeds being retained and transmitted annually to the Record Department. Deeds may also be recorded for execution, as also may judgments of the English and Irish Courts of Law.

55,701. There is a difference in the procedure between the Register of Deeds and the Register of Sasines. In the case of the Register of Sasines the original deeds are not retained in the registry, but in the case of the Register of Deeds they are?—That is so.

55,702. The Register of Sasines consists of copies of the deeds?—That is so.

55,703. Whereas in the Register of Deeds both the original deeds and the copies are retained?—That is so.

55,704. In the case of the Register of Sasines registration is compulsory. In the case of the other deeds is it compulsory or voluntary?—Some of them must be registered, but as a rule it is voluntary.

55,705. Is registration in the Register of Deeds largely employed?—It is very largely employed. I inquired the other day, and I was told that it is more largely employed now, and that more wills are recorded than used to be the case; and also it struck me as a curious thing that there are more holograph wills than there were. People make their own wills more than they did; that is the experience in Scotland.

55,706. Are the great majority of wills made in Scotland recorded in the Register of Deeds?—I think so.

55,707. As regards marriage settlements and other deeds of a personal character, is it habitual to register them or not?—I am afraid I cannot say definitely, but I should think so.

55,708. You cannot form any estimate of the proportion of the total number of deeds that are registered?—Of the total number of marriage contracts recorded, and not recorded, I am afraid I cannot give any estimate. I can ascertain it if you like.

55,709. It would be interesting if some estimate could be formed. What is the staff of the Register of Deeds?—One keeper, one first class clerk, three second class clerks, and one typist.

55,710. The copying in this department is also done by a staff of engrossers paid out of a lump sum?—It is done by engrossers, of whom there are something like 20; but we have now got one woman typist, whose work is confined at present to the typing of extracts. We have not extended her duties to making the original transcript, but she prepares the original extracts, and also any others asked for. I am rather anxious to substitute typists, if possible, for the engrossing work.

55,711. You have also a small department called the Chancery Department?—Yes.

55,712. What is the work of that department?—The Chancery Department record and extract decrees of service of heirs. Their duties are very much restricted now compared to what they were in old days. They also deal with gifts or appointments under His Majesty's Sign Manual to various offices, such as Lord Lieutenants of counties, Lord Advocate, Solicitor General, and Sheriffs, remissions by His Majesty of sentences pronounced in the Criminal Courts, and other writs that pass under the Great Seal.

55,713. Has the question of abolishing that department or merging it in some other legal department been under consideration?—It has been under consideration for a great number of years, since the duties and work of the office became so restricted.

55,714. Has the head of that department held an interim appointment for a number of years?—That is so.

55,715. And the matter still remains under consideration?—Yes. It was very nearly carried through in 1881. The then Deputy Clerk Register, I suppose, did not want to multiply the offices that he had more than he could help, and, I believe, it was owing to his desire not to do so that the thing fell through in 1881. Otherwise the duties of the office would have been placed under the Deputy Clerk Register.

55,716. The duties of the office are very small, you say?—Very small now, or comparatively small.

55,717. What is the relation of the Deputy Clerk Register to these various departments?—The Deputy Clerk Register has a general power to exercise superintendence and control over all other deputies, keepers, and officers within his office and department, and to carry into effect all the powers and authority that were by law vested in the Lord Clerk Register in regard to all classes of the public record.

55,718. Are you citing from the Lord Clerk Register Act 1879?—I do not think it is an exact quotation, but is a paraphrase from a report by a departmental committee. I have the words of the Act of 1879 here, "The Deputy Clerk Register shall have, save as otherwise provided, the whole rights, authorities, privileges, and duties in regard to the public registers, records, and rolls of Scotland, and the keepers and other officers thereof heretofore vested in the Lord Clerk Register, and shall exercise and discharge the same personally, giving regular attendance during the usual business hours for that purpose in Her Majesty's General Register House in Edinburgh."

55,719. What, in effect, do the duties comprise?—They comprise the custody and arrangement of all the registers permanently deposited in the General Register House, the superintendence of all persons official or non-official engaging in searching or examining the registers, the collection of the fees, and the power of issuing extracts or authenticated office copies of all deeds or documents in his custody. As head of the registration system in Scotland he has a further duty to confer with the court, formally or informally as occasion may require, regarding questions of difficulty; also to suggest and initiate and bring before the Secretary for Scotland any legislative changes for the improvement of the registration system in Scotland or the working of the Register House Departments.

55,720. (Sir John Kempe.) What is the meaning of the registers? What registers are they? Are they the Registers of Deeds?—Yes.

55,721. It does not refer to the Registrar General's Department?—No.

55,722. (Chairman.) The duties include the superintendence of the discipline and organisation of the staff employed?—Quite so.

55,723. Each of these departments has its own head, subordinate to you?—That is so.

55,724. That is to say, the Deputy Keeper of the Records, the Keeper of the Deeds Office, the Keeper of the Sasines Office, and the Interim Director of Chancery?—No, the Interim Director of Chancery does not really come within my jurisdiction. He is a court official. I have no control over him.

55,725. The Interim Director of Chancery is not under your control in any way?—No. I was asked to state what my views were about that office, but I have no control over it.

55,726. His office is located in the Register House?—Exactly.

55,727. But he is under the control of the Court?—Yes; he is not under my control, although I have certain small duties in connection with his office. There are a number of other departments located in the Register House, and that is one of them, over which I have no control.

55,728. In each of those departments is the detail of the work controlled by the immediate head of the particular department?—Yes.

55,729. In the case of the Register of Deeds and the Register of Sasines, you have told us that, after the registers have been prepared, they are transferred to your custody?—Yes.

55,730. Does it follow that when that transfer has taken place the arrangement for the searching of those registers and reference to those registers is under the direct control of the Deputy Keeper of Records and not of the Register of Sasines or Register of Deeds?—That is so.

55,731. What are the arrangements, supposing extracts or officially certified copies of any documents under your custody are required? Is it part of the duties of the staff to prepare such copies?—The staff prepare those.

55,732. Those would be prepared by the engrossing staff under the direction of the clerical staff, I suppose?—Exactly.

55,733. Now will you tell us about the appointment of the various officers; in the first place as regards your own office?—The appointment of Deputy Clerk Register dates from 1806, when it was instituted by Royal Warrant. The Deputy Clerk Register is appointed by the Crown and, by the common law of Scotland, and in virtue of the provisions of the 6th Section of the Act of 42 and 43 Victoria, chapter 44, the appointment is one that is held ad vitam aut culpam.

55,734. Is that because it is a Crown appointment?—Because it is a Crown appointment without any term affixed.

55,735. Is there no clause in your warrant of appointment fixing a term to the tenure?—In my warrant of appointment there is a limitation to the age of 70, to which, when I discovered what the opinion of the law officers of the Crown was on a case for opinion put before them, I took exception, because the appointment, according to the opinion of the law officers, is one which is held ad vitam aut culpam, to which no term can be applied. That 70 years of age limit had been inserted without my knowing really what the true position was, and I believe also without its being present to the minds of the Scottish Office.

55,736. Is it your opinion that that clause in your warrant is ineffectual for the purpose for which it was intended?—That is so.

55,737. Are there any legal qualifications laid down by statute for the office?—By statute, the holder of the office must be an advocate of 10 years' standing.

55,738. How is the Keeper of the Register of Sasines appointed?—By warrant under the sign manual on the recommendation of the Secretary for Scotland.

55,739. What is his tenure of office?—I believe it is a 70 years of age tenure, but I cannot say what the tenure of the present holder of the office is. The last holder of the office, who was promoted to another post afterwards, I believe had a 70 years of age tenure.

55,740. When you express the opinion that a clause in the warrant of appointment limiting the appointment to 70 years of age is ineffectual, does that apply to all Crown appointments, or only to certain appointments?—I am afraid I cannot speak as to that.

55,741. You have not considered the point except as regards your own office?—No, I have not considered the point. I believe the view taken by the law officers was that it was a munus publicum, according to the common law of Scotland, on which no limitation could be imposed. Besides that, according to the terms of the Act itself, it was an ad vitam aut culpam appointment, being a Crown appointment.

55,742. Was that opinion given with reference specially to that office?—With special reference to this office.

55,743. It was not a general opinion?—It was not a general opinion.

55,744. By whom is the Deputy Keeper of Records appointed?—By the Secretary for Scotland under the Lord Clerk Register Act, 1879, followed by the Secretary for Scotland Act, 1885.

55,745. What is the tenure of that post?—The ordinary Civil Service limit of 65 years of age.

55,746. And the keeper of the Registry of Deeds?—He is appointed by the Deputy Clerk Register, with the approval of the Secretary for Scotland, by promotion from within the Register House Departments, unless the Deputy Clerk Register reports to the Secretary for Scotland that there is no one within the department suitable to fill the post.

55,747. Are all other posts in this department, except those which you have mentioned, filled by competitive examination?—The second class clerkships are all filled by competitive examination.

55,748. In whose hands are the appointments to all the other posts?—Promotion is in the hands of the Deputy Clerk Register.

55,749. But the original appointments?—They are in the hands of the Secretary for Scotland by the Act of 1885.

55,750. The Secretary for Scotland appoints, the duties of the Treasury in that respect having been transferred to him by the Act?—Yes, by the Act of 1885.

55,751. From the statements you have made, it appears that there is a very considerable variety in the method of appointment of the different officers. Is there any reason for those variations?—I confess myself I am unable to see that there is any real reason why they should be all so different. They are all sub-departments in the Register House, and I think that if one is to be a Crown appointment then the others ought to be also.

55,752. Is there any reason why they should be Crown appointments?—No, I do not think there is.

55,753. We heard this morning that in the Court of Session there are a larger number of direct Crown appointments, and the opinion was expressed by the witness who was before us, Sir James Dodds, that there was no necessity for having so many Crown appointments. I gather that you are of the same opinion, that the number of Crown appointments in the Register House need not be so large as it is?—I think so.

55,754. In the past, have the holders of the higher appointments in your departments been appointed from the department itself or from outside?—To most of the higher posts appointment has been from outside, and those people, though possessing professional qualifications, have frequently been appointed without any previous experience in the Civil Service, and I think it is very essential that they should have had administrative experience.

55,755. Then you would be in favour of filling these appointments by promotion from within the department rather than by appointment from outside?—I should, certainly. I should explain, perhaps, that the Keeper of the Deeds Office is always appointed from inside. I think in an office like the Keeper of the Sasines Department, where you have a very large staff, administrative experience is really very much wanted. It is not as though the Keeper of the Sasines Office were a person who had to formulate policies, or anything of that sort; it is purely administrative work.

55,756. If these appointments cease to be Crown appointments, by whom do you think they should be made?—I think they should be made on the recommendation of the Deputy Clerk Register, and, unless he reports to the Secretary for Scotland that there is no one competent in the department to fill the vacant post, I think the Deputy Clerk Register should make them from inside.

55,757. You suggest that the Deputy Clerk Register should recommend to the Secretary for Scotland, and that the formal appointment should be made by Secretary for Scotland?—I think so.

55,758. And that the normal method of appointment should be from inside by promotion from the staff of the department, and that it should be only in cases where there is nobody suitable within the department that you should go outside?—That is what I should advocate.

55,759. You think that that would be advantageous both for the work of the department and also as regards the position and prospects of the staff?—I think so; and the officers being all officers of the Court, it has always been from old days not only the theory but, I think, the practice that the Head of the Court should be concerned with the working of the Register House Departments and their supervision. I think it might be a matter for consideration whether the Lord President should not be consulted in regard to those appointments as being the head of the judicial bench.

55,760. A suggestion has been made to the Commission as regards the higher legal appointments in the English departments, that the high appointing authority, the Lord Chancellor, for instance, should be assisted by a committee to examine the claims and merits of candidates and to report to the Lord Chancellor, who would then appoint after considering their report. Do you think there is place for any similar system as regards the Scottish legal appointments?—I think if the Lord Justice General, the head of the criminal bench, and the Lord President, the head of the civil bench (and they are one and the same person) were charged with taking part in the appointment along with the Deputy Clerk Register as far as regards the Register House appointments, it would be sufficient.

AUGUSTUS JAMES LEE, W.S.

55,761. You suggest that he should be consulted by the Secretary for Scotland as regards the departments of the Deputy Clerk Register?—I think so.

55,762. Do you suggest that he should be consulted with regard to the appointment of the heads of the different departments under the Deputy Clerk Register?—No, I think that might be left to the Deputy Clerk Register.

55,763. You think the Deputy Clerk Register's advice would be quite sufficient for the Secretary for Scotland in those cases?—I think so.

55,764. (Sir John Kempe.) So long as it is confined to promotions in the office, I suppose?—Yes.

55,765. (Chairman.) If there was a question of going outside the office, and if there was nobody suitable inside the office, would you then suggest the advice of the Lord President as well as of the Deputy Clerk Register; or in that case also, do you consider that the Deputy Clerk Register's advice would be sufficient for the Secretary of Scotland to go upon?—I think the Deputy Clerk Register would be only too pleased to have the assistance of the Lord Justice General and Lord President, and I think it would carry very much greater weight if the two were to agree.

55,766. You think it advantageous that he should be consulted when it is necessary to go outside the department?—I think it would be so.

55,767. Would you maintain a statutory qualification for the post of Deputy Clerk Register?—Yes, I think I would.

55,768. Is the legal experience and knowledge that would be possessed by an advocate of ten years' standing indispensable for the Deputy Clerk Register's duties?—I think the office of Deputy Clerk Register requires considerable acquaintance with the law of Scotland, and some acquaintance certainly with the conveyancing side of it. I think if anyone who was not a lawyer were to be appointed to a post of that sort, he would find himself with a great deal to learn.

55,769. (Mr. Coward.) Supposing he were a Writer to the Signet?—Of course then he would have considerable knowledge, too; he would be a lawyer. There is no reason why he should not be a Writer to the Signet.

55,770. (Chairman.) You would see no objection to extending the qualifications so as to include Writers to the Signet of a certain standing?—No, I do not think so. Of course my own feeling is that anybody to be appointed to a post of that sort ought to have previous administrative experience as well.

55,771. (Mr. Coward.) Probably a Writer to the Signet would have even more administrative experience than an advocate?—He would have more administrative experience perhaps, but not of the special work of a Government department.

55,772. Is it not the fact that in Scotland, as it is here, one son in a family will go to the Bar and another son will become a solicitor; it is a mere question as to which selects the one profession or the other, but they both have the same education to a very large extent?—Very often that is so, no doubt.

55,773. (Chairman.) You told us something about the appointment of the clerks. You mentioned that it was by competitive examination. Will you explain a little more fully the system?—The latest regulations which have been drawn up on the subject were only in March last. All candidates must be qualified either by the holding of the intermediate certificate of the Scottish Education Department, or they must have passed "the second examination in general knowledge" or substitutes prescribed for those passing as law agents in Scotland; also they must have been for five years in the office of a conveyancer, or alternatively hold a university degree, or have passed examinations qualifying for it, and have been for three years in a conveyancer's office. I have not been able myself to understand the full meaning of the provision that a candidate must be either a graduate of a university of the British Empire or have passed examinations "qualifying him for a degree in a university of the British Empire."

55,774. What is the distinction?—I have not been able myself to follow that distinction. I do not know what is to prevent them taking the degree if they have passed all the examinations.

55,775. Is it a question of fees?—I do not know. I have not discovered what it means. Then, having qualified in that way, there is a competitive examination in two subjects—the law of heritable property in Scotland (including conveyancing) and English composition (including handwriting and spelling). They must pass in both of those subjects.

55,776. Is that a competitive examination amongst the candidates?—That is a competitive examination amongst the candidates.

55,777. What are the ages for admission?—From 20 to 25.

55,778. Is that system found to work satisfactorily?—So long as you have an examination of that kind, I think it does work satisfactorily.

55,779. Has the period of service in a conveyancer's office been increased recently?—Yes, it has been increased.

55,780. What was it before the last change?—It was two years before the last change.

55,781. So it has been increased from two years to five years in the case of those who have not a university degree, and to three years in the case of those who have a degree?—Yes.

55,782. (Mr. Coward.) Does a conveyancer mean a man at the Scottish Bar?—No, a conveyancer means a Writer to the Signet or a solicitor to the Supreme Courts or other practising Law Agent.

55,783. (Chairman.) It has been suggested by some witnesses that a man who has been engaged in legal work for some years, and who has finished his education some years previously, would find it difficult to do himself justice in an examination, because he has passed beyond the stage at which an examination is an appropriate method of testing his knowledge. Does the experience of these examinations confirm that or not?—I do not think so. I have not heard so.

55,784. You have not found the examination system criticised on that ground?—No, I do not think so; I have heard nothing of that. On the contrary, I think there may be a risk here of people who pass the law agents' examination with a view of becoming solicitors or Writers to the Signet, finding, in two or three years, that they are not succeeding as they expected, then saying, "We will go to the Register House." I am not quite sure whether that is very desirable.

55,785. You may get a class of men who do not see a prospect of success in the profession of the law?—Exactly. It seems to me there is a risk of that.

55,786. Judging by results, do you find that the men who actually come in by this system are the men who are wanted for the work?—I think so.

55,787. They are sufficiently good both in intellectual qualifications and in legal knowledge?—I think so.

55,788. Does this apply to all the three departments to which you referred?—To all three departments. At the same time I think if, in place of this examination, these posts were open to the ordinary Civil Service it is quite conceivable that the requirements might be obtained in other ways by their having to pass special examinations, after having passed the Civil Service examination and become Civil servants.

55,789. That is to say, if you had purely open competition without any qualification of previous service in a conveyancer's office, you might then teach them such legal knowledge as is required after entry?—That might be so.

55,790. And you might test that knowledge by examination after they had been in the office for a short time?—Yes. One knows, in the case of Civil servants, that they frequently attend classes which they think will assist them in their special work. For instance, in this Register House there are some of our people in the Record Office who attend Professor Hume Brown's classes with a view to acquiring knowledge which may be useful to them in the way of deciphering old documents and papers. They are always very anxious to take any opportunity of that kind.

55,791. (Mr. Matheson.) In that case you would appoint at a lower age?—Yes, those who pass the ordinary Civil Service examination.

55,792. (Chairman.) You would be prepared to take them from the ordinary second division examination?—Yes, I see no reason why that should not be so. Of course our staff is a very limited staff. If it was less limited, those coming in might be put to the junior work and be gradually collecting the knowledge necessary for the higher branches of the work. But with a small staff that is not so easy, and I think the fact of the staff being so small, particularly in the Record Office, justifies these special regulations.

55,793. Do you, on the whole, prefer the present system?—I think at present, yes. I think there is something to be said for a change in time, but I am not prepared to advocate it now, especially as we have just got our new regulations and are not able to see quite how they will work.

55,794. What is your average number of vacancies annually?—In all the departments probably five or six.

55,795. How is the engrossing staff appointed?—They are appointed by the heads of the different departments.

55,796. And they are paid by the piece?—Yes.

55,797. The conditions of their employment were the subject of an inquiry by a committee?—It has been the subject of inquiry on several occasions by committees. My own opinion as regards the engrossing staff is that the conditions of their work and employment are very unfortunate. They are attracted in early life by the fact that they can make a considerable income by writing, and of course they are much more able to do that when they are young than when they get into later age. They make their 140% or 150% a year by engrossing, but by very hard work, and then, when they find that physically they are not equal to it later on in life, they become very dissatisfied and are rather anxious to have their position bettered, and complaints are numerous. The fact is that they work now from 9 in the morning till 7 at night, and this goes on during the whole of their life. My experience certainly in the Register House is that penmanship is not at all what it was. I think that is the general experience, and I may say that it is my experience not only from the work in the General Register House departments, but also from what I see of the work in the Registers of Births, Deaths, and Marriages. If you compare the work in those registers of the present day with the old parochial registers of 100 years ago I think you will find that penmanship is deteriorating. That is a reason which seems really to make it very important that the whole position of the engrossers should be very carefully and seriously considered. I am very anxious to substitute typing for the engrossing work, and, as I said, we have introduced it to a certain extent. We have two typists in the Deeds Office employed only for the purpose of preparing extracts. We do not allow them to engross the deeds; but I should like to see their work extended, and I think that is really the remedy for the whole position. I was not consulted at the time of the last Departmental Committee dealing with the engrossing staff in the Sasines Office. The engrossing staff in the Register House, I should also say, may be moved from one department to another, and some of the engrossers in the Sasines Office are at the present moment employed in the Deeds Office, and vice versa; so that the whole staff ought to be considered from one point of view. If typing were to be introduced into one section of the Register House, it might be done as an experiment to begin with; but I think it ought to be done everywhere.

55,798. (Miss Haldane.) Are the two typists women?—Yes, women.

55,799. (Chairman.) Was the question of the method of preparing the registers considered by the recent Commission on Land Registration in Scotland?—It was considered by the Committee that was presided over by Lord Low, and then photography was proposed—photolithography, I think it was called. I think a Bill was introduced to give effect to the recommendations of that Committee, but Parliament thought differently, and I do not think the Bill got very far. All the legal bodies in Scotland opposed it, I think.

55,800. Lord Low's committee reported in favour of that system?—Yes, and a Bill was introduced but did not pass the Legislature. The legal bodies opposed it, I think, one and all.

55,801. Personally you would not be in favour of a photographic system; you would be in favour of typewriting?—I think so. That is what I have recommended. Two and a half years ago we prepared a scheme under which we proposed that the engrossing staff in the Deeds Office should be pensioned off. As the result of that scheme, we thought the Treasury would be saved, I forget exactly what sums, but considerable sums, in a very few years. That proposal has not yet been disposed of.

55,802. (Mr. Coward.) If typing were adopted you would have a better product?—A better product. I may say we had a very gratifying letter the other day from a very considerable firm of legal agents in Glasgow complimenting the Deeds Office upon their typing work. They had received a typed extract of some document, and they wanted very much to know how it was done, what the typing machine was, and all about it, as it was better than they could do themselves. They appeared to be very pleased that the system had been adopted.

55,803. (Chairman.) It has been suggested to us that typing has this objection for legal documents: that alteration is more easy in that case than in the case of written documents. Do you attach any importance to that objection?—I do not think so. I may say that I had a report from the Stationery Office to say that the work of the typists submitted was quite indelible, and might be trusted to last for all time. That was before I submitted this scheme that we drew up.

55,804. You are aware that typing is used in the Principal Probate Registry in London for the copies of wills, which are bound up in volumes and preserved there?—So I understand.

55,805. And it is also in use in the Land Registry for the registers of land?—I am pleased to know that. As has been suggested to me, it would be a great advantage for the searchers that the writing should be in one uniform type, which would facilitate search very much.

55,806. Then you would recommend the use of typing, both for the Register of Sasines and also for the Register of Deeds?—I think so. I do not see why, if it answers in the Register of Deeds, it should not answer in the Register of Sasines too; but I have only suggested it as regards the Register of Deeds at present.

55,807. You would suggest trying it in the Register of Deeds first?—That is what I should like to do.

55,808. In the Register of Deeds, as the original deed is retained in the office, there would always be a check on any possible alteration?—Quite so.

55,809. The present staff of engrossers are not pensionable?—No.

55,810. If a change of system is not made and the present staff of engrossers goes on, do you think they ought to be made pensionable, or that some pension system ought to be devised for them?—I think it would be quite possible to devise a scheme by which they might be pensioned off at once, if typing were introduced. I think the figures that we had before us showed that the thing was quite feasible. They are not young men as a rule, and I think it might quite well be effected. As another illustration of the work of the engrossers, I may say that I inquired the other day as to their holidays, and one of them informed me: "I get three weeks in the year, but I would much sooner not have a holiday, because, in order to keep up my earnings, I have to work so hard before and after I have my holiday that it does away with the good of it." It strikes me that their whole lot is a very unfortunate one.

55,811. In the three departments of which you have spoken, apart from the higher posts which you told us under the present system are filled often from outside, is there a regular system of promotion upwards from the lower posts to the higher?—That is so.

55,812. Does that arrangement suit the organisation and the work of the departments?—I think so, very well.

55,813. You think that is the right system?—I think that is the right system. The present Keeper of the Deeds Office came from the Record Office.

55,814. Is there any interchange of staff between the departments?—There is not very much interchange. As a matter of fact it is provided that there shall be interchange, but I do not think there has been very much recently.

55,815. The work of each department is somewhat special, I suppose?—That is so.

55,816. But if there was a block of promotion in one department and a rapid flow in another, that might be equalised by transfers between the departments?—Quite so.

55,817. In making selections for promotion, what is the weight given to merit and seniority respectively?—I think weight is given both to merit and seniority.

55,818. Do you often depart from the strict order of seniority?—I do not know of any case in which that has been done in the Record Office. There was one case, I am told, but I do not know of any more.

55,819. So, in practice, it really amounts to promotion by seniority?—It does.

55,820. Unless there was a case of glaring demerit—would it be correct to put it in that way?—I think so.

55,821. Does that apply to other departments besides the Record Office—to the Register of Sasines and the Register of Deeds?—It does to the latter, but in the case of the Register of Sasines, I understand there have been recent promotions of junior men over the heads of senior first class clerks. But I have not been consulted.

55,822. Do you think that promotion by seniority is the right system, or that more weight ought to be given to selection by merit?—If seniority does not provide a suitable way of making promotion, I think merit would certainly be taken into consideration at once. If there were no senior men who deserved promotion, I certainly think we should overlook them and take the more meritorious man, even though he were a junior. No occasion has offered for preferring merit to seniority, as far as I know, within recent years.

55,823. There has not been sufficient difference between the merits of the different men to make it necessary to select a man who was some places down the list, in preference to those who were above him?—Quite so. In the other department over which I preside, the Registrar-General's Department, I have adopted a different rule. There are different branches there, and you can select a man who is more suited for one kind of work than for another. I have done that more than once, but there is larger scope there.

55,824. Have you a much larger staff there?—No, not a much larger staff, but the work is very different. For instance, there I have the census to look after and its requirements, and outdoor examinership requirements; and there is searching work inside, and statistical work. Accordingly, there being all these different sub-branches in the Registrar-General's Department, one man naturally is more suited for one kind of promotion than for another. There I have given promotion frequently to merit, or rather a more suitable man is found among the juniors than among the seniors. It gives one opportunities of making promotions in that way.

55,825. Turning now to the organisation of your departments generally, have you any observations to offer to the Commission on that subject?—So far as the needs of the public and the legal profession are concerned, the present organisation, on the whole, is adapted to secure a rapid and efficient dispatch of business. The scheme by which the post of Deputy Clerk Register and Keeper of the Records is combined with the post of Registrar-General of Births, Deaths, and Marriages has not, I think, in practice, been a success. The work of the two departments is entirely distinct, as is recognised both in England and in Ireland; and as the work of both departments has enormously increased since 1879, it has become quite impossible for one official to fill both posts without necessitating a degree of delegation, which could never have been anticipated when the posts were conjoined. There ought to be a separate post of Registrar-General of Births, Deaths, and Marriages, with a salary attached to it, as in England and in Ireland; and there should be a head of the Record Department able to give his undivided time to the supervision of the work of the Register House Departments, and of the registration system.

55,826. Which branch of your work occupies the greater part of your time—the Register House work proper, or the Registrar-General's work?—I am very much afraid that the Registrar-General's part of the work occupies most of my time. It certainly has during recent years, when I have had the census. Since I took office my time has been largely taken up with the duties of the office of Registrar-General of Births, Deaths, and Marriages, first with the Census of 1911, and then with many questions under the Old Age Pensions and Insurance Acts—duties requiring immediate attention and not admitting of delay, and I have had to rely very largely on the loyalty and discretion of the subordinate heads of the other departments.

55,827. Do you consider that that has made it necessary to delegate your duties to an inconvenient degree?—Certainly. Personally the work of the Deputy Clerk Register appeals to me very much more than that of the Registrar-General, because it is more interesting work altogether; and I can only imagine that when it was originally arranged that the Deputy Clerk Register should undertake the work of Registrar-General without separate appointment or salary, it must have been conceived by the Legislature that the Registrar-General had nothing or very little to do. Since then things have very much altered.

55,828. (Mr. Boutwood.) How long ago was it that the two offices were conjoined?—It was in 1879. Prior to that there was a Lord Clerk Register, and the Lord Clerk Register was a paid official with 1,200*l.* a year, and he presided himself over the whole Register House. There was a Deputy Clerk Register, and in those days he was also Registrar-General, so the conditions were different then. Then, when the office of Lord Clerk Register was abolished, the Deputy Clerk Register was left to do both the work of the Lord Clerk Register, the Deputy Clerk Register, and the Registrar-General, which is really almost more than it is possible for him to do. For instance, I have two houses, and two separate official rooms, and I have to be very much in the Registrar-General's room because there is constantly need for my attendance there, and the work is increasing very largely. Of course the searching which was necessary in the case of the Old Age Pensions Act I had to supervise. Then we have taken over from the Local Government Board recently the statistical work in connection with vital statistics in Scotland. Having been in the Local Government Board myself and Vice-President there, I was extremely anxious that the vital statistics of Scotland should be put on a much more satisfactory footing than they were; and, having the registers in the Registrar-General's department and being able to get the statistics of the births, marriages and deaths at first hand, I thought we had better arrange to take over that work from the Local Government Board who had to depend really on statistics which were not at all so accurate as those we were able to use at first hand. That, of course, created a considerable addition to the work. There were many other matters in connection with old age pensions. Where the information as to the age of applicants was not to be got from the ordinary sources, we opened up the Census of 1841 and 1851 in order to ascertain the ages of those whose ages were not to be found elsewhere. That was another new branch of work, and several other things led to a considerable increase of the work of the Registrar-General's Department, and a considerable increase in the staff too.

Sir JAMES PATTEN MACDOUGALL, K.C.B., accompanied by Mr. GEORGE

55,829. (Chairman.) Your conclusion is that the two offices ought to be separate?—I think they should be separated on the next occasion of an appointment.

55,830. Are you satisfied with the position of the Deputy Clerk Register in relation to the other departments of the Register House, or is any change required there in your opinion?—I think the Deputy Clerk Register should have full control over all the other departments in the Register House. The system is one that ought to be under one head, and, I think, all departments ought to be under the Deputy Clerk Register. It is the only proper administrative method that I can see, and it always has been so until recently.

55,831. Has there recently been some difference of opinion as to the exact relations between those other departments and the Deputy Clerk Register?—There has.

55,832. It is perhaps unnecessary for the Commission to go into the exact nature of the differences of opinion, but we should like your view generally as to whether any change in the relations is required, and whether the Deputy Clerk Register's control should be made more complete?—If it is not now complete I think it ought to be made so, but I should myself be perfectly satisfied with the opinion which has been expressed by the Head of the Court, in the recent case of Macdonald, as to the position, with regard to which he had no doubt and expressed himself to that effect.

55,833. What is the procedure with regard to matters of discipline in the departments?—Matters of disciplinary control are, under the Secretary for Scotland Act, committed to the Scottish Office.

55,834. Supposing there was a case of discipline in the Sasines Office on which the person concerned appealed to the Secretary for Scotland, would that appeal pass through you or not?—As a matter of fact, I do not think it does so pass at the present moment.

55,835. Do you think it ought to?—I think it ought to.

55,836. In the Record Department would it pass through you?—Certainly, I think so.

55,837. And in the case of the Register of Deeds would it pass through you?—Certainly.

55,838. In those two departments do all communications from the Scottish Office come to you and not direct to the head of the department?—Yes, certainly.

55,839. But in the Registry of Sasines, does the Scottish Office communicate direct with the Keeper of the Register of Sasines?—I understand that is so, recently.

55,840. Coming now to the question of the conditions and rules of the Service, what are the hours of attendance in your office?—They are from half-past 9 to half-past 4; on Saturdays to 1 o'clock.

55,841. Are the hours regularly kept?—Yes, I think so, and there is a good deal of overtime.

55,842. Is the overtime paid for or not?—Sometimes, yes; and sometimes, no. When I am talking of overtime, I may say that some of the staff are now on service and have enlisted, and the rest of the staff have been behaving most loyally and working extra time gladly to make up for those who are away.

55,843. Would that extra time be paid for as overtime or not?—In some cases it is paid for. In the Registrar-General's Department it is not, in some cases.

55,844. How is it determined whether it is paid for or not?—In one case there was money available to pay for overtime, because we had not got a clerk who had been estimated for. That is how it is done. It is not an additional charge, and we are permitted to do that.

55,845. Are there attendance-books kept, in which the staff enter their hour of arrival and departure?—Yes.

55,846. Are all the officers pensionable except the engrossing staff, about which you have already told us?—That is so.

55,847. Are they subject to the Civil Service rules as regards retirement?—Yes.

55,848. With the exception of the direct Crown appointments?—Quite so.

55,849. Do you consider that any further amalgamation of the different departments would be desirable, or is the present arrangement satisfactory?—I do not say there is any cause for amalgamation.

55,850. You think it desirable to keep the Register of Sasines and the Register of Deeds separate?—Yes, I think so.

55,851. It would not be convenient to have them under one head?—I do not think so.

55,852. You said you thought the Chancery Office might be transferred elsewhere?—Yes, I think the Chancery Office might be.

55,853. The two suggestions that have been made are to place it under the control of the Deputy Clerk Register, or else to transfer it to the Extractors Department. Are you prepared to express an opinion on which would be the better course?—I do not know what the Extractors Department really has to do with it, except that the Extractors Department is purely a court department. It extracts the interlocutors and judgments of the Court. The Chancery Office is an office which deals with the service of heirs—questions of heritable succession. I myself have not been able to see what the one has to do with the other, except that I think there was a vacancy in the Extractors Department and it was suggested by some one that possibly it was a case for amalgamation; but as between the two offices I do not think there is very much in common or any reason why the Chancery Office should be handed over to the other at all. I cannot follow it.

55,854. Then you think it better that it should be placed under the Deputy Clerk Register?—This was originally contemplated by the Treasury Departmental Committee, consisting of Mr. Gurdon and Mr. Morton, which sat in 1881, I think, and made that recommendation very strongly; but, as I mentioned before, it fell through owing to the reluctance of Sir Stair Agnew to take it on.

55,855. (Mr. Matheson.) Can you tell us how the Keeper of the Register of Sasines is appointed?—He is appointed by warrant under the Sign Manual on the recommendation of the Secretary for Scotland.

55,856. Is the Curator of the Historical Department appointed in the same way?—He is appointed by the Secretary for Scotland.

55,857. I notice there is an allowance for publication of calendars, chronicles, and so on. I suppose that refers to the Historical Department?—Yes.

55,858. Does it rest in the discretion of the Curator what he shall publish, or who decides that?—It is decided, on the recommendation of the Curator, by the Deputy Clerk Register.

55,859. (Mr. Shipley.) Am I right in thinking that you work at the Scottish Office in London?—No, I work in Edinburgh.

55,860. Are the offices there well adapted for your work. Are they well lit, well ventilated, and so on?—Yes.

55,861. And is there plenty of room?—The buildings of the Register House in Edinburgh are very large, but in the new buildings there are several offices with which I have nothing to do; they have apartments there. At the present moment, owing to the fact that the work of the Registrar-General's Department is increasing very largely, I am negotiating with the Woods and Forests Office to get them to remove the Receivership of Crown Rents Office, which is under them, in order to give me more room.

55,862. Are there plenty of lifts in the building?—No, there are no lifts; there was a proposal to have a lift.

55,863. (Miss Haldane.) With regard to the engrossing staff, do I understand that you think the whole of the engrossing work might be done by a staff of women?—I do not know why not. I should like to see how the two women typists we have there now are getting on. I should not like to commit myself to saying that it could be done by a staff of women, because I am told some of these documents and wills that come in are extremely difficult to decipher.

55,864. We have had a certain amount of evidence to the effect that women have been found to be rather clever in deciphering. I believe the classes of the historiographer which you mentioned are attended by women for that purpose?—I may say that my experience of the typists at the Register House is extremely good, but I should not like to commit myself to saying that all the typing could be done by women until I have more experience.

55,865. You mentioned that a Glasgow firm was very pleased with your typing. That goes to show that women can do that work?—That is so.

55,866. In fact, supposing things go favourably, there is no reason why there should not be a women's department entirely?—I do not see any reason why not.

55,867. (Mr. Coward.) Upon the subject of typists, I suppose you have probably tried both men and women typists?—Yes.

55,868. Have you had any experience of men typists?—Yes.

55,869. Is it not your experience that women do that class of work very much better than men?—My experience certainly is so; but I have had much more experience of women than of men at it. I have one most excellent typist—no one could possibly do things better—and if they were all as good as she is I should have no hesitation in saying so.

55,870. I would suggest to you that it is the kind of work that lends itself to a woman's hand?—Quite so. I am reminded that we have women indexers also in the Register House department doing the indexing work.

55,871. (Chairman.) Which department are those in?—In the Record Office. The work is paid for out of a special grant.

55,872. (Mr. Coward.) You have the general control of all these offices, as I understand?—Yes.

55,873. I should like to ask you, candidly, do you feel that you can exercise there an effective control, or is it only in name?—I think I exercise an effective control. I do not mean to say that I am in each office every day, or that kind of thing. I have to depend to a large extent upon my staff, and they are extremely good.

55,874. You must do that, but you can tell us, better than we can form an opinion otherwise, as to whether it is effective control or not?—I think I may say definitely that it is effective.

55,875. I suppose there are such things, even in Scotland, as clerks who, instead of doing work, are not averse to having a look at a paper and doing that sort of thing instead of their work, and idling. Would that class of thing be brought before you?—I think I should know about it in the long run, certainly.

55,876. If a clerk would do that sort of thing and the work of the office has to be done, it necessitates the introduction of another clerk to do the work that the idler should do, does it not?—Quite so.

55,877. Therefore you may very well get, without really good control, a multiplication of clerks in an office; that is to say, you may get 20 clerks doing the work that ought to be done by 10. Is not that right?—That would be so, of course, if they shirked their work.

55,878. Effective control is the factor without which the discipline of the office cannot go on. Is not that right?—Quite right, I think.

55,879. With regard to the copying clerks, I gather you agree that to keep a man employed from 9 o'clock in the morning until 7 o'clock —?—We do not keep them; it is they themselves who stay.

55,880. A clerk who is employed like that, and who has to go for a vacation at his own cost, is somewhat badly used, is he not?—I think so, very.

55,881. I was going to suggest a remedy, if you will kindly follow me. Supposing you gave that clerk a regular salary, the natural incentive to him, if he got a regular salary, would be not to do as much work as he would do if he were doing it by piece-work?—Certainly.

55,882. But supposing you had this kind of control over him: "We expect you to engross or to copy so many folios per day, and if you do that nobody will quarrel with you; but, if you do not do it, we shall think you are a slacker and shall exercise discipline," would not that do? You would give the clerk a salary instead of paying him by piece-work, but you would ensure that he did the work that he ought to do, and then you would give him a holiday and give him his pay at the same time?—That is what the engrossers have been struggling to get for many years. They want to be put on a different footing altogether.

55,883. Do you happen to know what is done by the writers in Scotland? Is not that the way they treat their clerks?—There is little engrossing work except in the Government departments. If you go into an ordinary lawyer's office you will find very little engrossing of that sort now; it is all done by typewriters. That is the reason why a number of these people come to the Register House, and probably it is the case in England, too. They say: "We are attracted by this; we can make 130*l.* or 140*l.* a year. We cannot make 70*l.* or 80*l.* in an ordinary lawyer's office; we will go to this place where we can make double." They come there and find to their cost, after they get to 40 or 50 years of age, that they have made a very bad choice.

55,884. (Chairman.) You find that the use of type-writing is extending rapidly in lawyers' offices?—Rapidly, I think.

55,885. (Mr. Coward.) In Scotland are original wills typewritten or are they copied by hand?—I think the law agents and the solicitors now, if employed to make a will, have it typed. It is all typing-work in their offices now.

55,886. You were talking about the question of the qualifications for the various offices. Do not you think there is a little question about that five years' qualification? Do not you find by experience that, from among the people who acquire that five years' qualification, you get a great many applicants who have not been successful during the five years they have been at work?—I gather that you think the five years is too long.

55,887. What I mean is, that the five years, or any period, does not really give you the qualification of a man. Supposing, for instance, a man goes to the Bar here and he does not succeed; he has nothing in the wide world to do. If he stops at the Bar he may go to tennis parties or anything he likes; but he has been five years at the Bar and he is qualified for this, that, and the other post. That is not a very good qualification, is it? The fact of his having been called for five years is no qualification, or need not be any?—No. I suggested that possibly there was some objection to that qualification in this way, that it is those sometimes who have failed in their profession who take to this work afterwards as a dernier ressort.

55,888. That is what I suggest. Somebody might apply because he felt that he was not strong enough at the Bar. On the other hand, if a man is at the Bar and is successful, he probably would never seek an appointment in a Government office at 100*l.* or 200*l.* a year?—No.

55,889. (Sir John Kempe.) The scheme of examination that you put before us as now adopted is very much what you suggested in a memorandum put before a Commission a year or two ago?—I think that is so.

55,890. You seem now to have a more or less open mind as to the mode of entrance into the clerkships?—Yes.

55,891. This scheme of yours seems to be intended to ensure particular qualifications for this office, and

13 May 1915.]

Sir JAMES PATTEN MACDOUGALL, K.C.B., accompanied by Mr. GEORGE
AUGUSTUS JAMES LEE, W.S.

not merely to ensure ability. It is rather intended ad hoc for these particular offices?—Yes.

55,892. What class of clerks do you get? I understand that they are men who have studied law to a certain extent, but you rather suggested that even a second division clerk might rise if he had time to study?—Yes.

55,893. Are the clerks you get of a higher class than the second division clerks now?—No; I should think they are very much the same type of man with this additional legal knowledge.

55,894. They are not better than the second division clerks?—No; I think very much the same.

55,895. Do you find men who have passed as second division clerks try to get into your office? It is better pay than the second division clerks get?—They cannot come in without having passed this examination. I do not think we get any second division clerks coming in by passing this examination. It is the men who come through a lawyer's office.

55,896. One would expect you to get a better class, because it is a better prospect than the second division?—I do not think I can say that it is a better class.

55,897. Was your scheme intended with a view to what you mentioned just now, namely, to provide men suitable for promotion in the office rather than to ensure general intelligence. You want to get men who will be fit to rise in the office by and by?—Yes. The men in this department are handicapped in a way, because, of course, they are confined to the department and cannot go out of it, and cannot get Civil Service appointments outside because they are a special class.

55,898. But you want to get them for the higher appointments in the office, and to ensure good enough men for that you put on this rather higher class of examination?—Quite so.

55,899. For those higher appointments you are rather aiming at symmetry—to have the heads of the different offices appointed on the same principle?—Yes.

55,900. As to the higher appointments, are the headships open to the clerks as well?—Certainly. The present head of the Deeds Office was in the Record Office. He has risen from the Record Office to the head of the Deeds Office.

55,901. But when you wish to secure more symmetry in the mode of appointment, is it because you are dissatisfied with the results at present? Do you think that the variety in modes of appointment has hurt the general efficiency of the office?—It is more because I do not see the reason for the distinction between the three modes of appointment. I think they should be all appointed in the same way.

55,902. It is merely with a desire for symmetry?—The one reason is a desire for symmetry, and I think it means better administration.

55,903. You could not secure what you want, that is to say, men fit for promotion in the office unless you had them all appointed in the same way?—I do not think it would be so easy.

55,904. (Mr. Boutwood.) I think you said one of the subjects in that examination was conveyancing?—Yes.

55,905. What sort of examination is it; is it merely elementary or something more?—It is an examination in the general law of conveyancing in Scotland. I cannot say whether it is a very stiff examination or not. I do not think it is an elementary examination. I think he must have a considerable knowledge of the law of real property.

55,906. It is a substantial examination?—It is a thoroughly substantial examination.

55,907. (Sir John Kempe.) With regard to the work done by the clerks, is it highly professional or technical?—I think it requires legal knowledge.

55,908. Is much of it clerical? Is it the kind of work that an intelligent man could come into the office and learn from the bottom and become fit to rise without having had any professional experience outside?—I may give an illustration of that in the Sasines Office. Deeds come in and then they have to be abstracted. There is a regular system of registration, and there is a search sheet. Anybody who wants to find out what the burdens upon a certain property are, looks at the search sheet, which is an abstract of what appears in the original deeds as to the burdens and all the rest of it. That abstract has to be done by the clerks, and it requires a certain amount of legal knowledge.

55,909. Is that work done by the clerks at the bottom in the second class?—Yes.

55,910. Is that the lowest form of work they have to do? I suppose there is a great deal of inferior class of work to be done?—Yes.

55,911. Some purely clerical work?—Some purely clerical.

55,912. Filling up forms and so on?—Yes.

55,913. And would there be enough of that inferior class of work to occupy all the second class?—No, there would not be enough of that to occupy the whole of them. It must be distributed.

55,914. They have to do all kinds of work?—Yes.

55,915. (Chairman.) Is the work of the Sasines Office done at all through the Post. Can a deed for registration at the Sasines Office be sent by post?—Yes, country deeds are sent by post.

55,916. And returned by post?—And returned by post.

55,917. In the same way in the Registry of Deeds, can a deed be sent by post, and a certified copy returned by post?—Yes. In the Sasines Office there is a presentment book where an entry is made at once, because priority is of importance. Say there is a mortgage on property and it is sent in for registration, the date on which it is received has to be entered at once in the presentment book. That is the first stage.

55,918. You have suggested that women might be employed for typing, and that the use of typing might be extended. Are there any other directions in which the employment of women might with advantage be extended? You mentioned, for instance, that women were employed on some of the indexing work. Are they employed at all on the indexing of ancient records?—Not at present, except in a very small way*.

55,919. Is there an opening for employing them there? Would there be any advantage in employing them in that work?—I do not see why not. I may illustrate that by saying that in the Registrar-General's Department, two or three days ago, three of the staff were extremely anxious to be allowed to enlist; I got leave for them, and I am replacing them by two typists. I am told that I shall have great difficulty in getting the work done—I do not believe it myself—but they are to do searching work for those who are getting extracts and certificates from the old registers. I hope it will be a success.

55,920. No corresponding work of that kind is done by women at present in your departments?—No.

55,921. So that is a new experiment?—Yes, it is a new experiment.

* They have recently been employed to do some indexing from 1668 in the Deeds Office, as a test.—J. P. M.

ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTY-FOURTH DAY.

Wednesday, 19th May 1915.

PRESENT:

SIR HENRY BABINGTON SMITH, K.C.B., C.S.I. (Chairman).

The Hon. LORD DUNDAS.
 Sir JOHN ARROW KEMPE, K.C.B.
 Mr. ARTHUR BOUTWOOD.
 Mr. JOHN ROBERT CLYNES, M.P.
 Mr. CECIL COWARD.

Mr. PERCY EWING MATHESON.
 Mr. ARTHUR EVERETT SHIPLEY, F.R.S.
 Mr. PHILIP SNOWDEN, M.P.
 Mr. GRAHAM WALLAS.
 Miss HALDANE.

Mr. E. W. H. MILLAR (Secretary).

Mr. EDWIN ADAM, K.C. (Principal Clerk of Session), called and examined.

55,922. (Chairman.) Mr. Adam, you are Principal Clerk of Session?—I am.

55,923. How long have you held that office?—Since 1907.

55,924. What had been your experience before you were appointed to that office?—I am a Master of Arts and Bachelor of Laws of the University of Edinburgh; I am an Advocate of the Bar of Scotland since 1885; I was Advocate Depute under the Lord Advocate from 1905 to 1907; I was appointed Principal Clerk in 1907 and King's Counsel shortly afterwards.

55,925. We have already had in evidence a general statement of the constitution and jurisdiction of the Court of Session; we will not, therefore, ask you to enter into particulars as regards that. Will you be good enough to tell us, first, the nature of your duties as Principal Clerk of Session?—The Principal Clerk of Session is responsible for the records of the Court, and he acts either personally or by the depute, assistant, and ordinary clerks of Session. He is entrusted under the Lord President with the supervision of these officers, and also of the clerks in the Bill Chamber. The records of the Court under his charge fall under the heads of the Books of Sederunt, the Minute Book, and the processes in the various proceedings in the court. The first of these are under his personal supervision, and in this matter he is assisted by the depute clerk in the first division.

55,926. That is to say, the Books of Sederunt?—The Books of Sederunt.

55,927. Those books contain a record of decisions of the Court on matters of procedure, do they not?—No; the Books of Sederunt contain the Acts of Sederunt, properly so called. These are legislative Acts by the judges, either under their common law powers or their statutory powers. They also contain all the warrants of installation of the various officers of the court, judges, advocates, macers, and Crown officials, and the takings of the oath by the various Crown officials are all entered in the Books of Sederunt.

55,928. Do they also contain rules made by the Court for the regulation of its own procedure?—That is so.

55,929. The method by which the Court lays down rules or makes alterations in its own procedure is by Act of Sederunt, is it not?—That is so.

55,930. What is the Minute Book?—The Minute Book contains the orders and judgments of the Court in litigations and all proceedings before the Court; it includes warrants of intimation of petitions and all decisions in the different cases; those all pass through the Minute Book, as the public record and the public intimation of any act, decree, or warrant of the Court.

55,931. That record is published?—That record is printed and published.

55,932. Is it under the charge of a special officer?—Yes, there is a Keeper of the Minute Book, who is assisted by clerks.

55,933. Is he under your supervision?—He also is under my supervision.

55,934. You mentioned, thirdly, processes. Will you tell the Commission exactly what the processes are?—

The process contains the first writ instituting the proceedings—it may be a summons or it may be a petition; that is lodged by the party raising the process with the clerk of the Court along with an inventory of process, a duplicate inventory of the process, the productions that he founds on and inventories of the productions. Of course, in the different sorts of proceedings the processes would be found to be of very different natures, but these are the main writs in the process.

55,935. Would it be correct to say that the process is the file of all papers necessary for the current conduct of the case?—That would cover it, I think.

55,936. The process forms a record of the different steps in the procedure, the pleadings on each side, and any documents produced in the case?—And I should have included the interlocutor sheet, which gives the record of the judges' decisions in the case or the judges' orders.

55,937. Any intermediate decisions and the final decision?—All the decisions from the warrant; it may be ordering intimation if it is a petition. There is no such warrant if it is a summons. That warrant is granted by placing the signet on the summons.

55,938. Are the processes in your charge?—I am responsible for the keeping of the processes with the assistance of my staff.

55,939. So long as the case is still current?—Yes, that is so.

55,940. When the case ceases to be current, what happens to the process then?—In an ordinary case the process has to be transmitted to the custody of the Lord Clerk Register, in the person of the Keeper of the Records, who is a separate official who is not under my charge.

55,941. So long as the case is still alive, the process remains in the custody of one of your officers?—That is so.

55,942. And is produced as required in court by him?—Yes. I may say that if at any time we require to get a process that has been transmitted to the Keeper of the Records there is a proceeding by which that is attained.

55,943. Then there is also the Extractor's Department?—Yes, the Extractor's Department puts the final decision of the Court into the form in which the party who has obtained that order may put it in force as the law requires, either by putting it into the hands of a messenger-at-arms and using diligence upon it or recording it in the appropriate register, it may be of Sasines if it is a heritable decree, a decree regarding landed property.

55,944. Has the Extractor to draft a fresh document, or has he merely to copy the record which is already entered in the interlocutor sheet?—He has practically to interpret to a certain extent the technical terms, like pursuer and defender, which would alone appear in the interlocutor sheets; he has to write in full the names and designations and form it, so that in itself it is an intelligible warrant. It is not mere copying.

55,945. Does that involve changes in the form of the document, or only the insertion of such particulars

19 May 1915.]

Mr. EDWIN ADAM, K.C.

as are necessary to make it intelligible independent of other records?—I should say that he would not change the form further than was necessary to make it completely intelligible. Of course, on the interlocutor sheet of the particular process it is quite intelligible in itself; but when it leaves that process it has to get put on it the necessary information that is contained in the fact that it is in the process. I think that will pretty well cover it. It is very technical matter.

55,946. Is it a matter that requires considerable legal knowledge, or is it a matter more or less of form?—That is a matter that the Extractor would be better able to tell you than I am, because extracts do not pass through my hands; practically when it is submitted to the Extractor it has passed out of my purview; but I should say that it requires a good deal of legal knowledge to be able to put it into proper legal form, and it would be a very dangerous matter for a layman to try to turn his order of court into a warrant to be put into the hands of a messenger-at-arms.

55,947. I find in the evidence of Mr. Thomson, before the Committee on Minor Legal Appointments in Scotland, the following passage on page 27, in the first column. Mr. Thomson was giving reasons to show that the framing of the extract sometimes involves examination of numerous documents and even discussion with the agent. "The interlocutor ran, 'The Lord Ordinary grants the special powers craved' (it was a note by a judicial factor for special powers). On referring to the prayer, the Court was prayed to 'sanction the said agreement.' On reading the narrative of the petition, I found about four pages of print taken up with detailing long negotiations by correspondence and interviews, and ending up with the sentence, 'The terms of the agreement are contained in the copy correspondence herewith produced.' The construction of an extract in the case of such an interlocutor was rather a problem. It was done by sending for the agent, and adjusting with him the partial narrative taken from the petition, which made it intelligible." In a case like that it would appear that the extractor's work did involve a considerable amount of intelligent abstraction from other documents?—Quite so.

55,948. Would cases of that kind be frequent or exceptional?—Very frequent; I should say almost the rule. In ordinary form we grant a decree as craved.

55,949. It would always involve examination of papers to see exactly what the decree as craved was?—That is so.

55,950. To return to your own duties, what are your duties as regards attendance in court?—The Principal Clerk of Session has to be in court unless his duties call him elsewhere.

55,951. Which court do you attend?—At present, by arrangement with the Lord President, I sit in the First Division Court, where I am in touch with my immediate superior, the Lord President, and also in touch with the Books of Sederunt and the other matters that I am specially called upon to attend to. Of course sitting there I am also available at once for consultation by any of my deputes who want advice of any kind.

55,952. We have been told by a previous witness that you have depute, assistant, and ordinary clerks. Will you tell us what their duties are?—The depute, assistant, and ordinary clerks are, under the Principal Clerk of Session, responsible for the clerking in the various courts. They are responsible for the custody of processes, for the proper fee-funding of the various steps of process, for the proper marking and borrowing of process. The assistant and ordinary clerks are primarily responsible for attendance in the offices at the Register House, but may be required to attend in court when not required at the Register House. The deputes' primary duty is in court, but they also require to relieve the assistant or ordinary clerks of attendance at the office during a part of each vacation. The assistant and ordinary clerks also enter in the Minute Book the orders pronounced in their respective courts for insertion in the Minute Book. They also compile the annual statistical returns for their court.

55,953. You told us that the Minute Book is in the hands of a Keeper of the Minute Book?—

Yes. When an order has been pronounced in any of the courts, it goes down to the Register House to the office of that court. Assistant and ordinary clerks are just the same; they are assistant clerks in the Outer House and ordinary clerks in the Inner House, but their functions are practically the same. When an order goes down to that office the duty of the assistant or ordinary clerk is to make an abstract of that order in form to appear in the Minute Book, and the draft that he has made is transmitted to the Keeper of the Minute Book.

55,954. So that it is the assistant or ordinary clerk who is responsible for the form of the minute as drafted in the Minute Book?—That would be so, unless the Keeper of the Minute Book took exception to the form, in which case I presume it would come up for my determination; but that has not occurred in my time.

55,955. I gather from what you say that the deputes do not attend at the offices of the Register House except in vacation?—As a rule they do not. Some deputes, I believe, go down and superintend the making up of the bag for the next day; they will do so if there is special pressure, and they think their assistant requires any aid; but that would be exceptional.

55,956. Then there is also the Teind Office; how far is the Teind Office under your supervision?—I am not at all sure. The Teind Office is to a certain extent self-contained; at present it is under the care of an Interim Clerk of Teinds. I understand he has put in a statement of the position of the Teind Office, which I have handed in as an appendix. He also gave a very full statement of the position of his office before the Departmental Committee in 1911, which might also be referred to.

55,957. We have been told that that is a very small office dealing with very technical and intricate matters?—That is so.

55,958. I gather from what you say that it works practically independently of you?—Yes, practically independently of me.

55,959. Coming now to the Bill Chamber, will you tell us what the work of the Bill Chamber is?—The work in the office of the Bill Chamber may be divided first into original Bill Chamber proceedings, suspensions, suspensions and interdicts, &c. These are equivalent to injunction proceedings, I understand, in the law of England.

55,960. Urgent matters requiring an interim order prohibiting certain action pending trial of the case?—That is so. Then there are Bankruptcy proceedings, including appeals in Bankruptcy; that, of course, is a very large and important department.

55,961. Are the whole of the Bankruptcy proceedings that come before the Court of Session dealt with in the Bill Chamber?—Yes, so far as they are Bankruptcy proceedings they are dealt with in the Bill Chamber.

55,962. There are various other miscellaneous kinds of work which have been assigned to the Bill Chamber and are dealt with by the Junior Lord Ordinary?—That is so.

55,963. We have already heard what the staff of the Bill Chamber is. Will you tell us how far that office is under your supervision?—That office is under my supervision to the same extent as my own clerks of Session are; it was brought in, in the same terms as my own clerks under my supervision, by the Court of Sessions (Scotland) Regulations Act, 1889, 52 and 53 Victoria, chap. 54, sect. 1; that is to say, they are under my supervision under the Lord President. I do not say that that statute really for the first time gave the supervision to the Principal Clerk. I think it was always there; but that narrates the fact of the supervision.

55,964. We have already dealt with the offices of the Extractor and the Keeper of the Minute Book. Will you tell us now about the Auditor of Court and his office?—The Auditor of Court was appointed by Act of Parliament, I think in 1810, which confirmed and made statutory the appointment that had been made by an Act of Sederunt of the Court a few years preceding. His office does not seem to be brought under the supervision of the Principal Clerk of Session.

19 May 1915.]

Mr. EDWIN ADAM, K.C.

55,965. What are his duties?—His duties are to tax the accounts of litigants in the Court of Session as they are remitted to him by the court.

55,966. Is he paid by salary or by fees?—He is paid a salary of 700*l.* a year for that work.

55,967. Is he required to give his whole time to his duties?—He is allowed to take up extra-judicial work, as we call it, and is paid by the parties employing him to do it.

55,968. By that, do you mean extra-judicial work of the nature of taxing?—It is usually that, I understand.

55,969. Does he also practise as a solicitor?—He is debarred from practising as a solicitor?

55,970. Is he appointed by the Crown?—He is appointed by the Crown ad vitam aut culpam.

55,971. Will you tell us about the judges' clerks?—The judges' clerks' duty is that of assisting, in every secretarial way, their judge in the performance of his judicial duty. They look after the judge's papers, and have these in order for him on the bench; they write out his opinions and supply copies to the parties. They also act as keeper of the roll in any court in which their judge may preside.

55,972. Does that mean that they keep the roll which determines the order in which cases appear in the court of that judge?—That is so.

55,973. Do the judges' clerks have a considerable amount of secretarial work?—That I could not speak to. Their work is fairly constant, but the actual amount of writing they would have to do depends very largely upon the judge with whom they are working.

55,974. How are the clerks appointed?—They are appointed by the judge for whom they are acting.

55,975. The number of clerks is the same as the number of judges—13?—That is so.

55,976. Are they pensionable?—They are pensionable. There is a peculiar system of pension for the judges' clerks. It arose from the fact that amongst themselves they had a pension fund which was taken over under Act of Parliament, and their pension after that was paid by the State; but the State has the fund, I understand, that had accumulated under their own pension fund.

55,977. Is the pension one of fixed amount?—I understand that it is. I understand that it also has this peculiarity, that if one of them is again appointed a judge's clerk by a new judge, his pension goes towards his salary; that is to say, he does not get more than a judge's clerks salary; but if he is appointed to another office, his pension, not being a Civil Service Fund pension, is paid to him in addition to his salary in the new office—that is, apart from his clerk's office.

55,978. Is any specified length of service necessary before a judge's clerk can receive pension; or is he entitled to his pension on retirement, however short a time he may have served as a judge's clerk?—That I think depends upon how he remits office. I am not prepared to speak exactly upon this point, but my understanding is that if the judge dies or resigns the judge's clerk gets his pension, provided the clerk has served for five years. If it is by his own resignation or dismissal, I understand that the matter is different, and he gets no pension.

55,979. If he retires from ill-health, does he get a pension however short his period of service?—I am not prepared really to speak to that, but I could find out and let the Commission know if desired.*

55,980. Have the judge's clerks any emoluments other than their salary?—Yes, they get certain emoluments in the Outer House or in Court generally, if their judge is presiding at a proof.

55,981. That is to say, a case in which witnesses are called?—Yes, where evidence is led the judge's clerk gets writing fees for a certified copy of the evidence.

55,982. Are those fees paid by the parties if they wish to have a copy of the evidence?—That is so, I understand.

55,983. Does that constitute a considerable addition to their emoluments?—In the Outer House, it must, as all proofs in the Outer House, of course, are before the judges of the Outer House. But this is not a department within my sphere.

55,984. Are the judge's clerks not in any way under your supervision or control?—I understand not.

55,985. They are entirely under the control of the judges whose clerks they are?—I should say so.

55,986. There are also a certain number of macers?—Yes, there are certain macers, and in times of pressure we are entitled to get the services of one or other of the macers in the Court of Justiciary by application to the Crown Agent.

55,987. We have been told that the macers are appointed by the Crown?—That is so, on the nomination of the Lord Advocate, with the exception of one macership, the patronage of which was given, about the fifteenth century, to the vassal in a particular estate that is at present in the hands of the Marquis of Bute.

55,988. Do the macers receive any emoluments in addition to their pay?—They receive a fee for every witness put into the witness-box of one shilling, I believe.

55,989. Is that laid down by Act of Sederunt?—Not by Act of Sederunt, but by uniformly recognised practice in the Court, which is recognised by the auditor of the Court.

55,990. You have told us what the position of the judges' clerks is as regards pension; what is the position of the various other officers whom you have mentioned?—The clerks of Session are pensionable, with the exception of one who does not give his full time. There is only one clerk of Court at present who is in that position, acting as a member of a firm of law agents.

55,991. Did his appointment take place before the rule was made requiring clerks to give their whole time?—No, I understand not.

55,992. Is it the present rule that in the case of any new appointment the officer now must give his whole time?—I believe that is a question of the terms made with him on his appointment. I am not in control of that.

55,993. In whose control would it be?—The Secretary for Scotland, I should say.

55,994. When was the clerk appointed who does not give his whole time?—In 1905, before my time.

55,995. Has it been the practice in appointments since then to require that the clerk should give his whole time to the Service?—That is so.

55,996. But there is nothing in the statute or in the rule governing the offices which requires that that should be the case?—No.

55,997. Will you continue your statement of the position of the clerks as regards pension?—The Interim Clerk of Teinds and his assistants are not pensionable. The Bill Chamber clerks are pensionable, but not the clerical assistant. The Keeper of the Minute Book and his Depute are not pensionable; judges' clerks are pensionable under Section 17 of the Court of Session Act, 1838. Macers of the Court of Session are pensionable, except one who is appointed on the nomination of the Marquis of Bute, as I said.

55,998. Coming now to the system of appointment, you have told us that the judges' clerks are appointed by the judges themselves. Are the other officers that you have mentioned appointed directly by the Crown?—That is so, with the exception of certain of the minor officials, who are appointed by the heads of their departments; that is the clerical assistant in the Bill Chamber and some of the writing clerks in the Extractor's Office. All the clerks who are not pensionable are practically not appointed by the Crown.

55,999. We have been told that those appointments are made on the recommendation of the Lord Advocate?—I understand so.

56,000. Is it the practice to appoint directly from outside to the higher offices, or is it the practice to promote from below?—To what one might call the heads of departments the practice is direct appointment by the Crown.

56,001. From outside?—From outside; that is the Auditor, the Extractor, the Principal Clerk of Session,

* He gets no pension however long he may have served.—E. A.

19 May 1915.]

Mr. EDWIN ADAM, K.C.

the Clerk of the Bills, and the Keeper of the Minute Book. Other appointments are sometimes direct from the outside, or they may be by promotion. Depute clerks of Session are sometimes appointed direct from outside, sometimes by promotion from amongst the assistant or ordinary clerks.

56,002. Having regard to the qualifications required, do you think that, in the case of these higher offices, appointment from outside is necessary; or can the qualifications be acquired by service in the office?—For heads of departments I think that the necessary qualifications might be attained within the office; but even that is hardly quite general. The auditor requires to be a man of considerable standing amongst his fellow agents in order to carry the weight that the auditor's decision always has both with the profession and with the Bench.

56,003. He would already in his own practice have had experience of bills of costs?—That is so; it would be his standing in the profession that would give him his knowledge of the business of auditor.

56,004. For the other heads of departments, you say that outside experience is not so necessary?—Except so far as is required to give him prestige enough to conduct his office with success in regard to the clerks of the office; it would depend upon whom it was proposed to promote as against a suitable outsider.

56,005. If there was a suitable man in the office, would he not carry sufficient prestige for the control of his subordinates?—I think that has been very frequently looked to by the parties making appointments.

56,006. Looking at the question as a whole, do you think that the present system of appointment is the right one, or would you vary it in any way?—On the whole I should say that the present system has worked remarkably well. I certainly think that the system of promotion from within would give more encouragement to the junior part of the staff, and, so far as possible, I think that system ought to be followed.

56,007. Then would you make all the officers of whom we have been speaking Civil servants, required to give their whole time to the Service?—I certainly approve of their all giving their whole time to the Service and making them Civil servants so far as pension is concerned.

56,008. And you would prefer, as a general rule, a system of promotion from below upwards, rather than a system of appointment from outside to the higher posts?—Certainly.

56,009. If that were recognised as the principle, would you maintain the present system as regards the appointing authority?—I should say so.

56,010. Is it necessary or desirable that so many of the officers in question should hold direct Crown appointments?—I do not understand exactly the bearing of that point. Of course they do at present hold direct Crown appointments, and some of us have got to pay for that; that is to say, we have got fees to pay to the Chancery Office for our appointment. I think they all have to pay fees for the office. In my own case I think it was about 28*l.* I paid for the warrant I sit under.

56,011. To what office?—Of Principal Clerk; that is paid in the Chancery Office. You pay 10*s.* for your King's letter, you take that King's letter to the Chancery, and they hand you out your warrant under the seal kept in Scotland as the Great Seal, upon payment, I think it is, of 28*l.* 0*s.* 2*d.* The Lord Justice Clerk also pays that fee. The other judges have had it remitted to them long ago, but the minor officers have to pay, I think it is, 10*s.* for their King's letter. Recently there has been a tendency in these appointments to make the appointment so far as possible wider than it used to be. A man used to be appointed ordinary clerk of the second division, and there he had to sit until he got another warrant appointing him ordinary clerk in the first division, and then if he was promoted to any other office, as recently occurred, he was appointed to be depute clerk of the second division, but in that case they have appointed him depute clerk of the Inner House, which will let him sit either in the second or first division as may be required, which is a widening of the sphere of his commission. I do not see very much in the fact that he has got to pay 10*s.* for his Royal Commission provided the Royal Commission is made reasonably wide. It is absurd to tie him down to one particular court when he could be performing exactly the same duties just across the passage, but it requires a new warrant.

56,012. That system is historically interesting, but is there any other reason for retaining it?—I know of none.

56,013. In practice it would appear to be cumbrous, and in some respects inconvenient, in that it limits the particular post to which the person is appointed?—With too great minuteness.

56,014. Has it also any bearing on his tenure of office?—Not that I know of. Within modern times they have slipped into the warrants a limit of 70 years of age as the termination of the warrant. That, I understand, is by arrangement with the Treasury; but I understand also that there is no statutory warrant for that limitation.

56,015. We have been told by one witness that he considered that although that limitation was in his warrant it was ineffective and null. Do you concur in that opinion?—I have no opinion upon that point.

56,016. If direct appointment by the Crown were abolished in the case of all the minor offices and heads of sub-departments and those officers were placed on a Civil Service footing, would not that have considerable advantages as regards organisation and as regards questions of transfer and promotion?—It would depend upon in whose hands the power of transferring and promoting was put, I should say.

56,017. Whatever hands it was in, those hands would not be fettered by the limitations arising from the Crown warrant of appointment?—That is so.

56,018. We have been told that it is a matter of common knowledge that in legal appointments in Scotland, at any rate in the case of the higher appointments, political considerations have intervened. Has that been the case as regards the officers of whom you have been speaking, the heads of sub-divisions?—It is not for me to say. I receive the officer after his appointment. I know nothing of the reasons for his being appointed.

56,019. Are you prepared to express an opinion as to whether appointments of this kind ought to be made without any reference to political considerations?—I should say that all appointments ought to be made without reference to political considerations.

56,020. If a system such as I have described, of making all the officers Civil servants and making the general rule promotion from below upwards were adopted, do you think it would be desirable to maintain the present system of personal nomination on the advice of the Lord Advocate, or would it be desirable to change that?—I think that appointment upon the nomination of the Lord Advocate works very well. The field is very small, the qualifications are special, and the Lord Advocate is in a position to find out all that is really requisite for a good appointment; and hitherto, I should say, that it has worked fairly satisfactorily in the Court of Session. I do not suppose that any system will give us the perfect clerk.

56,021. Do you think that any form of competition, open or limited, would be applicable?—I do not think it would give us the class of man that we require.

56,022. What is the class of man that you require?—We want a man who has had a fair amount of experience inside the profession, and I do not think that that class would come forward for a competitive examination for the places that are so seldom open; it really would hardly be worth a man's while working up for a Civil Service examination on the chance of a vacancy.

56,023. Are you aware that a system of competition exists now for appointments in the Register House?—I was not aware of that.

56,024. A system exists of competition among persons who have a certain length of service in a solicitor's office, that length of service varying according to whether the candidate has or has not a university degree. There is competition among candidates holding these stated qualifications. Have you considered whether a system of that kind would be applicable to the offices of the Court of Session if they were unified in the manner that has been suggested?—I can quite see that it might be made applicable.

Mr. EDWIN ADAM, K.C.

56,025. Do you consider that a system of that kind would give you the sort of men you want?—Really the qualifications are so personal to the man himself that I cannot imagine that an examination would fetch them out.

56,026. You would prefer the system of personal nomination?—Honestly, I would.

56,027. (Mr. Coward.) The other would be an experiment?—Yes, it would; it would be an experiment with a very old institution where a man has to come in and make himself conversant with practically centuries of practice. You never know when you may not have to turn up some very old precedent for a particular case that is in hand, in order that justice may be done. It is a peculiar type of mind that is required, and I cannot see how an examination would find it out.

56,028. (Chairman.) Under the present system the knowledge necessary for dealing with those obscure points of practice that you mentioned has to be acquired after a man has entered the office?—Not altogether; he has already found out from the other side, from outside the Bar, the nature of the job he has got to do. The agents' clerks and advocates' clerks and the solicitors themselves are all working against the clerks of the Court—that is to say, there are two of them working, one for the party and one for the Court—so that the matter is kept going.

56,029. You attach importance to that knowledge which is derived from previous experience outside?—Yes.

56,030. How then would a system of appointment which takes that into account work with the system of promotion from below upwards for which you have expressed a preference. If a man was appointed at the bottom of the ladder he would, I presume, be generally a man who had not at any rate long experience in the outside profession?—That is just our difficulty; we would not be getting in the ripe kind of man that we get just now when he is appointed later in life.

56,031. Can he not be ripened in the office?—It takes a long time. One is talking of a very few individuals. I have in my mind practically 14 men I am looking upon who have come in, and it is more often just the general loyalty to the Service that makes the thing workable at present. I cannot see if they were all just promoted in one sort of system by examination that it would improve things at all. There are failures amongst them, no doubt.

56,032. I was considering the larger number which would be included if the various offices were unified. The number then would amount to somewhere about 60, would it not?—I do not know how many offices are to come in. That would make a greater diversity of qualification required. A man who would make a very good copying clerk in the Extractor's Office might make a very bad clerk of the court. A man who has been accustomed just simply to copy what someone else has done is not fitted to be a clerk of court at all. A clerk of court practically does no copying work, his work to a certain extent is original work, under the supervision of his judge.

56,033. The question of the copying clerks pure and simple is perhaps one to be considered separately;—whether they should be eligible for promotion to the more definitely clerical posts where the work requires knowledge and discretion. Are there not in the sub-departments of the Court a good many subordinate posts where the work is other than pure copying?—I should say so.

56,034. Do you see any difficulty in those posts being included in a general scheme with promotion upwards?—Not provided the promotion is made very largely dependent upon capability, that the man is not merely because he has been in that post for so many years to be necessarily promoted up higher.

56,035. You would say that any system of general promotion must necessarily be promotion by merit and not by seniority?—Yes; but I frankly say that I do not think that examination is the way to find out what merit is. Without having any very keen view on the subject, I do not think examination would give us the type of capabilities that we want.

56,036. Then you would prefer that appointment should be by the Lord Advocate. Would you give him any adviser to assist him? It has been suggested in the case of the English legal departments that the Lord Chancellor, who makes a great number of the appointments, should be assisted by a standing committee who would consider the qualifications of the candidates and report to the Lord Chancellor, who, after considering their report, would make the appointments. Do you see any advantage in a system of that kind in the case of the Scotch legal offices?—I do not think any advantage would be gained in Scotland. The Lord Advocate with his secretary and his other assistants is quite in a position to get the necessary knowledge of the capabilities of the man he is about to appoint; he is appointing from a range of men with whom his professional career had brought him constantly in touch.

56,037. I can understand that that is the case as regards the higher offices where the persons suitable for appointment are advocates or writers; but would it be equally the case with regard to the minor appointments, junior clerks in sub-departments?—He would be able to get the information from the men around him in a way that he could trust and in a way that he would not be able just to get it from any committee.

56,038. The field being comparatively limited, you think that his personal inquiries can be effective in discovering the merits of candidates?—I think so; it is a very limited field.

56,039. Turning now to the question of the organisation of the offices and the method in which they are controlled, you have told us that certain offices are by statute directly under your control?—Not under my control, under my supervision, under the Lord President.

56,040. What exactly is the distinction that you draw between control and supervision?—Control, to my mind, would entitle me to go into an office and say "You are to do this," or "You are to do that." Supervision means that when they are in a difficulty they come to me, or if I learn that an office is not working up to the mark I am entitled to go and say, "What doest thou?" and then report to the Lord President and deal with the matter as he sees fit. There may be no difference, but I understand that that is the sort of distinction that is drawn by those around me as regards the position of principal clerk at present.

56,041. Taking first the case of the office which is most directly under you, where there are depute, assistant, and ordinary clerks, how far does your supervision extend there? Do you say to a particular clerk that he is to attend to a particular thing?—No.

56,042. Who determines that?—His commission; he gets appointed in lieu of So-and-so, now deceased, and goes and sits in that court, and sits there until he is removed by warrant from the Crown.

56,043. Is he assigned by his warrant to the court of a particular Lord Ordinary?—No; a Lord Ordinary may come and a Lord Ordinary may go over his head, but he sits in that court.

56,044. The office is continuous and attached to the particular court, apart from the question of the personality of the Lord Ordinary who presides in that court?—That is so. When there is a vacancy in the Inner House, the Senior Lord Ordinary goes into the Inner House, and then the newly-appointed Lord Ordinary takes his court in the Outer House.

56,045. There is no power of transfer from one court to another?—Not except just for accommodation during illness, or something of that sort.

56,046. Has the Court no power of transferring an officer from one court to another?—I do not think so.

56,047. Does that apply to assistant and ordinary clerks as well as to deputes?—That is so.

56,048. So that a man, having been appointed to a particular court, remains in that court for life?—That is so.

56,049. As regards discipline, what are your powers? You have by statute I think, power of suspension for six months?—Yes, that is the principal compulsor that I have.

19 May 1915.]

Mr. EDWIN ADAM, K.C.

56,050. Is that your sole power of disciplinary action?—Apart from removal by petition.

56,051. That is to say, if the case were grave enough to require removal, it would be your duty to petition the Court?—I am not sure whether it is I or the Lord Advocate who takes that action; it has never been done in my time.

56,052. Supposing there were questions of discipline not grave enough to raise any question of suspension for six months, is it your duty to take cognisance of them?—That is so.

56,053. If one of the junior clerks, for instance, was irregular in attendance, it would be for you to take notice of it?—It would be for me to warn him.

56,054. How would it be brought to your notice?—Sometimes it is by the Lord Ordinary in whose court he is; it may be by his depute; it may be that I hear from an agent that he has not got satisfaction with regard to some particular incident; or it might be that I noticed that the clerk was not in court when I expected him to be in court, or not at his office when he ought to have been in his office.

56,055. Is the position the same as regards the Bill Chamber, for instance?—Precisely the same. There, of course, the Principal Clerk of the Bills really, in a way, stands to them as principal clerk in the sense that unless it is a grave breach of discipline he would deal with that sort of matter himself.

56,056. And as regards the other sub-departments, the Extractor's Department, for instance?—The Extractor deals with his staff entirely apart from me.

56,057. Your power of suspension does not apply to them?—No, I think not. Some of his clerks are appointed by him—there are two that are Crown appointments—and he really exercises discipline in his own office.

56,058. And the same thing would apply to the very small department of the Keeper of the Minute Book?—Yes.

56,059. In the case of the macers, what is the arrangement as regards discipline?—The judge of the Court would exercise discipline over the macer, I understand, but I dare say I might be called in if there was any discipline to be exercised. There seems to be no statute on the subject, only just common law rule.

56,060. You exercise no supervision even over the internal arrangements of the Extractor's Department and the Minute Book Department?—No. I am entitled to issue orders, or the Court may issue orders through me, as regards what is to be done in the Extractor's Department.

56,061. You never visit that department officially to see how the work is going on?—No, I do not. I may say that every half-year I have to give a report to the Court as regards the issuing of extracts by the Extractor's Department, and that the work is, in my opinion, satisfactorily conducted.

56,062. How do you ascertain whether it is satisfactorily conducted?—If I ascertained at all that there was any complaint of any kind, I would intervene and have to report it to the Lord President, and I might do that at any time; but with an efficient Extractor, that supervision is practically in my hands a matter of form; there is no complaint that the Extractor's work is behind—that it is not duly expedited.

56,063. Is it only by the absence of complaints that you form the conclusion that the work is satisfactorily done?—Complaints would at once arise if the work was not satisfactorily done, because there you are dealing with very critical work. An agent not getting his extract timeously, as he thinks, would very soon make complaint—he would be bound to do so.

56,064. All the offices of the court are situated at the Register House, are they not?—Yes; except the box office, which is the office where the papers are boxed to the judges. There are 13 boxes to put the papers in that have to go to each judge. A clerk has to be in attendance there during certain hours of the day to mark the papers as having been properly boxed to the judges.

56,065. Apart from that, all the offices are at the Register House?—That is so.

56,066. How are papers that are required at the court brought from the Register House to the court?—An assistant or ordinary clerk has the Roll for the next day, from which he makes up the bundle of papers necessary for the Court's work of the next day. These are transferred under the charge of a commissionaire, who is my officer for that purpose, in a covered van from the Register House up to the court, in time for distribution among the depute and assistant clerks up there, at about half-past nine in the morning.

56,067. Are those papers returned to the Register House at the conclusion of the day's work in court?—The van goes down again at mid-day, at 1 o'clock rather, in order to be ready for opening the Register House at two; but any papers which are still needed in court remain up in court, and are locked up there overnight for the next day.

56,068. Does that system present considerable inconveniences?—Very grave inconveniences. If any other paper is required, we require to send down a special messenger and get the paper up; and it is also very liable to allow papers to go missing. This system, which has just been instituted, within the last four years, I think, is more reliable than the old system.

56,069. The system of transfer in a van?—Yes, under a special officer. The special officer is the principal thing; he is responsible for the going and coming.

56,070. How was it done before?—There were porters from the Register House who had no official appearance, they were, just as it were, common porters to outward appearance. I do not think any very grave trouble arose, but it was not satisfactory in the sense that the clerks of Court were not satisfied that the porter whom they were giving papers to was the right man. By good fortune it was practically the right man who got them, but the system did not seem to lend itself to a proper check.

56,071. But even the improved system now in force presents great inconveniences?—Inconvenience in the sense that the staff of the court is divided from mid-day onwards; the assistants are down there and the deputies are up in court, and it would lend itself to better supervision in every way if the clerks and papers were all under the one roof as far as possible.

56,072. Would there be any difficulty about that?—It is a matter of finding office room in the Parliament buildings; that is a matter for the Board of Works, I understand.

56,073. Apart from the question of office accommodation, would there be any other objections to it?—I know of none.

56,074. Would it be equally convenient to the profession?—I think it would be more convenient to the profession, because the Parliament House staff, as we call them—that is, the court clerks—are in attendance in court, and I should say it would be more convenient for them to do their court office work up in the Parliament House buildings during the court hours.

56,075. It would mean that they would have to go to one place instead of two?—Yes.

56,076. May I briefly recall the system you have described in this way: The Principal Clerk of Session has supervision but not control over certain of the officers attached to the court; he has a lesser degree of supervision over other of the offices; in some cases his supervision is practically non-existent; the offices are divided up into a number of different compartments, minutely regulated by statute, each with a separate staff and a separate head; they are situated at the Register House at some distance from the courts, and the inconveniences which you have described arise from their local situation?—That is so.

56,077. Would it be possible to have a system under which all those subdivided offices should be combined into a single service, with a staff on a Civil Service basis, under the direct supervision and control of a single head, who would naturally be the Principal Clerk of Session. Would a system like that be practicable; and, if it was practicable, would it offer advantages compared with the present system?—I think it would be quite practicable. The only difficulty would be the waiting till the different officers vacated their present tenure of office—vacated their present offices. You understand that when the Court of Session was instituted the Clerk Register, or as you call him in England the Master of the Rolls, was responsible for the records of the court; he deputed that duty to six principal clerks of Session; he himself was made a Lord of Session with the result that he became Lord Clerk Register, and for one or two lives that was continued, and then he practically disappeared and left the whole business in the hands of the six principal clerks. To my mind six principal clerks meant no control at all. However, that is a matter of opinion. That system went on, and the public got very discontented with the way in which extracts were issued, with the result that Parliament intervened and made the present system of extracts, and ultimately the Extractor's Department upon its present footing was formed. Just in the same way historically the auditing was put by the Court itself into the hands of an auditor, and then Parliament took it up and made the auditor of Court of Session a permanent statutory officer with a salary attached, and so on. All these offices really to my mind are the result of there being divided control in the principal clerks who are deputies of the Lord Clerk Register. The only apparent survival of that connection between us is that, at the election of Peers under the Act of Union, I appear as the depute of the Lord Clerk Register at Holyrood House when they make the election of the sixteen Peers for Scotland.

Mr. EDWIN ADAM, K.C.

56,078. Do you conclude from that, that the original single control having disappeared by the conversion of the office of Clerk Register into an honorary and nominal office, unity of control should be restored in some such way as I have described?—I should think that was logical, provided that the new depute of Lord Clerk Register was made subject to the Lord President directly as I am at present. All my control and all my supervision is under the Lord President. I think that is very advisable for the work such as I have to perform. In all grave matters I go to the Lord President and consult with him.

56,079. Is it under the Lord President or under the Court?—Well, in matters under the Clerk of Courts Act, 1899, it is under the Lord President. Of course in many cases it might be a matter of the Lord President calling in all the judges, but that would be cumbersome for ordinary discipline.

56,080. If such a unification took place, how far could it be extended? Would it be desirable, for instance, to include the offices of the Court of Justiciary?—Their work is really so very different in the Criminal Court from what we have in the Civil Court, that it would be a very grave question whether it would be advisable to join the judiciary clerks along with the Civil clerks, but I think it might be done, provided that there was great care taken to select the proper men for the judiciary work, which is very anxious work in the sense that it deals with the liberties of people instead of just with their properties.

56,081. I gather from what you say that you think it necessary to have an entirely separate staff for their work; that the clerks who do the judiciary work would not be suitable for transfer between that and the Civil work?—I could not say that as an absolute thing, it would depend very much upon the individual. I may just say that at present one of the judiciary clerks is out on war service, and one of the judge's clerks is acting substitute for him in the Justiciary Office, because before he became judge's clerk he had had considerable experience in the Crown Office, so that he went to act as substitute in the Justiciary Office with previously-acquired experience in that sort of work.

56,082. Then you think that it would not be impracticable to work the Justiciary Office by a scheme of that kind?—I think it would not.

56,083. On the balance of advantage, do you think it would be desirable or not?—I really am hardly prepared to sum up the advantages on one side and the disadvantages on the other; I have never heard the question really argued out. I have read different reports and that sort of thing, but I do not know that they appeal very much to my mind.

56,084. What about the Teinds Office? Could that be brought into the general organisation, or is it necessary to have that separate?—I think it ought to be brought into the general organisation. The present holder of the office, of course, is so exceptionally an expert in his subject that it would be difficult under any system to find a successor to him; but that is a thing we have always got to face, whether the office is separate or not; it will undoubtedly always be an exceptional and special office.

56,085. But for the purposes of consolidation you would bring it into the general organisation?—I am not sure but what it may be within the supervision of the Clerk of Session, because the Court of Session is now in certain of its judges the Court of Teinds, and I suppose that really brings the clerks of the Court of Teinds into the position of being to that extent clerks to the Court of Session; and if they are clerks of the Court of Session, then they are under my supervision. But I am thankful to say that nothing has occurred to raise the question in a practical form. Their work is done admirably and well, and there has been no question of supervision one way or another. I can see no reason why that department should not be brought into any general scheme upon that footing, although, of course, it will always be a special and exceptional office dealing with one very exceptional class of work.

56,086. What is the existing rule regarding the age of retirement of officers of the Court?—Just as I stated before, that commissions now bear an age limit of 70, but as you yourself remarked that is debated. As regards its efficiency, I myself consider that it is final, being in our commission; you accept your commission on that basis, and I see no answer to that.

56,087. If the Civil Service status were established generally for officers of the Court, do you see any reason why the ordinary Civil Service rule should not apply? That rule permits retirement at 60, and requires retirement at 66, with possible exceptions in special cases?—Some of our most efficient clerks of court in my memory have been men who were well over 65, but these were exceptions; and if they were dealt with as exceptions under the Civil Service rule, then good and well; but I do think that for the class of work a man is not done by the time he is 65, especially in a class of work requiring long years of experience before one is efficient.

56,088. Have you at present any clerks who are more than 65 years old?—One depute clerk is over 65; the interim clerk of Teinds is over 65; and the clerk of the Minute Book is over 65; that is all that I know of.

56,089. When were those gentlemen appointed?—The Depute clerk, who is over 65, was appointed last year.

56,090. Was he over 65 when he was appointed?—He was 67 when he was appointed.

56,091. Had he previously been a judge's clerk?—He had been Lord Advocate's clerk.

56,092. Was he Lord Advocate's clerk at the time when he was appointed?—Yes, that is so. He is just the type of man to whom I referred; he is quite vigorous.

56,093. Can you say how long he had been Lord Advocate's clerk?—I could not say that. He has lived all his life as Advocate's clerk, and one of his masters had become Lord Advocate and he became Lord Advocate's clerk; but all his life has been spent on the floor of the Parliament House, I should say, and possibly his father's life before him; I do not know, but very often it is that way.

56,094. He was appointed direct to be a depute clerk of Session?—Yes.

56,095. And how long have the other two gentlemen concerned held their offices?—The interim clerk of Teinds was originally appointed in 1871; he was promoted in 1878, and he attained his present office in 1905; but he had been in the Teinds Office all his life.

56,096. You have given us a statement of the hours of attendance at the offices of the Court of Session?—That is so.

56,097. Are those hours satisfactory to the public and satisfactory for the business to be done?—They are practically what the law societies—the Writers to the Signet and the Solicitors before the Supreme Court—asked for at the last inquiry. The Bill Chamber Office hours have not been extended to 5 o'clock, but that is under consideration. As a matter of fact, I am assured that there is no demand for it—that the work is done by 4 o'clock, and it would merely be keeping the clerks on for another hour doing nothing; but it is under consideration. It was suggested by the 1911 Committee that their hours should be extended to 5 o'clock, so that they should at that end coincide with those of the offices of the clerks of Session.

19 May 1915.]

Mr. EDWIN ADAM, K.C.

56,098. What are the arrangements as regards vacation?—The only arrangement I know as regards that is that the depute clerks have to arrange to allow their assistant clerks six weeks' vacation in the year, which is made up between the Spring and Summer Vacations. As Principal Clerk I have to see that that is done. I have never required to put any compulsion on at all. As a rule, the depute clerk relieves his assistant for more than the statutory six weeks by giving him two months, or whatever it may be.

56,099. Subject to that requirement, do you yourself and your deputies have the benefit of the whole of the vacations of the Court of Session?—I can speak for myself. I have constant correspondence of one sort or another going on during vacation, but I am relieved from attendance in court. The deputes and the assistants have the Vacation Courts, which sit on two Sederunt days in each vacation, when one judge sits and transacts certain business, and the different deputes and assistant clerks appear with the proceedings of their respective courts before the Lord Ordinary on the bills in vacation.

56,100. Subject to that, and subject to the arrangements for the assistants' vacation, they have the vacations of the Court?—Yes, the deputes have.

56,101. What is the period of vacation of the Court of Session?—The Court of Session meets upon the 15th of October; it rises for a fortnight's, or thereby, vacation at Christmastime. We have what is called the February week, which is a week appointed by the judges in February. The Court, under the statute, rises on the 20th March, it sits upon the 12th of May, and rises again upon the 20th of July, and the Summer Vacation is from the 20th of July to the 15th of October.

56,102. That would appear to make about 18 weeks' vacation in the year?—That is so, I believe. I may say that the judges have the power by Act of Sederunt to extend the sittings in Court into the vacation if they consider that the business of the Court requires it.

56,103. Returning once more to your own office, if your control were extended, and the offices were unified in the way we have been discussing, that would add considerably to your own duties?—I should presume so.

56,104. In that case would it be desirable that you should be relieved from the duty of sitting in court yourself?—You see, there is really no duty of sitting in court if I have duties elsewhere, and it is quite convenient that in special cases I should appear in court. For instance, I usually sit if there is a hearing before a larger bench, or anything special like that. Also, I should not like personally to be deprived of the right of sitting in court, which, if the duty were abolished, would rather appear to follow. I have a room in the Court House which would be quite available for doing office work, provided I had a properly constituted clerk, which I have not at present, and I have got either very great personal labour in having to do all my typing myself, or I have to get somebody to do it for me. I think if the offices were consolidated there ought to be in Scotland an officer equivalent to what the masters of court in England have; they have a secretary to the master of court. He would not require to be a highly-paid official at all; but there ought to be a clerk to the Principal Clerk. What I should like to see would be a clerk who would keep files of the different departmental negotiations that the Principal Clerk has to carry through, because there are many negotiations about all sorts of interim appointments and also correspondence sent down from the Scottish Office to be laid before the judge. I have no person to file these for me, and I have to do it with my own hand.

56,105. You keep your own records, in fact?—When I entered the office I found no files existent at all, because before my time there were six, then four, and latterly two, Principal Clerks, and it being divided between them they looked upon it very largely as their own private affair, and so far as I can make out the records disappeared with them; the matter was done with, and the record just disappeared.

56,106. It would be easy to provide a proper record and proper clerical assistants in a consolidated office of which the Principal Clerk was the head?—Surely; and for that purpose one of the existing clerks might get a little extra fee for doing the work. I should also say that the office should be salaried at a larger sum than it is at present—not from a personal view at all; but, for instance, I get 1,000*l.* a year as Principal Clerk, and the Treasury have awarded another 100*l.* a year to the present holder of the office. To my mind that is not a satisfactory position for the office. As I understand, a master of court in England has 1,500*l.*, and the senior master has 2,000*l.* Scotland, we know, has always to come in second; but, considering that there were two officers at 1,000*l.*, and one of them was abolished, I think the Principal Clerk ought to get either 1,250*l.* or 1,500*l.*, if it is to be a consolidated office with all these men under it. And I am saying so because I know that my subalterns all consider that the office was not properly treated at the last adjustment. Personally, I make no complaint.

56,107. You think that if the responsibilities are materially increased, the salary ought to be increased?—I think for the status of the man holding the office it ought to be increased to give him authority both with the outside public and also with his own staff.

56,108. As regards the comparison that you make with the salaries of masters in the English system, you are aware of course that their duties are very largely judicial?—It may be so, but they have to do the functions of the Principal Clerks of Session in Scotland. It is quite true that I have not judicial functions to perform.

56,109. (Mr. Matheson.) When you were speaking of recruiting the clerks, you said that the field was very small. I do not quite understand how that is. Are there not many men working in writers' offices in Scotland?—There are not many of them who would be prepared to give up their prospects in life and take a stereotyped office; that is one thing that limits the field.

56,110. How does the pay in your office compare with the pay of men employed in a writer's office?—It is not merely the men employed. I am talking of the class of men I want, which is men going forward to be law agents, to be solicitors themselves.

56,111. But have the men that you take in generally got their full qualification before they come in?—Sometimes they have and sometimes they have not. As a rule they have been in lawyers' offices studying with a view to passing the Law Agents' examination. There are men on the list I have given the Chairman who are themselves law agents, although some of them may not have actually qualified by paying the fees.

56,112. At what age do they generally come in?—We get them at all ages; they are usually men who have become known amongst agents as to a certain extent promising.

56,113. Then if the Service was standardised and put at all upon the footing of the Civil Service, would not that mean that you would have a considerable number of people who would regard it as a career worth going in for?—I do not think you would get any more than at present. I do not think it would be looked upon as a thing to be sought after. You are looked upon as a man who has sacrificed his prospects in life and has locked himself up in a blind alley—even with promotion, because promotion has been going on hitherto. My deputes are all considered very respectable worthy men, but I do not think there are many law agents who would be prepared to change places with them.

56,114. What was your reason for thinking that the Lord Advocate would be more likely to know about possible candidates than a committee which had an opportunity of sifting all their qualifications and comparing them with one another. I take it that the Lord Advocate is a busy man?—Yes, but he has a staff; he has his secretary and he has a Crown Agent; he has got all the Crown Agent's office. That is my opinion. I do not think that a committee, who have no responsibility to the public, would give you satisfactory results.

56,115. The responsibility would still rest with the Lord Advocate?—If he had a committee behind him and said: "I just took the man the committee appointed," what could you say to the Lord Advocate? At present the Lord Advocate knows that any appointment he makes in court will be canvassed on the floor of the Parliament House, where all his personal friends are and all his professional friends are. If he makes a bad appointment he is responsible; and he is responsible in Parliament; and merely to give him a committee is giving him a screen that would let him get behind his responsibility, because he would just simply say it was the committee's appointment. And nobody knows who the committee are. At least, that is my view.

56,116. (Sir John Kempe.) You say, I think, that for the higher appointments you consider some legal knowledge essential, but for the lower ones it is desirable but not actually essential; that is to say, for clerks and so on?—That really depends upon how far you are going down.

56,117. Clerks?—I should say that a certain amount of knowledge of legal terms was necessary in all of them. For all assistant clerks of court, I think legal knowledge is essential; but if you are going down to copying clerks in the Extractor's Office a very small amount of knowledge will do, so that they should know these terrible things, Scots law terms, and know what they are.

56,118. Do not you think they might be picked up in the office to some extent?—They might; but if it was to be made a matter of promotion from these upwards, it would be best that they came in with fairly good qualifications, as law agents if possible.

56,119. That is to say, you prefer the present nomination system, but you are not absolutely against the present Civil Service system for legal as well as other offices?—I would not like to be father to putting it into the law system of Scotland, with a committee behind.

56,120. But you say that because you have no experience of the Civil Service system?—We have no experience of it—that is quite true. If you could get an ideal committee which would conscientiously do the work it might be different; but I should think it would just lead to an enormous amount of wire-pulling, and unless the committee were very conscientious I should think the present system was better.

56,121. That is because you think the present system is successful?—On the whole it is successful.

56,122. You see that there are reasons against the present system, but you feel that it is quite successful, and you do not want to risk anything worse?—That is pretty well what it comes to.

56,123. You have an age limit by commission, but not by law?—Yes.

56,124. If a clerk is appointed without any trouble to himself by nomination and with no age limit, especially if there is also accompanying it promotion by seniority, which you do not have (you have promotion by merit), does it occur to you that a man coming into the Service in that way looks upon his appointment as a provision for life with certain easy duties attached, with which he need not trouble himself to do more than merely go through them; whereas if he comes in by open competition he comes in with strong sense of responsibility, and will feel that he is part of the machine that has a great deal of work to get through as well as possible. Is there not that difference between the nomination system and the open competition system, or even a committee system?—Hardly, I think. Under the present system you have a man who is there who knows that he is acting under the eye of the judge all the time; he is part of a system that has hitherto worked upon these lines, and I think there is a great esprit de corps amongst the present clerks, and that is very essential. If men came in thinking they had got the job by examination, and were quite superior to everybody who had ever been before them, I do not think you would have just the same type of man, and I do not think you would get the work done as well. I do not think the present system is perfect at all, but it has given satisfactory results. At the last inquiry, in 1911, there was practically no complaint; on the contrary, solicitors appeared and praised the clerks very much for the way in which they conducted the work between solicitors and the court, because they all felt they were on their honour to do their best.

56,125. You think that goes right through the office?—Yes. They all feel that they are constantly in the public eye as represented by the judge on the bench, who is to them the representative of the authority that they are subject to.

56,126. In no sense has such a clerk a freehold office which he is holding comfortably for life?—The control might be stiffened, but I do not think it would displace the esprit de corps.

56,127. You say in your notes of evidence: "I am not aware of what Sir William Haldane refers to as routine work capable of being devolved upon the lower grades of the staff as at present constituted. The apparent absence of what is termed lower grade work in the Court of Session proper seems accounted for by the manner in which the functions of the Clerks of Session have been separated into semi-independent departments." I do not understand that. What, in your view, would be routine work?—I would call copying routine work.

56,128. Why does separation into semi-independent departments account for the apparent absence of that lower grade work in the Court of Session?—Because no copying is done in the Court of Session. It is after the clerk of the Court has made the record and passed it to the next department, where it is out of our control in the Record Office, that mere copying is done.

56,129. But besides mere copying, is there not any other work that may be described as routine work, such as filling up forms. In the English Courts there is a great deal of that; is there not also in the Scotch Courts a great deal of the kind of work which consists of doing the same thing over and over again—the same class of work?—No, we have very little of that. There is a certain amount; there are certain interlocutors that are largely just "repeat, repeat"; but you have always to be careful that you are using the proper forms. That, to my mind, is not mere routine work; because if you were using what was applicable to a Scotch litigant in a matter dealing with a foreigner, you might throw the whole thing out of gear. The number of days that a writ has got to run depends upon whether a man is domiciled in Scotland or not; so that although it is routine work in itself, which may have been done a dozen times by the man, he has to know what is the proper form he has to bring in. I cannot call that routine work.

56,130. Is that work done by any clerk who happens to be doing the particular work in hand? It is not done by a lower class clerk; it is done by first and second class clerks?—Yes, just merely to get through the day's work, if the roll is heavy, both working as hard as they can to get through.

56,131. You think that a class might be doing a lot of routine work all of the same sort. I call it routine work. You say it is not necessarily routine work; but could it not be done by a lower class?—No, none of the work in court could be done as routine work by those men. However accurate he might be in copying, he has to get the original. The clerk really makes the original under his judge; but, as a rule, the judge has so many interlocutors to sign that he just depends upon the clerk.

56,132. (Chairman.) There is work of that kind in the sub-departments, is there not—in the Extractor's Department?—Yes, and there the extractor drafts the extract and hands it over to a copying clerk; that is the one case where you have copying.

19 May 1915.]

Mr. EDWIN ADAM, K.C.

56,133. (Sir John Kempe.) You have given your reasons why you think that an age limit is not so necessary in legal departments. Do you consider that there is any difference between legal work and other work as regards the commencement of going down hill in life; does a person go down hill more slowly in a legal department than in the ordinary Civil Service?—In Scotland we always say that lawyers are long lived. Some of our best judges have been men over the ordinary Civil Service age, and it is the same with our clerks, I would say.

56,134. You think there is real reason for an extension of the age in the legal branches beyond what is necessary in the Civil departments?—I certainly do not think that 65 would be a reasonable time to pension off an ordinary clerk of Court. I should think he was just then probably of the right age and experience, so that the Court was depending upon his judgment in many matters.

56,135. Would you not say the same in other departments—the Local Government Board?—I cannot say at all with regard to that. I have no experience.

56,136. It is only because you have not had experience?—Yes. I can only speak for my own department. I think that any person, looking at the history of the Court, would see that a lot of the best work was done by clerks over 65, perhaps well on to 70.

56,137. You would find that, I think, in England in all departments?—A general rule like that always strikes the individual and always strikes the Service badly; because if it was absolute to strike off from the Service a man merely because he was that age, it might be very hard for the Service as well as for the man. I can give you one very good example—the Interim Clerk of Teinds: nobody could do his work better than he does it. He is quite fresh—you would think he was a man of 55 to look at him. He would have been cut off five years ago and there would be nobody to replace him.

56,138. You always find exceptions?—Yes, that is so.

56,139. The auditor of court you say is equivalent to a taxing master?—Yes, that is the English term.

56,140. You say that he is not confined to taxing work in his own office, he can take outside taxing work?—Yes.

56,141. What is taxing work? Is it taxing bills of costs?—Yes, taxing bills of costs as between the client and his law agent.

56,142. Might it not give rise to an awkward position if he is allowed to do outside taxing work with his official taxing work?—Supposing I get my lawyer to carry through a sale transaction of property for me, I might say, when he sent in the bill, "I think that is rather stiff"; then he says, "Send it to the auditor"; I say, "I will send it to the auditor." The auditor taxes it practically as arbiter between us.

56,143. As private work?—Yes, he has got his table of fees by which that is paid for.

56,144. And he gets paid for it?—Yes.

56,145. What is the distinction between work that he is paid for privately and work that he is paid for publicly?—One difference is that formerly all these fees that were paid in these accounts went to him. Parliament stepped in and, in appointing him a statutory auditor for the court, said, "All these fees that you got for that court work will go into the fee fund" (that is the Exchequer), and we will pay you 700*l.* a "year down."

56,146. It is only in connection with the court?—Yes. The result of the present system is, of course, that we get a man who is prepared to sacrifice all his private solicitor's work and go into this Audit Department, and the Government get a man for 700*l.* a year, because he knows that as auditor of the court he can get all this private work, which may bring his income up to anything between 2,000*l.* and 3,000*l.*, and we get a very much higher type of man. I think that is all to the benefit of the court; and there is no question about our work being done, he has plenty of time to do both court work and other work.

56,147. Do the costs that he taxes as private work come into the court account?—No.

56,148. He will not afterwards have to tax them in his official capacity?—Yes, he has sometimes to tax an account as between party and party, and afterwards to tax the same account as between the party and the law agent.

56,149. Is not that rather an awkward position?—No, it is considered an exceptional benefit that he is doing both, and knows exactly what he has done before, and why he did it.

56,150. (Miss Haldane.) Supposing you had the higher posts put on the Civil Service footing, would there not be a certain benefit in having a Scottish Civil Service Commissioner? Supposing you had, say, the Lord Advocate, perhaps the Lord President, and the Civil Service Commissioner, would not that make an Appointments Board that would not have those objections that you were talking of?—That is just my difficulty. I would far rather trust the Lord Advocate than any Commission that could be appointed, because I have got the Lord Advocate doing the deed, and I know who has done it: whereas with Commissioners we never know who the Commissioners are, they are coming and going, their names disappear, and they are not responsible to public opinion in the Parliament House.

56,151. You understand what I meant. It has been suggested to us that an Appointments Committee for England, on which the Civil Service Commissioner acted, might be desirable?—Yes, I understand.

56,152. I wanted to ask about the macers; who are they usually, and what are they appointed to do? What is their occupation?—We have all sorts of people. When a macership falls vacant, we have about 400 applications from all parts of Scotland.

56,153. Is it advertised?—No. The death of the previous macer goes into the papers, and it is considered absolutely the finest thing that any ordinary Scot can get hold of. What the qualifications are one can hardly say. We have some ex-soldiers who may have gone in after they have been soldiers, and become, say, butlers or club porters, and that sort of thing. It is always a mystery to me how a macer comes into his place in court. One of his duties is to find law authorities for the judge, and how he finds them I do not know; it is probably owing to his training in promptness; but it is a mystery to me how they get hold of things.

56,154. I wanted to know whether ex-soldiers and sailors had a preference for the office?—Not necessarily.

56,155. There is no regulation laid down?—There is no regulation. We have one or two ex-soldiers and sailors.

56,156. But are most of them butlers or gentlemen's servants?—No; some of them have been small shopkeepers.

56,157. Have you considered at all the desirability of using women's work in any of the departments that you have spoken of?—We have, I think, one woman employed in connection with the attendants for the witnesses' room—a woman attendant; but that is hardly in my department at all. I think that comes under the Board of Works.

56,158. I meant in the clerical departments.—No, we have not; because typewriting is hardly known except among the judges' clerks.

56,159. Do you use much typewriting?—It is largely used now. All proofs are practically issued by the judges' clerks in typewriting, and they may employ women assistants for that—I cannot say. I believe in some cases they do.

56,160. Have you ever considered the desirability of introducing women in the clerical departments?—I have not. It would be just on the same footing as admitting them into the profession generally—they would take their place.

56,161. You, personally, have not got any special opinion on the subject?—No; I would be quite pleased to see them there if they were admitted to the profession generally.

19 May 1915.]

Mr. EDWIN ADAM, K.C.

56,162. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) With regard to Mr. John Smart, who was appointed in October 1914 at the age of 67 to a depute post at 500*l.* a year, he was a clerk, I understand, to the Lord Advocate?—That is so.

56,163. Is that post of 500*l.* a year pensionable?—He comes under the Superannuation Acts. I cannot say exactly, but he is pensionable if he qualifies under the Superannuation Acts.

56,164. Now, in 1912, Mr. Roxburgh, whose age is 48, was also appointed to a post now worth 475*l.* a year; he is put down as clerk to the Lord Advocate, who was Mr. Ure in that case?—That is so.

56,165. How many clerks has the Lord Advocate at a time?—One.

56,166. Then, in 1914, I find that Mr. John Lessels was appointed at the age of 56—he is now 57, apparently—to a post of 350*l.* a year, and he was Lord Advocate's clerk?—Yes.

56,167. Clerk to the same Lord Advocate?—No, probably a different one. It is a personal appointment of the Lord Advocate for the time being for himself. If the Lord Advocate goes out of office his clerk goes with him.

56,168. But what I mean is, that Mr. John Lessels was appointed to this post and had before his appointment been Lord Advocate's clerk?—Yes, it might be to the same Lord Advocate or not; I cannot say that. It merely means that he has given as his qualification that he had at one time acted as clerk to a Lord Advocate.

56,169. I understand you to say that the great advantage in personal appointment by the Lord Advocate, instead of by a committee on which the Civil Service Commissioner is represented, is that you always know the principles on which the Lord Advocate will act?—No, I do not know that. What I do know is that the man who has occupied the public position of Lord Advocate has a responsibility which is present to his mind when he has made the appointment.

56,170. Now, there are four depute clerks in the Estimates, and the Estimates state, as regards these four, that one of them receives an annual salary of 25*l.* as herald, that one receives an allowance of 20*l.* as clerk to the Valuation judges, another has the registration of law agents and receives fees averaging about 60*l.* a year. The gentleman appointed at the age of 67 is one of those four; does he hold one of those extra posts?—There are five depute clerks in the Outer House, and I do not think Mr. Smart, to whom you have been referring, holds one of those special posts.

56,171. On the first page here there is a list of depute clerks and of assistant clerks in the office, 14 in number, and from the note at the side I gather that six of them were, at the time of their appointment, Lord Advocates' clerks?—That will be so.

56,172. That means to say, that they were originally clerks to an advocate—to a barrister, as we say in England—of the ordinary type of barrister's clerk?—An advocate's clerk is quite a different person from a barrister's clerk.

56,173. And when the barrister became Lord Advocate six of them were appointed in that way?—Yes, during a period of years.

56,174. You told us that you thought it a very great difficulty in your own position that you had no one to keep your documents or to type a letter, or anything of that kind for you. I understand that, although you are Principal Clerk of Session, and although you have 50 persons (more or less) under your control, there is not one of them that you can ask to type a letter for you?—There are many I can ask, but none I can order. I should say that there is none that I would ask and not get it done for me. I get it as a favour, and they are very willing to do it, but that is not right.

56,175. The reason being that all their duties are determined by statute?—And custom.

56,176. By statute and custom; and those duties in no case include giving general assistance to the principal clerk?—That is so.

56,177. Turning for a moment to the Report of the Departmental Committee of 1911, that Committee, referring to the insufficiency of the punitive power of principal clerks, recommended that it should be "extended so as to cover serious or repeated neglect." Was that recommendation carried out?—No, there has been nothing done on it.

56,178. Then in the evidence given by Mr. Patrick William Campbell, yourself being present, in 1911, on page 19, Mr. Campbell stated, and you assented, "The only serious case was that of a man whom I wished to turn out on more than one occasion, but the Lords Ordinary, with whose Bar he was connected, wished him to have another chance, and another of the Lords Ordinary followed on the same lines and said he would pull him up and make him attend to his duty. I said that in my view they were both mistaken, but it was, in a sense, no business of mine to turn a man adrift if the judge whose work he was supposed to attend to expressed the desire to retain him any longer. It only ended in his giving further trouble and being sent off." You adhere to that?—I was not Principal Clerk at the time when that occurred, but I know what it referred to.

56,179. Now even if your present control over the office and your personal responsibility were extended, that difficulty—namely, that apparently you cannot get rid of an incompetent officer without the leave of the judge to whose Court he is attached—will remain?—It is not really the leave of the judge, but one would not like to go contrary to the expressed opinion of the judge, because one would have to go before the Lord President and would have to argue it out as between the principal clerk and that judge. The Lord President would be the one who would have the final say. These cases are all a matter of doing the best.

56,180. You could not be fairly held responsible for discipline in the office if, in fact, you could not get rid of any official in your office except by the consent of the judge. I will leave it at that?—It is not the case that I cannot. I could get rid of a clerk, apart from the wish of his judge, if I were able to persuade the Lord President; and I think that is quite a proper safeguard against personal spite on the part, it might be, of the Principal Clerk of Session. I would rather exercise my control after having persuaded the Lord President that it was necessary.

56,181. Would you agree that, given an administrative organisation, one of the disadvantages of personal patronage is that a man, whether competent or incompetent, always has his patron behind him and is supposed to deal with him?—On the contrary, one's best screw upon the appointee is his patron. If you have anything to say against an appointee, the easiest plan is to go to the appointor and say, "This is the man you have given me," and he will soon see that it is put right without exercising the technical discipline under the statute.

56,182. We had a large experience in England of personal patronage up to 1870, and I should think it is doubtful whether it worked in that way. Now, in the Report of the Departmental Committee of 1911, Mr. Watt, at page 24, recommended that, "The principle of pooling the clerical, registry, and record-keeping part of the work might with advantage be extended." Has anything been done in that direction?—No, nothing has been done in that direction.

56,183. Then, on page 18, Mr. Haldane in his memorandum said, that changes could be introduced "which would enable the more responsible officials to delegate more of the routine work to junior clerks, and thus reduce the over-proportion of senior posts, save public expense, and give greater facility for young men entering the Service." Has anything been done in that direction?—Nothing. I do not know what exactly he means by that, and I have not been able to find out. I saw him personally about it, and he said it really did not refer to junior Clerks of Court, as the capital "C" would seem to infer, but to junior clerks, with a small "c" in the copying departments.

56,184. Then, on page 21, Mr. Watt in his memorandum says: "That no officer of this service should be allowed to be a partner in a firm of practising law agents or be a director of any public company." Has anything been done in that respect?—Nothing was required to be done very specially. As I have already said, there is only one officer in the court now who is a partner of a firm.

Mr. EDWIN ADAM, K.C.

56,185. But are there any clerks who are directors of public companies?—Not that I know of.

56,186. Then Mr. Watt, on page 22, says: "I venture to think that there are too many separate departments in the establishment of the Scotch Law Courts, too many quasi-independent courts—most of them appointed 'from outside' for political reasons." Would that indicate that, in Mr. Watt's mind, it was a notorious fact that these appointments were made for political reasons?—I think that is for the Commission to say. I can hardly say what was in Mr. Watt's mind; it looks like it.

56,187. Then the majority, on page 11 of their report, state: "In this way all political appointments 'would be eliminated.'" Would you agree that to say that after a change all political appointments would be eliminated, indicated that in their view political appointments existed?—I should say so.

56,188. And on page 17 in Mr. Haldane's memorandum he said: "So that appointment and promotion throughout may, in future, be by selection for merit rather than as the result of influence and pressure." That reference to the future seems to indicate that in Mr. Haldane's view influence and pressure resulted in promotion and appointment then?—I think so.

56,189. You stated that at present in your judgment appointment by the Lord Advocate works very well; but you also stated, in answer to a question, that in all these appointments political influences, if they did exist, constituted a bad element, did you not?—I do not think so. I am not one of those who think politics are naughty.

56,190. Then I will ask you the question directly: Do you think that if a man is appointed to a permanent life-long pensionable post for political considerations, that fact is to be deprecated?—I think I may say yes, to that; he ought to have other qualifications.

56,191. Therefore the question whether the present system of appointment works very well depends upon whether the present system of appointment is influenced by political considerations?—I would not say so. Any other system, by a committee or otherwise, might also be influenced by political considerations.

56,192. Now in the memorandum which you have been good enough to hand to us, you state that to combine the Crown Office with the office of clerks of Courts would "militate against the confidence of the public and of the profession generally in the purity of the administration." Would you mind explaining exactly what you meant by purity there?—I mean, that aloofness that ought to exist in the clerk of court's mind as regards interest on either side of the litigation that is concerned. The Crown Office is one side of the contested litigation in the Criminal Court, and for a clerk of that Court to be under the same head as the Crown Office to my mind would militate against—purity is perhaps not a good word, but aloofness, impartiality.

56,193. On page 7 of the Majority Report of 1911 it is stated that, to put the Extractor's clerks upon fixed salaries, "would facilitate the carrying out of minor reforms such as the shortening of extracts by the omission of the 'long warrant,' and the substitution of a short form as proposed by the principal extractor." How can the question of what is the most convenient form, and the most desirable form, be influenced by the question whether men are working by time or by piecework?—Because the length of the extract determines the amount of work that that clerk had to do, and he was being paid by his writing, which was paid for by the length. It is precisely the point that came up when the principal clerk's salary was dealt with by Parliament in 1810. Then the principal clerk's remuneration was fixed by the length of extracts.

56,194. Your evidence is that the form at present, which is fixed apparently by the Court —?—No.

56,195. Who fixes the form?—Parliament—it is statutory.

56,196. Then the fact that this form has not been shortened in accordance with expert advice is due to the fact that the longer form provides more writing work for the Extractor's clerks?—That was so; there was that difficulty, but this matter has been dealt with now, that is to say, the clerks are now put upon salary, which enables the Extractor to press forward the matter of getting an Act of Parliament put through to shorten the form.

56,197. At last we have got something that was done in consequence of the report of 1911—the Extractor's clerks are put upon salary; and also there is only one Principal Clerk of Session now. Has anything else in the recommendations of that Committee been done?—Yes, the recommendations about the salaries of the Bill Chamber clerks have been carried out; and also the hours of the clerks of court in the Register House have been dealt with, with the exception of one hour extra for the Bill Chamber clerks, which is under consideration.

56,198. (Mr. Philip Snowden.) Yours is a Crown appointment, I understand?—Mine is a Crown appointment.

56,199. Made on the recommendation of the Lord Advocate?—Yes, that was so.

56,200. You were appointed at the time when Mr. Shaw was Lord Advocate?—I was.

56,201. Might I ask were you in any way prominently identified with politics before you received this appointment?—I should say so, in a moderate degree.

56,202. Were you ever a Parliamentary candidate?—I was. I have been twice a Parliamentary candidate.

56,203. In the Liberal interest?—Yes, I was in the Liberal interest.

56,204. I understood you to say that formerly there were quite a number of Principal Clerks of Session?—In old times, yes; before 1810 there were six.

56,205. Later the number was reduced to two?—Yes.

56,206. And you are the only Principal Clerk of Session now?—I am the sole Principal Clerk of Session now.

56,207. When was the second one abolished?—He resigned in 1912, I think.

56,208. Yours was a joint appointment before?—Yes, I was double along with Mr. Campbell. I was joint Principal Clerk at that time.

56,209. Then are you supposed to combine the two offices in yourself now?—Yes, under Act of Parliament.

56,210. Both the work and the responsibility?—Yes.

56,211. But not the salary?—Not the double salary. I get an extra 100% a year.

56,212. So that the abolition of the second office effected a saving of 1,000% a year?—It will effect a saving of 1,000% a year when I go out of office. At present I received my office as one of two, and they have given me an extra 100% to make up for the additional work they have put upon me; but when I go out of office my successor, under the present arrangement, will take office at a salary of 1,000% a year.

56,213. Do you know how long your predecessor had held office?—I think since 1888.

56,214. Do you know whether also he had been prominently identified with politics before his appointment?—He had not been a candidate, I think. Still, you are asking about things that happened when I was a very young man.

56,215. But you were always interested in politics, I think?—I always was, and I hope everybody always will be; every good citizen ought to be.

56,216. You do not regard yourself as being under the rule which enjoins all public servants to maintain a very strict reserve with regard to political questions?—I cannot say as to that. I should say that I look upon my office as my prime duty in life, and I will do nothing derogatory to my office.

56,217. How are your immediate subordinates appointed?—That is not for me to say. They are appointed by the Crown, and I receive them as appointed. I know nothing about the principles or anything behind that, and I do not inquire.

19 May 1915.]

Mr. EDWIN ADAM, K.C.

56,218. You are never consulted?—Officially I am not consulted.

56,219. But privately you are?—I am not going to say.

56,220. I think we have a right to have an answer to that question, if I may say so?—Then I will say that I have been consulted by various Lord Advocates; but I do not say that my suggestion or my opinion has been accepted or has not been accepted. The responsibility is with the Lord Advocate.

56,221. And to use your own phrase, you think we may safely trust the Lord Advocate in these matters?—He is responsible in Parliament.

56,222. And you think that his knowledge and his responsibility to Parliament are a sufficient safeguard against any abuse of the patronage he enjoys?—That, I think, is a matter for Parliament to say. That is our constitution, as I understand it.

56,223. You appear to be very well satisfied with the way in which the present system of appointment works out; you do not think that by any other system you would be likely to get a more efficient or more capable staff of men? Do you think that the very best capacity and ability are invariably to be found in the men who happen to have been clerks to Lord Advocates?—I do not say that; but I say that they are men of good experience, and are probably selected as clerks by the Lord Advocate because they are men who have had a vast experience before he appoints them as his clerks.

56,224. Are they the private clerks of the Lord Advocate?—These are private clerks.

56,225. Are they paid out of the salary of the Lord Advocate, or does he get a special allowance from Parliament?—I understand that these particular clerks get no allowance from Parliament; they are paid by his clients, like any other private advocate's clerks.

56,226. And according to what Mr. Graham Wallas said just now, in recent years no less than half a dozen Lord Advocates' clerks have been found to be the most capable men in Scotland to fill a post in the Public Service within the patronage of the Lord Advocate?—Quite so. I should say that many of our best clerks have been Lord Advocate's clerks before they came to us, men who could not be replaced by anybody else in Scotland, I should say. The tradition of the office has been very good.

56,227. You have these macers, who, I suppose, are similar to the men we call ushers?—I think probably that would be your English term.

56,228. They are nomination appointments?—That is so.

56,229. Does the nomination rest with the judge?—No.

56,230. With whom?—It is a Crown nomination; they have the King's superscription to their appointment.

56,231. But I do not suppose the King takes very much personal interest in these appointments?—I am not aware. I cannot say.

56,232. As a matter of fact, who does appoint them?—The Lord Advocate, through the Secretary for Scotland, with one exception.

56,233. Is that under some ancient right?—Yes, it is under an ancient right; you shall have it correctly. Nomination to one of these macerships is held by the Marquess of Bute, under a patent that was granted to the Barony of Byres away back in 1483.

56,234. Does the nominee of the Marquess of Bute usually happen to be one of his butlers?—I could not say. The present gentleman was appointed after the Marquess had refused to exercise the nominating power, I understand; but it was before my time.

56,235. But as a matter of fact are these men usually men who have been in the service of rich people as butlers and such like?—No, I should think not always; but I cannot tell you what reason made them appoint them; they are there and are doing their work very well. The only thing I would point out is that that macer is not pensionable, because he is appointed under this old rule. I think that might be put right.

56,236. I might remind you that we are here to ascertain the method of appointment to these various posts?—That is quite right.

56,237. (Lord Dundas.) You have told us that you think it would be quite possible gradually to co-ordinate a number of these offices into one consolidated office under one head?—That is so.

56,238. I noticed that you observed that you thought it was a grave question whether the Justiciary Office should be so treated?—Yes.

56,239. I just want to put two or three questions to you about the Justiciary. Historically, of course, the Court of Justiciary, the Criminal Court of Scotland, is, and has always been, quite a distinct thing from the Civil Court, the Court of Session?—That is so.

56,240. You told us that in the Court of Session the judges sometimes make rules and regulations by way of an Act of Sederunt?—Yes.

56,241. On the other hand, the corresponding Criminal Act is what is called an Act of Adjournal, and the two systems are kept in different books by different officials?—They are in different offices.

56,242. I may take it briefly that the civil procedure and the criminal procedure are widely different the one from the other?—Yes.

56,243. I think that until the year 1887, which to some of us seems but yesterday, not all the judges of the Court of Session were criminal judges?—That is so.

56,244. Down to 1887 the criminal judges, I think, were the Lord Justice General, the Lord Justice Clerk, and five of the other judges, selected for their experience and skill in criminal matters?—I think selected by the Crown.

56,245. Probably for that reason?—Yes.

56,246. Appointed as judges of experience in criminal matters?—Yes.

56,247. But since 1887 the whole 13 judges of the Court of Session are Commissioners of Justiciary, or, in other words, criminal judges?—Yes.

56,248. And part of the duty of clerks of that office, I think, is to sit in court and regulate the procedure in the Criminal Court, and assist the judges when required as regards procedure and practice?—Yes.

56,249. The assistant clerks go, I think, on circuit with the judges who go to the various circuit towns?—Yes, that is so.

56,250. It is necessary, is it not, to have as those clerks men of carefully-trained knowledge and experience in the arts of criminal procedure?—Yes, that is so.

56,251. And experience in a civil clerkship would not, I suppose, be of direct use to a Criminal Court clerk, or vice versa?—It would not.

56,252. Therefore, you say, and I understand it is your view, that it would be a very grave question whether the Justiciary Office could be properly co-ordinated in the way that is suggested?—I think so.

56,253. You do not have an opinion more strongly either way?—No, I think the case might become clearer after the present Civil Courts have been put on a permanent footing under one head. I think that at present it would be very dangerous to try to make the whole change all at once.

56,254. As regards the Crown Office, I think you said, in answer to a member of the Commission, that you are against treating it in the way of co-ordination?—I think it is almost impossible, at least from a lawyer's point of view, to conceive of the two offices being worked as one.

56,255. So I should think; but that is your view?—That is my view.

56,256. Then one word about Teinds. Teinds, I suppose we may take it, are a subject of some intricacy and great speciality?—Yes, very.

56,257. There, again, I suppose, experience as an ordinary clerk would be of little service to one who was appointed a Teinds clerk, and vice versa?—Very little. A junior assistant in the Teinds Office might be transferred across into the Civil Department, but not the head. If you got a man suitable for the head of that office he would be so valuable that I do not think you would wish to transfer him.

Mr. EDWIN ADAM, K.C.

56,258. You mentioned the dates of the sittings of the Court of Session in your evidence. It is the case, is it not, that during every vacation there is one judge in attendance as vacation judge during the whole year?—That is so, in the Bill Chamber.

56,259. And, of course, there are circuits that occur in vacation?—Yes.

56,260. And jury trials, and other matters?—That is so.

Mr. WILLIAM THOMAS KETCHEN, W.S. (Keeper of the General Register of Sasines), called and examined.

56,261. (Chairman.) What office do you hold?—I am the Keeper of the Register of Sasines, and in addition I keep the Register of Hornings, Inhibitions, and Adjudications, and I keep the Register of Entails, such as it is now.

56,262. How long have you held that office?—I was appointed on the last day of the year 1910, and I was gazetted a few days afterwards.

56,263. What was your profession before that?—I am a Writer to the Signet, and was in general practice as a solicitor.

56,264. The Office of Sasines is an ancient office, and the remuneration of the keeper and his assistants was formerly paid by fees?—That is so, down to the year 1845, I think.

56,265. In that year was the system of payment by salary established?—Yes.

56,266. And since then the fees have, I suppose, gone to the Exchequer?—They have.

56,267. In the year 1869–70 was a change made in the system formerly in force?—A great change was made. What were called the Particular Registers of Sasines—that is, the local registers—were abolished, and the General Register of Sasines was established on a new footing; that is to say, the General Register of Sasines was arranged in divisions according to counties, and the deeds are delivered to me, or, by special authority of an Act of Parliament, are posted.

56,268. Will you tell us very briefly what the work of the Sasines Office is?—The Office of Sasines consists of registering the deed as distinguished from the registration of title. What we do on receipt of a deed is, we enter it and take a note of it in a presentment book. That presentment book, although recognised by Parliament, is not statutory; it has no bearing on the registration itself; it is more for our guidance in the work of the registry. On the receipt of the writ, after being entered in the presentment book, it then proceeds to the depute keeper's district—that is, the county district. Of course, one depute has several counties under his control.

56,269. How many districts are there?—Six districts. It proceeds to one of the districts and there the deed is carefully examined with regard to stamp duty and with regard to proper execution; that is to say, we will not receive a blank deed, of course, and we see that it is witnessed, and that the other particulars tally with what is declared in the deed. Then we take a minute of that deed, which is just the names of the parties to the deed, particulars as to its date and when it was received (which is its date of registration), and a sufficient synopsis of the description of the subjects so as to enable these subjects to be recognised from the minute.

56,270. A brief abstract of the deed?—A brief abstract of the deed.

56,271. With sufficient particulars to identify the parties, to identify the land dealt with, and to indicate in a summary manner the nature of the transaction?—That is so. That draft is then sent to the printer. When the print comes back it is carefully checked, and it may then be used for the purpose of being entered on the search sheet.

56,272. What is the search sheet?—The search sheet is a land account. The heading of the account is a shortened description of the holding—the estate or property owned by a man. In this is entered all the minutes, which are ultimately printed, dealing with that particular unit of property.

56,273. In that way, under the heading of the particular unit of property, you get a summary record of all the deeds affecting that unit of property?—That is so;

and it is what in Scotland we call a search in anticipation to disclose burdens on the title generally.

56,274. Are those particulars also indexed under the name of the proprietor?—Under the name of the proprietor, and also there is an index as to places. That index is also in a double form, because there is an index to the printed minutes which are bound up at the end of the year; and there is a huge index containing the names of parties and the places with reference to the volumes of the search sheet.

56,275. You have told us now as to the preparation of the minute and the entry of the minute in the search sheet, or ledger, as I think it has been described?—That is so.

56,276. What is the next process?—The next thing is to get these minutes printed. We get another proof of the print, and that second proof is checked, not from the first proof but from the deed itself, to see that there has been nothing omitted. If it then passes it is printed, one copy upon particular paper for the official Minute Book, and several copies over and above that.

56,277. What is the next step after that?—After that the deed itself is sent back to what we call the general room, and from there it is handed out to the engrosser for the purpose of being recorded in the record volumes. These record volumes consist of 200 folios bound in an official book, which is specially dedicated to me by the Keeper of the Records, the Deputy Clerk Register. When these volumes are filled up they are returned to him for safe custody.

56,278. The complete text of the deed is copied into this volume?—In full, beginning with the first word right down to the signatures of the parties and of the witnesses.

56,279. A very large number of these volumes are preserved in your department?—A very large number. I think in the Edinburgh district alone they now run up to 5,000.

56,280. How far back does that complete register go?—The register is complete, more or less, from the 1st August 1617.

56,281. When the deed has been copied into the register, are there any further steps?—It then gets a certificate of registration which states the division—that is, the county in which it has been recorded—the date, the particular book applicable to that minute, and the pages wherein it is copied, the date of recording, and that is signed either by me or by one of my deputies.

56,282. That is endorsed on the deed itself?—It must be on the deed. Anything like a piece of paper on which there was no writing at the end of the deed would not be sufficient; it must be endorsed on part of the deed itself.

56,283. Is the deed then returned to the parties?—The deed is then sent back to the solicitor who sent it in.

56,284. Are the volumes of the register kept by you, or are they handed over to the Record Department?—They are sent to me empty—blank—and when they are filled up I return them to the Deputy Clerk Register.

56,285. Then there are three principal steps in registration—the preparation of the minute, the entry in the search sheet, and the copying of the deed?—Yes.

56,286. Has your office also duties connected with subsequent searches?—Yes.

56,287. What are those duties?—These searches are certificates showing what deeds affect any particular subjects which are described in the first part of the certificate. They are just short notes taken from the search sheet, and are practically abbreviated minutes, giving the whole particulars, excepting that we do not repeat the description of the subjects, because the subjects themselves are at the head and in the first few pages of the certificate.

Mr. WILLIAM THOMAS KETCHEN, W.S.

56,288. Any applicant can obtain an official document of the nature you describe which will give him the particulars of all the deeds in the Register relating to a particular parcel of land?—That is so. It is a public Register.

56,289. Is the accuracy of that certificate guaranteed?—That has been guaranteed since the year 1905 by the Government.

56,290. Does that mean that the Government takes pecuniary responsibility for any results of an error in those particulars?—Fortunately the question has never arisen, but I understand it is so.

56,291. Does that summarily describe the whole of the work done in your office?—Yes, so far as the Sasines Office is concerned. In addition to that, from time to time the Keeper of the Register of Sasines has had other offices added on by Act of Parliament. We have the Register of Inhibitions—that is what we call a personal register. An inhibition is a document which, when recorded with me, has the effect of disabling any proprietor of land from selling his property until that notice is removed from the register, and, on the other hand, it acts as a warning to any person wishing to deal with this particular proprietor of land.

56,292. You have some other similar registers?—We also have the Register of Adjudications. That register is a system by which land is adjudged from the proprietor to a person who has a claim; it may be for debt, or it may be in implement of some obligation under which the proprietor had placed himself to sell a particular piece of land. There is also the Register of Hornings. That is an old Scottish form of what we call diligence, which is now superseded by the Personal Diligence Act of 1806 or 1836—I forget the exact date. That Register of Hornings is very seldom used. It is used very occasionally in very exceptional circumstances.

56,293. The Register of Entails is practically moribund?—That Act was passed in 1685. Now we do not register entails because they are prohibited, but we still have to enter in that register what we call disentails, where a man having an entail has, by decree of the Court, authority to hold in fee-simple.

56,294. What is the staff of your department for dealing with the work that you have described?—To deal with that work there is a keeper and six assistant keepers, six chief clerks, one accountant, 13 first class clerks, and 48 second class clerks, making up an establishment of 75. In addition to that there are 61 engrossers, but they are not on the establishment.

56,295. What is the work of the different classes of clerks you have mentioned. In the first place, what is your own work?—As the head of the office I have the control of the whole staff, and all questions in connection with the work of registration, and questions of difficulty, have to be referred to me. Of course, my main duty, I should say, is to defend the register and see that no improper deed gets on and otherwise maintain the usefulness of the register, because if I allowed any such deed to get on it would, of course, defeat the purpose for which the register is kept. Then, subject to the Secretary of State for Scotland, I have control of the staff; I recommend men for promotion and I correspond with the Secretary for Scotland on all questions of interest or importance in connection with the office. With regard to money matters, I correspond with the Secretary for Scotland, who passes it on to the Treasury. I am under the Treasury to a great extent with regard to money matters.

56,296. If any change in the salaries or the staff were required?—In any case of that sort I must get the authority of the Treasury first. The office now being broken up into six districts it is desirable that uniformity in those districts should be maintained, and when new classes of deeds come out I very often draft a form of minute which I consider would be applicable to them so as to secure uniformity thereby.

56,297. You have six assistant keepers?—Yes.

56,298. Is one assistant keeper in charge of each of the six districts into which you have said the work is divided?—That is so.

56,299. The assistant keeper, I suppose, exercises a general supervision, under you, over the work in his district?—He has the supervision of the work in the district, and he reports to me on the work of the individual staff. He also has a general revision of the minutes and matters connected with the search sheet so far as it is possible for one man to overtake it in his district.

56,300. Is there one chief clerk in each district?—There is one chief clerk in each district, and his duty is practically to assist the deputy keeper, with this difference: He is responsible for the distribution of the work amongst the men in the district, and he also takes an important part in the revision and checking of the entries in the search sheet.

56,301. By whom are the minutes drafted—by which class of clerks?—As a rule we can tell from looking at the deed whether it is going to be difficult or easy. The easier minutes are drafted in many cases by the second class clerks. The more difficult ones are undertaken by the first class clerks. There are two first class clerks in each district, one in charge of what is called registration—that is, the drafting of the minutes—and the other has more the control of the search sheet; both are, of course, quite capable of drafting the more difficult minutes.

56,302. A minute drafted by a second class clerk would be revised by a first class clerk?—If we were not very busy it would go straight to the deputy keeper, or chief clerk.

56,303. But before being finally passed it would always be checked and revised either by a first class clerk or an assistant keeper?—Yes, or a chief clerk.

56,304. Besides the drafting of minutes and other operations connected with the reception of the deed and the entry in the search sheet, there are also the duties which you have described connected with subsequent searches. By what class of officer are those duties performed?—Sometimes the search would be drafted by a second class clerk, or in some cases, if an intricate one, by a first class clerk, and in either case it is revised ultimately by the chief clerk or the deputy.

56,305. Is the entry in the search sheet as a rule the same as the minute?—It is exactly the same as the minute with this difference, that we leave out the subjects. We just say "The above subjects," because the subjects are described at the head of the account, so to speak.

56,306. So that the work of entering in the search sheet is not work which requires so much discretion as the original preparation of the minute?—Subject to this, that they must take the very greatest care that the subjects correspond exactly—nothing more and nothing less—with the subjects at the head of the account. It must be most perfectly appropriate to the entry.

56,307. If a search has to be made subsequently—if the public apply for particulars with regard to a certain parcel of land, by whom is that search made?—It is sent first of all, if it looks simple and is a small piece of property, to a second class clerk, and is then revised by the chief clerk or the deputy. If it was an intricate one a first class clerk might be asked to look to it.

56,308. Is that work done as part of the work of the district, or is there a special section who make the searches?—The searching goes along with the district.

56,309. Would the same class who are engaged in compilation of the search sheet make the searches?—Not always. We divide them off. There are so many men kept more or less to the search sheet work, and others more to the minutes.

56,310. Which do you consider the best and most important kind of work?—The registration, of course, is the keynote of the whole system, but the consequences of the work of the search sheet are very grave, of course.

56,311. Do you consider the drafting of the minutes the most important and difficult work?—Oh, no. The drafting of the minute is done by a second class clerk and revised. I thought you spoke with regard to the search sheet.

H H

19 May 1915.]

MR. WILLIAM THOMAS KETCHEN, W.S.

56,312. I meant the whole of the duties that are done in a district, which include the drafting of minutes, the entering of the search sheet and subsequent searches. Which of those duties is the most difficult and important?—I should think the entering in the search sheet is the most difficult. It requires great care.

56,313. Is it more difficult than drafting the minute?—Yes, undoubtedly. You have to be sure you are getting the right account.

56,314. Because of the importance and difficulty of being certain that the particular piece of land is identical with that at the head of the search sheet?—Partly that, and partly the consequences under the Government guarantee if anything were left out.

56,315. But the consequences of an inaccuracy in a minute would surely be equally serious, because the minute is the basis of the search sheet?—Yes, but I think there is more chance of a slip in the search sheet. I think you require a more experienced man to enter in the search sheet. There is a greater risk of mistake, and, possibly, it is more difficult of detection at the time.

56,316. Coming now to the entry in the register, that is done by an engrossing clerk?—Entirely.

56,317. Under whose supervision?—Under the supervision of the accountant of the office who has charge of the engrossers. They are under his department.

56,318. Does he hand out the work to them?—He hands out the volume, takes a note of the volumes which he has got and of the deeds. There are on an average between 50 and 60 deeds in every volume. As they are being copied in from time to time, 30 to 40 folios at a time are compared first by a first collator. Every deed is collated twice. It is signed by the engrosser and also signed by the two collators, so that we know who is responsible for seeing that the deed has been properly copied in.

56,319. Will you tell us now about the method of appointment of your staff?—Since 1701 I and my predecessors have been appointed by the Crown.

56,320. Is there any statutory qualifications for the Keeper of the Sasines?—Yes; he must be a solicitor or an advocate.

56,321. Has he, in fact, generally been an advocate or a solicitor?—So far as I can make out from my inquiries—and I have made a note of my predecessors—we have all been advocates or Writers to the Signet, with one exception. Then the rest of the staff now rank as regular Civil servants, and the majority of those have come in by competitive examination. There are still a few of the senior men who were appointed by my predecessor, Mr. Brodie.

56,322. You are excluding the engrossers?—Yes, of course.

56,323. What is the method of competitive examination which is applied now?—The subjects of examination are Scotch law and Conveyancing, and, until recently, such subjects as papers in indexing, in abstracting and English composition, and handwriting and spelling, of course. Within the last few months a change has been made which will take place on the 1st January next year, whereby the examination is practically confined to Scotch law, providing always that the man must have an intermediary leaving certificate or have passed the second general knowledge examination. After the 1st January next year he will be examined in Scotch law and English composition only, with spelling and handwriting.

56,324. Are there preliminary qualifications necessary for admission to the examination?—These qualifications, at the present moment, are that a man must have passed what is called the first examination in general knowledge for a solicitor in Scotland, and he must have been two years in the office of a conveyancer. That has been changed; they have now to pass either the second general knowledge, which is a higher examination, or hold a leaving certificate in certain subjects, and must have been five years, not necessarily as an apprentice but just as a clerk, in a conveyancer's or land agent's office.

56,325. Is the period diminished in the case of persons with a university degree?—Yes, that is the usual condition; that is reduced to three years.

56,326. Are those the sole qualifications, or are persons who have served in the office in some other capacity allowed to compete?—My reading of the new rule is, that these other qualifications do not count after the 1st January next year.

56,327. Under the rules which are now being changed, engrossers and boy clerks were admitted to the examinations?—Yes, they were. It was counted just as serving in a conveyancer's office.

56,328. But under the new system they will not be admitted?—That is my understanding of the rule.

56,329. When we were taking evidence on the point of whether similar previous qualifications should be required for some of the English appointments, we were told there would be great difficulty in defining what constituted service as clerk in a solicitor's office—that it would be difficult to distinguish between actual clerk's work and work as an office boy or telephone boy, which certainly would not confer legal qualifications. Has that difficulty been found in the case of these examinations?—I think it has. Personally, while I think it was a step in the right direction to have five years instead of two, it was a pity that the regulation did not go a little further, as I wanted, and insist upon a regular apprenticeship as distinguished from a clerkship, for the very reason you have mentioned.

56,330. How has the system worked in practice? Has it given you the right kind of men?—As a rule it has; but, of course, on the other hand, there are men who have passed in who certainly did not show such aptitude, judging from results, as others.

56,331. How long has that system of examination been in force?—Since 1881, I think.

56,332. The number of men who entered before that is now comparatively very small?—Yes, very small.

56,333. Can you make any comparison in your mind between the men who have entered by examination and the men who entered under the previous system?—I should say that, with certain exceptions, the men who entered without examination were very highly-trained lawyers, because, although they did not pass that examination, they had served probably a full apprenticeship with a lawyer; and, over and above that, perhaps, had very responsible work as a real law clerk in an office before they were appointed by my predecessors to the office.

56,334. Do you consider that previous legal experience is necessary for entrance to the office?—Most undoubtedly; it is a law office.

56,335. Could the legal knowledge required be acquired in the office?—It would be acquired to a very considerable extent; but my view is that the theoretical training and the practical training to be obtained as an apprentice would make a man much more useful from the first, and he would develop and be able to make more use of the experience that he gained in the office.

56,336. Then you think the present system is the right one; but you would stiffen, even more than has been done at present, the previous qualifications required?—I would. I believe in apprenticeship, because where there is apprenticeship there is at least a certain amount of obligation (whether it is fulfilled or not) upon the master to give a lad every opportunity to learn his business.

56,337. Are the higher posts in the office, with the exception of that of keeper, filled entirely by promotion from the junior ranks?—They are.

56,338. And that works satisfactorily?—Quite satisfactorily.

56,339. You find that by the present system you get enough men of superior ability to fill the higher posts, including those of assistant keepers?—Undoubtedly. We can always get a sufficient number from amongst the class of men who are coming in under the present requirements. With regard to all the young men I have just now, I have not the slightest doubt I shall be able to draw upon them to fill the higher posts when their turn comes.

19 May 1915.]

Mr. WILLIAM THOMAS KETCHEN, W.S.

56,340. On what principles are men selected for promotion?—The first principle, of course, is their fitness for the work. I promote the young men step by step, but I generally choose them, not only for their fitness to discharge the duties of the rank immediately above, but with a view to their stepping higher. Seniority I only use where it comes to equality in other matters.

56,341. Have you departed considerably in your selections for promotion from the order of seniority?—I am afraid I must say, Yes.

56,342. Why "afraid"?—Because at one time I think seniority played a greater part. I was following one of my more immediate predecessors, and I went for the man's fitness.

56,343. You found it desirable to promote the men who, in your opinion, were the most fit?—Yes.

56,344. Have you found the result of that satisfactory?—Most satisfactory.

56,345. It is encouraging to the good men?—We get the best results in every way.

56,346. You get the good men into the more important posts, and a man feels that he will get some result from doing his work thoroughly well?—And I think it encourages the younger men to make an effort.

56,347. By whom are the engrossers appointed?—They are appointed by the keeper for the time being.

56,348. The staff generally—that is, the clerical staff—are Civil servants, and, I suppose, are subject to the ordinary rules of the Civil Service as regards discipline, age for retirement, and so forth?—Yes, entirely. The last order is dated 10th January 1910, I think.

56,349. What are the hours of attendance?—From 9.30 to 4.30, with a very short interval for lunch. That is in normal times.

56,350. Seven hours with a short interval for lunch?—Yes.

56,351. Are the hours strictly observed?—They are. I consider it my duty to see that they are. I insist upon their attending punctually.

56,352. Have you an attendance book?—Yes.

56,353. Is it ever necessary to work overtime?—At this time of the year we generally work overtime, but this year, owing to the untoward circumstances, I have got the staff to agree to give an extra hour all over. The hours are from 9 to 5, but one or two of them, owing to special circumstances, come in a little later than 9 and remain a little later than 5 o'clock. There is no extra pay for this additional hour, but that is an abnormal state of affairs.

56,354. In normal times does the work vary much at different periods of the year?—Yes, it varies to this extent, that in the months of May and November we are very busy; we get a very large number of writs.

56,355. Can the work be got through then in normal times without overtime?—Yes.

56,356. What is the amount of holiday in the year?—It varies according to rank. The deputes, if they like, and myself, can have eight weeks; the chief clerks get seven weeks; the first class clerks six weeks, and the second class clerks five weeks.

56,357. You are responsible for the discipline of the department and for recommendations for promotion?—I am.

56,358. What is the relation of your department to the Deputy Clerk Register?—The Deputy Clerk Register has the physical control, if I may say so, of the Register. He supplies me with the books; he has ultimately to keep them; and if I were to provide the books I might not provide the most suitable size. It is generally laid down by Lord Low's Commission that he has practically physical control of the Register.

56,359. In matters of discipline, for instance, or in matters of promotion, do you report direct to the Secretary for Scotland or do you report through the Deputy Clerk Register?—On everything I report direct to the Secretary for Scotland.

56,360. The Deputy Clerk Register in his evidence did not recognise that that was the relation which was established by existing statutes and rules between the Deputy Clerk Register and the Keeper of Sasines.

We do not propose to go into the question of the interpretation of the existing statutes; that is a matter which is outside the Commission's reference. But I will ask you this question: Do you consider it desirable as a question of organisation that the Keeper of Sasines should be directly responsible to the Secretary for Scotland for his department, or do you consider that the Deputy Clerk Register should have definite control or supervision of the department, and that his relation to it should extend to other matters than the material point to which you have said, in practice, at present, it only extends?—With all deference to the Deputy Clerk Register, I think it would be most unfortunate if any such system were established, and I think it is in the interests of the public that I should, as the head of the department, be responsible to the Secretary for Scotland alone without any intervention. I did not know that this matter was coming up.

56,361. Turning now to the engrossers, you are acquainted with the proceedings and Report of the Committee which was appointed to consider the position of the engrossers in 1913?—Yes.

56,362. The questions considered by that Committee were, I think, mainly three—whether the system of payment by piecework should be continued; whether the engrossing staff should be pensionable; and the exact remuneration which they should receive?—That is so.

56,363. It is, I think, outside the work of this Commission to inquire into the details of the remuneration, but we should like to know your opinion on the recommendations of the Committee on the other two points. In the first place, do you concur in the view of that Committee that it was necessary to retain the system of payment by piecework?—I am of opinion that it was necessary for the proper conduct of the work.

56,364. The Committee recognised that there are considerable disadvantages attaching to that system of payment, but they did not see their way to devise a better system?—That is so. Of course, the real objection at that time was that there was a certain amount of work for which they were not paid, and as Mr. Stringer, the gentleman who gave evidence, said, if it is a system of piecework, every piece of work must be paid for. That grievance has now been removed.

56,365. Are the engrossers satisfied with the payment now that the alterations recommended by that Committee have been introduced?—I could scarcely say that they are quite satisfied, but they recognise that there is an improvement.

56,366. On the question of pension, the Committee did not see their way to recommend any alteration. At present the engrossers are not pensionable, but are entitled to gratuities under the Superannuation Act, based on the average earnings of the last three years of service. Do you concur in the Committee's recommendation on that point?—I understood that the Committee at one stage put it alternatively—whether their pay should not be somewhat reduced with a view to a small pension being given under certain conditions; but as a matter of fact that was a question disposed of by the Treasury. The Treasury gave the view that they did not see their way to giving a pension, and therefore they maintained, or rather increased, the rate of pay.

56,367. The Treasury stated that they could not give any pension under the Superannuation Acts as they existed?—Their hands were tied by the Act of Parliament.

56,368. It is open to this Commission, of course, to recommend modifications of existing legislation?—I should be sorry if it went forth that my evidence was that I opposed it. I do not at all oppose their getting a pension.

56,369. What is your view on the question of pension?—I would be very glad if the Treasury could see its way to giving them a pension under certain safeguards, which no doubt the Treasury would look to.

56,370. Have you considered whether a contributory system of pensions would be possible?—I am afraid I am not sufficiently good as an actuary to go into that. Of course, there would be difficulty with some of the men now, some of them being so old.

19 May 1915.]

Mr. WILLIAM THOMAS KETCHEN, W.S.

56,371. There undoubtedly would be some difficulty about starting a contributory system in the case of older men who have not contributed over the whole of their service?—The difficulty would be in starting.

56,372. But if that difficulty could be got over in any way, would there not be advantages in a contributory system in such a case as this, where a man's earnings are somewhat considerable in earlier years and diminish in later years?—Personally, I should be very glad to see these men provided for in their old age, because there are a great many hardships.

56,373. There is in the same group of buildings with you a Register of Deeds?—Yes.

56,374. The work of that office is concerned with operations somewhat similar to those which are performed in your office?—Of course, I cannot speak as to details. In a general way I know it is a copying of deeds, with this difference, that they not only copy the deed, but they give out the copy and retain the principal—it is a mere copying of deeds.

56,375. It would appear at first sight that two departments, whose work is in many respects so similar, might be brought into closer relation and combined under a single head with, perhaps, some advantages as regards the economical application of the engrossing staff. Have you ever considered that question?—I have never considered that question; but, reserving the details, it could be done. As a matter of fact, it is partly done to some extent to-day.

56,376. In what respect is it done to-day?—All deeds that are sent to me are sent to be recorded for publication. If a man sends a disposition to me to be recorded for publication and preservation, then I copy the deed in exactly the same way as I am doing just now, and deal with it through the three steps I have described, but this word "preservation" in the warrant to record makes all the difference. In that case, after I have copied the deed I send him another copy of the deed, and I pass the principal deed for safe custody on to the Keeper of Records.

56,377. Are those cases frequent?—I cannot give the exact number, but I may say, yes, they are fairly frequent.

56,378. Do you think there would be advantages from the point of view of organisation in combining those two departments?—It would mean, of course, that I would have to take over part of the existing staff.

56,379. Would it, in your opinion, be the case that if the two departments were combined, the staff could be more economically applied to the work?—I believe there might be some economies effected.

56,380. Returning once more to the question of engrossing, which affects both the Register of Sasines and the Register of Deeds, has the question of substituting some other method of record than transcription in handwriting been considered?—That question has been more or less before the legal profession and the people connected with the Register House since so far back, I think, as 1838, when there were the first hints of it; but nothing came of it. In 1863 there was a very determined move in the direction of printing; that fell through on account of the expense, and that is the objection to it to this day. Then in about 1895 and subsequent years there was the system of photolithography of the deeds suggested, and, as a matter of fact, that question in the shape of a report by me is before a Commission appointed to consider questions of Scotch law which is sitting at Edinburgh at present.

56,381. That question was reported on by Lord Low's Commission some years ago?—It was.

56,382. That Commission reported in favour of photo-lithography as a means of recording?—I think it was photo-zincography in those days. It is now photo-lithography.

56,383. What is the Commission considering it at present?—It is a Commission sitting on the question of Conveyancing—trying to shorten deeds and alter the law of entail—and this matter came up incidentally.

56,384. Who is the President of that Commission?—Sir George Paul, and Mr. Whitelaw, solicitor, of Dumfries is Deputy-Chairman.

56,385. Has the question of typewriting of deeds also been considered?—It has been considered, but there is a hesitancy about accepting that, because we are not satisfied as to the permanency of the record so framed.

56,386. Those questions do not directly affect this Commission except as bearing on the question of the organisation of the staff; but if some mechanical method of record, such as photo-zincography, were introduced, that would completely solve the difficult questions connected with the engrossing staff?—That is so.

56,387. If typewriting were adopted as the method, probably that could be done as elsewhere by a female staff. Has that question been considered?—So far as our building is concerned, of course, we could quite well adopt the system of typewriting, but that is a change which could not be effected, I submit, without the consent of Parliament.

56,388. Do the existing statutes prescribe hand-writing as the method of record?—No, but I think I would be afraid to move without an Act of the Legislature, as it is such an important thing.

56,389. (Lord Dundas.) Are you aware that the question of the Keeper of the Sasines communicating direct with the Secretary for Scotland came up incidentally and was observed on in the course of a case in the Court of Session lately?—I am.

56,390. Did the Lord President and the other judges who took part in that decision express the view that such a procedure was irregular—"incorrect" was the word used?—I do not happen to have the report. As I read the instructions I thought the objection there taken was partly to my procedure, which was merely laid down by my predecessors, in sending papers to the Secretary for Scotland.

56,391. My question is, are you aware that the Lord President in that case said that he had no doubt that it was an incorrect procedure—that the Keeper should communicate direct with the Secretary for Scotland. If you are not aware of it, say so?—I am not aware that that was the purport of it. I do not read it as such.

56,392. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) You were appointed in 1910. Do you mind telling me what was your age at the time of appointment?—52.

56,393. It was part of your warrant that you were to retire at 70?—That is so.

56,394. So that your maximum time of appointment was 18 years?—Yes.

56,395. You were a Writer to the Signet?—Yes.

56,396. Had your work as Writer to the Signet brought you into particular contact more than is the case with other Writers to the Signet, with the procedure of the Register of Sasines?—No, I would not say more.

56,397. No more?—No, not more.

56,398. How many years do you think it would take you to arrive at full efficiency as the Keeper of the General Registry?—Of course, as a practising solicitor, I had a great deal to do with registration.

56,399. I know; but when you first went into the office of course you had a good deal to learn?—Yes.

56,400. At what time do you think you reached your full power of directing and criticising the work of a rather complex organisation?—I hope with modesty, I may say, perhaps a year.

56,401. Your office is pensionable?—It is.

56,402. Were years added to your office, or were you only to be pensioned at 18 years' service?—Pensioned at 18 years' service.

56,403. There are no added years?—Nothing added.

56,404. You said you thought it desirable that the method of reproduction should form the subject of legislation to be initiated by a commission, and you indicated that that legislation ought to lay down in your judgment a particular method of mechanical reproduction?—Yes.

56,405. Do not you think it would be better if that legislation left it so that the particular kind of pen and ink to be used should be a matter of future discretion?—I meant the sanction to change from the present manuscript.

56,406. But do not you think the kind of legislation that is wanted is legislation which will allow of the adoption of any method of improved reproduction without laying down any particular method to be accepted?—Yes, I am afraid I did not properly express myself. I meant, of course, merely the sanction to change.

56,407. You think that without legislation it would not be possible to substitute either the typewriter or the camera for the pen in reproduction?—I think it would be safer for the keeper at any rate to get that protection.

56,408. What danger does the keeper run supposing he had the thing typewritten as it is done at the Probate Office, Somerset House? What would happen to you—penal servitude? Who is the competent authority to decide that you have done wrong, and what would be the penalty?—I think the objection would arise not in that way, but from the legal profession, as to the question of the permanency of the record.

56,409. That you might be blamed by the profession?—After I was away and not able to defend myself.

56,410. At present you say you cannot use the services of women because legislation would be required in your judgment to adopt typewriting. But women can also use a pen?—Oh, yes.

56,411. Is it not possible to use women straight-away now in the copying work even if they have to use pens?—It would be quite possible. The answer to that is: Would you propose that I should dispense with all the men and employ women?

56,412. I suppose vacancies occur from time to time?—I do not think the building would be suitable for mixing the staff.

56,413. It must be either one thing or the other?—We could take them by floors, so to speak.

56,414. But if the two offices, the Register of Deeds and the Register of Sasines, were put into one organisation, it might be possible to draft the men bit by bit into one office and fill the other with women?—Yes, that could be done.

56,415. And you see nothing against it in the whole work, and just as the women take on the Savings Bank work in London, the whole work of your office, up to the directing, might be done by skilled women in your judgment?—So far as the engrossing is concerned.

56,416. Could not a woman be trained to do higher work?—I am afraid none of the ladies yet, or only very few—two or three of them—have gone in for legal training.

56,417. (Miss Haldane.) You say, "Transference of clerks from departments of the Register House to the Sasine Office and vice versa have occurred, but they are rare." Do you think there ought to be more opportunity for clerks to be transferred from one department to another?—I merely state the fact. It is a fact that there have been very few changes, but the work is so different that I do not think they would care for a change.

56,418. Do you think it would be a better system if there were an opportunity of transferring clerks from one department to another?—I cannot speak for the Keeper of Records; but, speaking for my own office, I would prefer when vacancies occur to fill them up with men who had had continuously experience in legal employment and had acquired legal experience. The moment they go into the Record room there is very little of it legal work.

56,419. You think they had better keep to their own line, you mean?—I am afraid it is so.

56,420. I should have thought they might wish to have an opportunity of changing their line of work?—I am afraid a man who had been ten years in the Record room would have forgotten a great deal of the law that he had learnt, and he would not be so satisfactory, and then, of course, he would be coming to me with that seniority.

56,421. I understood you to say that there are no women employed in your office?—None whatever.

56,422. But you see no objection to employing them in engrossing, anyhow, if the housing conditions were suitable?—None whatever.

56,423. And if typing were adopted?—If typing were adopted ladies would get in certainly.

56,424. But they could not be admitted to the clerkships until the legal profession is open to women. Is that your point?—Yes.

56,425. As I understand, women could not at present be used in the clerical staff?—No.

56,426. According to the regulations, not until they are admitted to the legal profession?—There are no regulations.

56,427. Would it be possible to use women for the clerical work in your office?—As engrossers.

56,428. But would it be possible to use them as clerks?—As the commissioned staff?

56,429. Yes?—I am afraid not, because few ladies have legal training.

56,430. Supposing they had legal training, would it be possible to appoint them at present to the commissioned staff. Is there anything to prevent them being appointed according to the regulations?—I do not appoint them. The clerks come in by Civil Service examination.

56,431. Would it be possible for women to go in for that examination, or is it barred to them?—I could not answer that question. My impression is that it is barred to them.

56,432. It has occurred to me that you must at present be having some difficulty with your staff. I suppose you have a good many men who have enlisted?—I have 20 men away, and 5 men are to-day in London in the War Office.

56,433. How are you filling up your vacancies?—I have not filled them up at all. Our work, owing to the war, has decreased. I called the staff together, and they agreed that it was the right thing that these men should go if they wished, and they who remained would undertake to carry on the work to the best of their ability without further men being brought in.

56,434. I wanted to ascertain whether it was at present possible, supposing you find your difficulties become yet greater, to fill up with qualified women if there were such?—In the commissioned staff, if the Civil Service Commissioners allowed ladies to sit and pass in, I could make such arrangements that the ladies could get the work.

56,435. But you are not aware as to whether, if a woman applied to the Civil Service Commission, she would be allowed to sit for the examination?—No, I have not a copy of the rules before me now.

56,436. (Sir John Kempe.) As to previous qualifications: Yours is really a professional office, and you would like to have young professional men to fill it?—Yes.

56,437. And you say the work of your office is the registration of deeds as against the registration of title?—Yes.

56,438. The registration of deeds wants much less professional qualification than the registration of title?—My answer was that it was the registration of deeds as distinguished from the registration of title, but gradually the Sasines Office is approaching to registration of title. A very important step was taken the moment our searches became guaranteed. One cannot say what may happen, but the ground work of the registration of title will be found to be embedded in the search sheet and in the guaranteed searches.

56,439. But the work is different from the Land Registry in England?—Quite different.

56,440. A professional qualification is absolutely necessary there because a clerk has to understand Chancery work and all kinds of things?—Quite so.

56,441. You think for that reason a lower qualification is wanted in the case of the registry of deeds? The Land Registry prefer not to admit clerks who have not got a professional qualification, as they say it is absolutely necessary. You do not say that?—I maintain that really we are now getting to such a stage that a professional training is necessary.

19 May 1915.]

Mr. WILLIAM THOMAS KETCHEN, W.S.

56,442. Is there an appeal against your registration?—Of course, we are all subject to the control of the Court. It happens very seldom.

56,443. But your registration is final unless there is an appeal?—It is final.

56,444. Could the appeal be made at any time or must it be made at once?—Our registration is quite different from the registration of title. What is the ultimate effect of registration in my office is a question that is constantly being settled in the courts.

56,445. You do not have maps?—No.

ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTY-FIFTH DAY.

Thursday, 20th May 1915.

PRESENT:

SIR HENRY BABINGTON SMITH, K.C.B., C.S.I. (Chairman).

The Hon. LORD DUNDAS.

Sir JOHN PRESCOTT HEWETT, G.C.S.I., C.I.E.

Sir JOHN ARROW KEMPE, K.C.B.

Mr. ARTHUR BOUTWOOD.

Mr. PERCY EWING MATHESON.

Mr. ARTHUR EVERETT SHIPLEY, F.R.S.

Mr. GRAHAM WALLAS.

Miss HALDANE.

Mrs. DEANE STREATFEILD.

Mr. E. W. H. MILLAR (Secretary).

Sir KENNETH MACKENZIE, Bart. (King's and Lord Treasurer's Remembrancer, Scotland), called and examined.

56,446. (Chairman.) What is the office which you hold?—I am the King's and Lord Treasurer's Remembrancer in Scotland.

56,447. How long have you held that post?—I have been King's Remembrancer since February 1900.

56,448. What had been your experience before that?—Prior to that I was nine years inspecting officer in the Scotch Local Government Board, and before that I was in the Army for 10 years.

56,449. As King's and Lord Treasurer's Remembrancer have you any contact with the legal offices?—I am the banker for all the Scotch departments practically, and I am the accounting officer for the Law Charges Vote, and for the Register House Vote.

56,450. Do you actually pay the salaries of the officers in the legal offices?—Yes.

56,451. You also have to advise on all matters which concern the Treasury in relation to those offices?—Yes; I am supposed to be able to give any information as to salaries, and such things, in Scotland.

56,452. You have also served on various committees which have inquired into matters connected with the legal offices?—I have.

56,453. For instance, the Committee of 1911 on the Minor Legal Offices?—Yes.

56,454. Were you also a member of the Committee on the Conditions of Service of the Engrossing Staff?—Yes.

56,455. I propose to deal first with the offices more directly connected with the Court of Session. We have had details of those offices and of the method of appointment. Nearly all the persons serving in those offices are appointed directly by the Crown on the advice of the Lord Advocate?—Nearly all.

56,456. No particular qualifications are laid down by statute or otherwise whether as regards previous experience or age?—Not for the clerks in the Court of Session. There are certain qualifications required, for example, for the Auditor of Court, who is required to be a law agent of three years' standing; I do not suppose you could have an Extractor who had not had a certain amount of legal experience, but I do not think there is any necessary qualification for an Extractor.

56,457. Looking at the appointments that have been made, can you give any general opinion as to the principles which have guided the Lord Advocate and the Crown in selecting persons for appointment?—I do not think I could. These appointments are absolutely in the Lord Advocate's hands.

56,458. Has it been the practice often to promote from a lower to a higher appointment, or have the higher appointments generally been filled from outside?

—Promotion has taken place, but very frequently the higher appointments are filled by a new man.

56,459. Has it often been the case that the Lord Advocate's clerk has been appointed to an office in the Court?—Yes. Most of the Depute and Assistant Clerks of Session have been Lord Advocate's clerks at one time or another; I think eight out of the present 14 have all been Lord Advocate's clerks at different times.

56,460. We have heard from some of the witnesses who have already been before the Commission that it is a matter of common knowledge that political considerations enter largely into the question of the appointment in many cases. Can you confirm that?—I suppose that is unavoidable under party Government.

56,461. Would you say that it is perfectly well recognised under the existing system that that is a legitimate consideration to take into account?—I should say so, certainly.

56,462. Do you consider that the system has worked satisfactorily, as judged by its results?—It has worked out, I should say, better than you could expect such a system of appointment to do. I mean, I do not think there is any great complaint as to the way the work is done.

56,463. Do you consider the system of appointing from outside to the higher posts has a discouraging effect on those who hold the other posts?—I think the system of appointing direct from outside to the higher posts really, I might almost say, damns the principle of appointing in that way, because if your junior men who have been appointed by patronage are not fit to be promoted they ought never to have been appointed to their positions. That is the view I would take about that, I think.

56,464. Then you would be in favour of a system of regular promotion from below provided that the men are fit for promotion?—Yes, distinctly.

56,465. You think that that would be preferable to the present system?—Undoubtedly.

56,466. We will deal later with the question of whether the offices can be consolidated into a single service; but clearly, if that is possible and desirable, it would facilitate the question of promotion from below?—Very much. The larger your body, of course, the better and easier it is to promote.

56,467. As regards the method of appointment, do you consider that nomination is the best method, or, if you had a consolidated service with promotion from below, would it be possible or desirable to substitute any other system, such as competitive examination?—Personally I would prefer competitive examination. I do not see why for a certain proportion of the Court of Session officials you should not have regular Civil Service men.

Sir KENNETH MACKENZIE, Bart.

56,468. Would you make it a purely open competition, or would you require any previous legal experience, as is done at present in the case of the Register House departments?—If there is a regular promotion system, and if men go in at the bottom, I do not think that previous legal experience should be necessary—in that I am not speaking for everything.

56,469. Taking the departments of the Court of Session as a whole, and leaving out a special and technical department like the Teinds Office, do you consider that the work could be learnt by a man coming in, say, at the age of 20 without previous experience?—I do not see why he should not learn it. After all, second division men go into offices like the Local Government Board and the Board of Control where they deal very largely with Acts of Parliament and become quite expert in them. In Scotland I am also Registrar of Joint Stock Companies, and my men come in as second division men and they become quite expert in joint stock company law.

56,470. In the evidence we have had about the English Legal Departments a good deal has been said by some witnesses about the legal attitude of mind and the legal point of view that is acquired by clerks who serve some years in a solicitor's office. It has been said that that point of view and attitude of mind is difficult to acquire except in a solicitor's office. Do you agree with that, and if you agree with it, do you attach any importance to it?—I do not know that it is necessary for service in a solicitor's office to give a man that attitude of mind. Not being a lawyer myself I speak with diffidence on such a point as that; but I do not see why these men should not learn their work in the same way as men who have to administer law in other departments.

56,471. Naturally, when they first enter they would be doing their work under instructions from those already in the office?—Yes, they are trained from the start. They come in knowing very little, but they would be taught, and if they cannot learn it then I think they should not be promoted and should be got rid of.

56,472. Is the result of the present system that promotion is decidedly slow?—Yes. No man ever knows if he is going to be promoted under the present system.

56,473. It is both slow and also uncertain?—Yes.

56,474. Do those observations apply also to the Register House departments—to the Register of Sasines and the Record Office?—No, because those men are regular pensionable men. You are not talking of the engrossers in those offices?

56,475. No, apart from the engrossers?—The actual staff of those offices rise; they are promoted in succession.

56,476. In those offices is there what you consider a satisfactory flow of promotion?—Yes, I do not think there is anything to complain of there as regards the permanent staff.

56,477. Your statements about promotion apply specially to the departments of the Court of Session?—Yes.

56,478. Turning now to the question of organisation, do you consider the present organisation satisfactory?—On the whole I should say, yes.

56,479. You have expressed the opinion that a more satisfactory system of promotion could be introduced, and that there might be a more satisfactory staffing of the departments if the organisation were altered in the direction of unification?—Yes.

56,480. Will you explain that more fully?—I understood you to mean by organisation whether the work really was done to the general satisfaction of the public, and I think that that is so done. At the same time I think that certain economies might be brought in without sacrificing any efficiency, and I think you would make the men in the service much more contented if they knew they were going to go in at the bottom and had the hope some day of rising to the top.

56,481. Will you explain what is the nature of the unification and consolidation which you think might take place?—I have suggested a sort of consolidation in my précis. Before we go into that may I be allowed to say that this précis was written before I had the opportunity of consulting one or two people who know a great deal more about this than I do, and I would like to amend this précis by taking out the suggestion that the Principal Clerk of Justiciary should be thrown into the consolidation?

56,482. Will you explain the consolidation which you contemplate, with such alterations in the scheme sketched in your précis as you think desirable?—Premising again, of course, that I have never had any legal training, I think it is possible that one might have a consolidated service under a Principal Clerk of Session, and that he would not require the Principal Clerk of the Bills, which we have just now, and the Principal Extractor. I think those men could probably be both replaced by men in their offices at the present moment who might be put on the same footing as Depute Clerks of Session. The post of Keeper of the Minute Book has been recommended for abolition when a vacancy occurs for a good long time.

56,483. Then the sub-departments, which are at present under the Principal Clerk of the Bills, the Principal Extractor and the Keeper of the Minute Book respectively, would become parts of the general office of the Court of Session under the headship of the Principal Clerk of Session?—Yes.

56,484. You think that the work of each of those particular branches could be supervised and managed by an officer of the rank of a Depute Clerk of Session?—Yes, I think so.

56,485. You think that the Justiciary Office could not be conveniently brought into a consolidation of that kind?—No, I do not think the Justiciary Office or the Crown Agents' Office could possibly be brought into a consolidation of that kind. I did originally think that the Justiciary Office might be, but since I wrote this précis I have had the advantage of speaking to one or two men who have been Lord Advocates and men who have been judges, and they have convinced me that the opinion I had about that was quite wrong.

56,486. Will you give us the reasons which make you think it ought not to be included?—It is a very small department. There is only the Clerk of Justiciary and two men under him permanently, and they have a temporary man who sometimes comes in as a sort of learner to learn the work. The work of the Justiciary Court is, I am informed, very technical, and the least slip, or anything going wrong, would lead perhaps to a malefactor of the very worst type getting off. Now it would not be to the interests of the country that such a thing should occur, and as there are occasions when the two men who are under the Principal Clerk of Justiciary may be both away on circuit in Glasgow, I think you must have another man in the office.

56,487. The work is of so special and technical a character, and so entirely distinct from the civil work with which the Court of Session deals, that you think it requires to be maintained as a separate office?—Yes. You are aware that, though the judges of the Justiciary Court now are the same as the judges of the Court of Session, the Court of Session and the Justiciary Court always were two entirely separate courts.

56,488. If the consolidation which you have sketched were carried out, the staff of the various sub-offices would naturally fall into their places in whatever classification was adopted for the staff of the consolidated office?—Yes.

56,489. In that case, the whole being a single office, transfer could take place freely between different branches of the office if it were desirable?—Of course that would be essential to carrying out the scheme properly.

56,490. That would be essential, I suppose, both for the purpose of making men thoroughly acquainted with all branches of the work, and also for the purpose of securing proper arrangements for promotion?—Yes.

56,491. And for preventing promotion in one branch of the office being more rapid than in another?—I think it is essential that a junior man who comes into an office should go from department to department while he is a junior to pick up the beginning of each branch of the work.

20 May 1915.]

Sir KENNETH MACKENZIE, Bart.

56,492. You see no reason why a man going into the office at the bottom should not become familiar with all the branches of which we have been speaking?—No; I think he very easily could.

56,493. In a scheme of that kind how would you deal with the Teinds Office?—The Teinds Office, of course, is a particularly technical thing, but it has been filled really in that way—the present Interim Clerk of Teinds has risen to his position simply by working up through the office under the previous Interim Clerk of Teinds. I again speak under submission to the opinion of judges and others, but I am not at all sure that that office could not be staffed as part of this general scheme in that way.

56,494. It would probably be possible to put it under the supervision and control of the head of the consolidated office, even though it might be necessary to maintain a separate staff for that particular work?—It might, perhaps, be necessary for him to ear-mark one man as an understudy to the interim clerk to learn the technicalities. Teinds, of course, are going out, and I suppose they will not go on for ever.

56,495. The work of that office is diminishing?—It must diminish.

56,496. Turning to the departments in the Register House, that is to say, the Register of Sasines, the Register of Deeds, and the Record Office, would it be desirable to carry the consolidation so far as to include those departments, or is it better to keep them entirely separate from the offices of the Court of Session?—I think they must be kept entirely separate from the Court of Session.

56,497. Do you consider that the organisation of those departments is satisfactory at present—I mean by organisation the hierarchical structure of those offices and their relations to one another?—Perhaps there is a little feeling between one or two departments there.

56,498. We have heard that questions have been raised as to the exact relations between the heads of some of those offices and the Deputy Clerk Register. Is it your opinion that the Deputy Clerk Register ought to be actually responsible for all these departments, or do you consider that it would be better that the heads of the separate departments should be independent of his control and report direct to the Secretary for Scotland?—May I say that it is entirely my personal opinion that I state now, and my personal opinion is that you can only run an office by having one head.

56,499. How do you apply that principle in the present case?—Again I say this personally. I suppose there is no secret about this thing, but the contention of the Sasines Office is that it should stand upon its own feet. Well, I do not think it should. I mean in all questions of importance which are to be referred to the Scottish Office I think they should be referred through the Deputy Clerk Register. The argument which I understand is advanced in favour of the Sasines Office standing on its own feet is, that the Keeper of Sasines holds a Crown appointment. I think it is a novel idea which has come in.

56,500. The question which the Commission desire to consider is, whether, looking to the future and looking to the question of what is the best organisation in those offices, it is desirable that the control of the Deputy Clerk Register over the Sasines Office and the Deeds Office should be complete and real, or whether it is preferable that the head of the Sasines Office should be independent, and should report direct to the Secretary for Scotland?—I am of opinion that the Deputy Clerk Register should be the head of his department.

56,501. Including in that the Office of Sasines?—The Record Office, the Deeds Office, and the Sasines Office.

56,502. Do you consider that any alteration should be made in the relations of those offices to each other? I mean, ought there to be any amalgamation between any of those offices?—They do different work. I do not think you could amalgamate them very well. At present the Deputy Clerk Register has the power of moving any member of his permanent staff from one branch to the other as he thinks fit.

56,503. That is to say, a clerk in the Record Office or Deeds Office could be moved to the Office of Sasines, and vice versa?—Yes, under the Act I think it is so.

56,504. Would it be possible to amalgamate the Deeds Office and the Sasines Office? The work of those two offices appears in many respects to be very similar. It consists in receiving legal documents for registration and having them copied into books. The only difference appears to be that in the one case the original deed is returned to the person who presents it, and in the other case it is retained in the office. Would it not be possible to place those two offices in closer relation and under a single head?—I am bound to say I never thought of the idea until just now. You have engrossers in those two departments, and I certainly see that it might be an advantage at the May Term, when the work of the Sasines Office is very heavy, if they could turn on some engrossers; but, on the other hand, of course, I always think the engrosser's is an extremely bad trade, and I trust this Commission is going to deal with the engrosser. The Sasines Office is already a pretty big office for one man to supervise; it has a good large staff, and there are a large number of these engrossers. I should have thought myself it would have been easier to combine the Deeds Office and the Record Office, both of which are small. I think you do not want both a keeper of the deeds and a deputy-keeper of the records.

56,505. You think that that combination would work better than the other—that it would be better to combine the Deeds Office with the Record Office?—I should have thought so myself, but it is not a thing I have gone into, and I would rather like to go into it a bit before saying anything definitely. It certainly appeared to me before that there should be one head, from a financial point of view. I do not think you require both the deputy-keeper of records and the keeper of the register of deeds. I think one higher class man is sufficient. I think it would be quite possible to do away with the keeper of deeds, and hand his duties over to the keeper of the Sasines Office. There may be Acts of Parliament, or something which one has not at one's fingers' ends, which might affect that.

56,506. We were told by the Deputy Clerk Register that his work as Registrar-General occupies so large a part of his time that it was difficult for him to give the necessary attention to the work of the Register House departments—the Sasines Office, the Deeds Office, and the Record Office—and he suggested that it would be desirable to separate the office of Registrar-General from that of Deputy Clerk Register. Are you prepared to express an opinion on that?—I suppose Sir James Patten MacDougall knows what he is talking about, but I should have thought myself that one man could undertake the two duties quite well.

56,507. You do not think it ought to be too much for one man?—No, I do not. No doubt, in the years when arrangements have to be made for a census, there is considerable pressure on the Registrar-General, but, ordinarily speaking, I do not think the work is very heavy.

56,508. Ordinarily, I suppose the Registrar-General's work ought to run like a machine, with very little attention from the head of the office?—That is what one would think. After all, the work is largely looking up the date of births for old age pensions and things of that sort, and ordinary registration which is done, not by the head of the department. I have no doubt that preparation for a census involves him in a considerable amount of work.

56,509. In those Register House departments the method of recruitment is by competition subject to certain preliminary qualifications?—Yes, there is a special examination paper which is set; certain things are required. It is not the ordinary competitive Civil Service examination.

56,510. It is a competitive examination, and certain qualifications of service in a solicitor's office are necessary for candidates to be admitted to it?—I am not sure whether, under the last arrangement, those qualifications are required.

Sir KENNETH MACKENZIE, Bart.

56,511. We were told that service of five years in a solicitor's office is required in the case of ordinary candidates, and three years in the case of university candidates, and also that boy clerks and engrossers, serving in the department, who used formerly to be admitted to the examination, are no longer admitted. Do you consider that those service qualifications are necessary in the case of the Register House departments?—No, I think they are totally unnecessary.

56,512. You would make the examination purely an open competition?—Certainly.

56,513. At what age?—I think the ordinary second division examination. A second division man I think is perfectly competent to do that work. Of course, he does not go in at the head of his branch but at the bottom, and any knowledge necessary he would pick up in the office.

56,514. Would you take the men from the ordinary second division examination or have a special examination?—I should take men from the ordinary second division.

56,515. Would there not be some advantage in getting men who definitely wished to enter this department, the work of which is of a rather special character, and not men who merely desired to enter the Civil Service generally?—You mean by that men who are in legal offices?

56,516. Or men who had an antiquarian turn of mind. If you have a separate examination for admission to these departments, then men would go in for that examination who thought that they would personally be suitable for the work of those departments, and that the work would be of a kind to interest them; whereas, if you take a man from a general Civil Service examination, you may get a man who has no turn in that direction at all. I put that to you as a consideration which might tell in favour of having a separate examination, and ask whether you attach any weight to it?—I think in a staff of the size that you would have at the Register House you would be quite certain to find a sufficiency of men with antiquarian tastes to fill all the posts required. Those posts are very few.

56,517. There are very few posts where the work is of an antiquarian character?—Yes, I should say very few.

56,518. In the remainder of the posts where the work is not of an antiquarian character it is of a definitely legal character for the most part?—Yes, but I do not think you would call it very high legal work, either in the Sasines Office or the Deeds Office.

56,519. Perhaps not very high legal work, but we were told, for instance, that a substantial part of the work of the second class clerks in the Sasines Office consists in reading deeds which are presented and abstracting the essential particulars of those deeds in the form of a minute. That is work not of a very high character, but still of a definitely legal character. It means the reading and interpretation of deeds. My point is, given that the work is of that character, much of it legal and some of it antiquarian, whether there is an advantage or not in having a separate examination for recruiting the department, or whether you will get men adapted for the work and to whom the work is congenial by taking them out of the general Civil Service examination?—I think you would get men to work it very satisfactorily if you took them out of the general Civil Service second division men. Again, may I say that is only my idea and I do not wish to press it.

56,520. In any case, whether you had a separate examination or not, you would do away with the qualifications of previous service?—Yes, I think they are quite unnecessary.

56,521. You mentioned the question of the engrossers, and you told us that you were a member of the committee which sat to inquire into the case of the engrossers?—That is so.

56,522. That committee recommended, but, I think, reluctantly, the maintenance of the system of piece-work?—That was so.

56,523. Should I be correct in saying that that recommendation was made, not because there were no objections to the system, but because it was difficult to devise a better one?—Certainly, that was the case.

56,524. We have heard that the question of substituting a mechanical method of reproduction, photographic or other, has been and is under consideration?—Photo-zincography do you allude to?

56,525. That was the particular method considered by Lord Low's Commission?—Yes.

56,526. We have been told that another commission is now sitting on the question of land tenure in Scotland, and that the question of the method of registering the deeds in the Sasines Office is under their examination too?—I am not on that committee and I could not say.

56,527. This Commission is not directly concerned with the method of reproducing the deeds, except as bearing on the organisation of the staff. If a mechanical method of reproduction were adopted that would solve the difficulty as regards the engrossers, except, perhaps, the difficulty of disposing of the present staff?—Yes.

56,528. Supposing it was found impracticable to change the present system, and it was necessary to maintain the copying staff, have you considered whether it would be possible to devise any pension scheme for that staff other than the Civil Service scheme which, under the existing law, is not applicable to them?—It was not actually thoroughly worked out, though there had been one or two proposals. I think it could be done, and I think one could pension off the engrossers after they get to 50, and substitute typists for them, and it would not cost more than it is costing at present, and in the end, of course, it would cost a great deal less.

56,529. That is assuming that typewriting might be substituted for handwriting in the reproduction of the deeds?—Yes, I believe there can be no objection to that now, because I understand from the Stationery Office that typing-ink is now absolutely indelible, and you can type now by these new machines into a bound book, which you could not do before. They have now, at the Land Registry, machines which run up and down the book. The objection before was that you would have to give out loose leaves which would have to be bound, and if a leaf was lost there would be a difficulty; but that is obviated by this system, so I see no earthly reason why typing should not be brought in.

56,530. If typing were adopted, do you propose it should be done by a female staff?—Most certainly.

56,531. Do you propose that they should be paid by piece or by salary?—By salary, I think. I would have the regular established Civil Service typists.

56,532. The committee on which you served, and other committees, have reported that in the case of men copyists it is impracticable to have a system of payment by salary, and that a system of piecework is indispensable in order to get the work done economically; but it seems to be universally admitted that if women typists are employed, they can be paid by salary without that inconvenience resulting. How do you explain that?—The pay of the male engrosser is entirely owing to what he does; if he earns small pay he does very little work; if he makes biggish pay it means he works very hard indeed. On the other hand, our experience of the girls who type in Government offices is very satisfactory; they do a very fair day's work, and when you have a certain number of them you generally have a lady superintendent who looks after them, and sees that they do a fair day's work.

56,533. Would not it be possible to have a similar discipline in the case of men copyists? Would not it be possible, for instance, to have a certain standard of work which must be performed in each day? A slow writer would perhaps have to take longer hours over it and a quick writer would do it quicker; but with a standard of work you would secure that work representing the salary would be performed?—I do not know that that would be very agreeable to your quick writer. Your quick writer wants to earn money, particularly when he is young. I do not think he would be very pleased if he was told that he would get so much a week when he knows, if left alone, he can earn three times that amount.

Sir KENNETH MACKENZIE, Bart.

56,534. But if you recruited a staff on those principles, you would get men who were satisfied with the advantages of fixity, rather than with the advantages of heavy earnings in their earlier years?—It is dreadful work, purely mechanical, all their lives copying, if you are going to start a staff of that kind with the understanding that they are going to copy all their lives and get a pension at the end.

56,535. But would not your female staff understand that?—A female staff copy, but then they marry sometimes and go away; they may get better positions.

56,536. You mean that women would not be necessarily bound to that for their life's work in the way a man copyist would be?—No, obviously not. Perhaps some women unfortunately are; but I think a good many are not.

56,537. Another objection that was made to a fixed salaried staff was that the work is uneven in flow, and that at certain times of the year there is heavy pressure of work and at other times the work falls off, and a piecework staff is more flexible in dealing with rushes of work than a salaried staff?—Of course, that must be so, because the tremendous rush of deeds into the Sasines Office takes place immediately after the 15th May. All the Sasines Office engrossers are writing as hard as they can for the summer half-year. Not nearly so many deeds come in in November, and a lot of them are compulsorily idle in January, February, and March, because there is no work for them to do; so they have to work as hard as they can in the summer months to make a living to tide them over the bad months.

56,538. How would you deal with those conditions if you had a fixed salaried staff of women?—I think the women would do more work than the men. I think a woman will type more than a man will write in a day.

56,539. We have been told that typewriting may be taken roughly to be twice as rapid as handwriting?—Yes.

56,540. But that would not affect the particular problem I am putting to you. How, with a salaried staff, would you deal with the conditions under which the work comes in, namely, that in a certain part of the year you have a great deal of work, and in another part of the year a small amount of work? It could be, no doubt, dealt with to some extent by giving the staff their holidays in the slack period of the year; but would that make a sufficient adjustment of the staff?—Of course, it is unavoidable that you must have a busy time and a slack time, whether you have a staff paid by piecework or a staff paid by salary.

56,541. But if you have a staff paid by piecework they will readily work long hours in the busy times, and though they may not be content, still if they have to work short hours in the slack time, they will only be paid accordingly; but if you have a fixed salaried staff you have them sitting doing nothing in the slack time of the year, and unless you work them heavily by overtime you will not have enough staff to do the work in the busy time of the year?—My view rather is, that as a woman types so much quicker than a man writes, a staff of women typists would overtake the work after the May Term just as quickly as the engrossers do at present and get the deeds out.

56,542. Then that staff would be more than sufficient in the slack time?—They would.

56,543. What would you do with them then?—They would be idle just as the engrossers are now. They might be made use of in some other way perhaps.

56,544. That appears to me to be a somewhat difficult problem in dealing with this work by a fixed salaried staff?—I agree it is not simple.

56,545. It may, perhaps, be met to some extent by fixing your leave season in the slack period of the year, but that has the drawback that the slack period of the year is the winter, which is not liked for the holiday season. It may also be met to some extent by overtime in the busy season. But even if you apply both those devices, it appears to me that there is considerable difficulty in dealing with work, which varies so much as this does in its incidence, with a salaried staff?—That is quite so. There is great difficulty in working it, however you try to do it, I think.

56,546. Would the difficulty be met to some extent if the engrossing staff of the Sasines Office and the Deeds Office were united, or were, at least, transferable from one to the other?—You mean the engrossers in the Sasines Office could do the Deeds Office work in their slack time, and vice versa?

56,547. Yes. I understand that the work of the Deeds Office is more even in its incidence throughout the year?—It is. I understand there is a sort of steady flow in the Deeds Office which just keeps them going and no more in the year. I should think some of the Deeds Office work might be allowed to get into arrear so as to be taken up in the slack season.

56,548. So that if you had a combined staff, or at any rate an interchangeable staff, that would assist in solving the problem?—I suggested it once before I think, and the suggestion was not received with favour by the Sasines Office or the Deeds Office—that was with reference to the men engrossers.

56,549. It would facilitate such an arrangement if the offices were combined?—It would.

56,550. Supposing it were not practicable to change the system and employ typing, or adopt mechanical reproduction, and that, therefore, the present staff had to go on, would it be possible to devise a contributory pension scheme for the engrossers?—Do you mean to which the nation should contribute?

56,551. Yes. I mean a system under which the men themselves would contribute a certain percentage of their pay. That contribution would be supplemented partly by the gratuities to which the men are entitled under the present system, and, possibly, by an additional contribution by the State. We have been told that a contributory system exists, for instance, among the officers administering the poor law in England, and it would seem that a system of that kind might be devised to meet the case of the engrossers?—I suppose it might be.

56,552. Would not a system of that kind remove one, at any rate, of the difficulties and hardships which attend the present organisation. I mean the difficulty of providing for the men when they are getting old and beyond their work?—I think what the engrossers feel as a hardship more than the want of pension is that they get practically no holiday except a compulsory holiday at a bad time of the year, and that they get no sick leave. If a man is at all ill, or anything of that sort, in the middle of his busy time of the year, he has to drop his income, because he cannot get three or four days' sick leave.

56,553. Is there any mutual arrangement for providing for sickness?—I think when the Committee sat we found that they had a sort of mutual fund, out of which certain sick benefit is paid.

56,554. We have been told that among the scribes of the offices of the English courts there is a system under which, if a man is ill, the work that he would have done is distributed among his colleagues, and, up to a certain sum, he receives payment for it?—Yes, I remember Mr. Stringer telling us that, at the Committee on which we sat.

56,555. Is the system in the Sasines Department similar to that?—I think it is something on the same lines. You will find it in the report of that Committee at page 18: "The subscription is 24s. yearly, the sick benefits are 1*l.* for 13 weeks; 15*s.* for the next 13 weeks; and 10*s.* for the following 26 weeks, and 10*l.* is given as a funeral allowance."

56,556. Does that adequately meet the requirements in the case of sick leave?—This, you see, is their own money. What I mean by their not getting sick leave is, that it seems to me the head of the department should have some power to allow these men to be off duty for a day or two if not feeling well, because a man may not be well and, by coming to his work and working all day long, he makes himself very much worse, and then, perhaps, he is off for three weeks or a month. That is what I consider such a hardship on these fellows. The ordinary Civil servant, if he feels unwell, keeps away for a couple of days and then he is all right. I think it is very hard that these men should never be able to get off like that and to be so dependent on what they do. An arrangement for sick leave would cost very little.

Sir KENNETH MACKENZIE, Bart.

56,557. The question of the present housing of the offices of the Court of Session has been mentioned in evidence, and it has been pointed out that considerable inconvenience arises from the fact that the offices are at the Register House and that the processes have to be transported daily between the Register House and the courts. It was suggested that it would be very desirable that the offices of the Court should be placed in close proximity to the courts themselves. Do you agree in that opinion?—Yes, it certainly would be a convenience if they could be so placed.

56,558. Would it be convenient or inconvenient to solicitors?—I do not think it would make any difference to the business men, once they got accustomed to the change.

56,559. Would there be difficulty in providing accommodation for them in the neighbourhood of the courts?—Yes, that is the difficulty.

56,560. Would it be possible to find room by transferring to the Register House any offices which are at present in Parliament Square?—I do not think so. The structural conditions of Parliament Square are not such that one could very easily, without enormous expense, make accommodation for these rooms that would be required. I may say that has been under consideration several times, and I have been round there with Mr. Oldrieve, who was the head of the Board of Works in Edinburgh some time ago. Several times we went round to see if anything could be done in that way, but I think the expense would be practically prohibitive.

56,561. Taking your own office, would that be more or less conveniently placed if it were in the Register House?—It would be rather inconvenient in some ways if I was going to the Register House. Among other things I publish the Edinburgh Gazette, and notices sometimes are sent over from the Court just before 1 o'clock. If I get a notice five minutes after 1, I cannot get it out that day. There are all kinds of little things like that whereby it is convenient for me to be near the court.

56,562. In dealing with the question of the consolidation of the offices, we have not mentioned the Chancery Office. What do you think ought to be done with that?—I think the Chancery Office, as an office, might, perhaps, be amalgamated. Part of it might go to the Register House, I suppose, and part of it might go to the Sheriff Clerk in Edinburgh.

56,563. Should any part of it be combined with the offices of the Court of Session?—Part of the Chancery Office work is recording, and probably that would have to fall to the Record Office, and the other part of its work could probably be done in the office of the Sheriff Clerk of Edinburgh.

56,564. At any rate, you think it would not be necessary to maintain it as a separate small office?—No, I do not think it necessary to retain it as a separate department.

56,565. Turning now to the system of local courts—the Sheriff Courts—we have had some general evidence on that subject, and we have heard that the staff of the Sheriff Clerks is unpensionable and has no Civil Service status; that it is in some cases part-time, and is appointed by the Sheriff Clerk himself. Is that correct?—Yes, that is all correct.

56,566. Suggestions have been made for a consolidated service. If some scheme of that kind were adopted the staff, it is suggested, would be given a Civil Service status and would become pensionable, and, presumably, the present system of appointment would require modification. Will you give us your opinion on those suggestions?—I am afraid, of course, that any idea of a consolidated service to take in the whole staff of the Sheriff Courts is quite impossible. You have to deal with such very different things. If you take the Sheriff Clerk in Glasgow, for example, he has a staff of 50 or, perhaps, 60 people, and they are all regular men who come into the office every day and work regular office hours. Then, if you go to other Sheriff Courts, taking little places in the country, the Sheriff Clerk himself is only employed for half the day, and all his staff is a boy who may be in the office for an hour, and probably does something else. I do not see how you can make a consolidated service when you have to deal with such different kinds of people, and so many people who are really not full-timers. I do think that to a certain limited extent one might make a consolidated service among the places that really do what I call whole-time business—I mean the bigger places like Aberdeen, Edinburgh, Dundee, Paisley. There are certain deputies there, I think, who might form part of a consolidated service, and men junior to them would be in another class. But the difficulty I see about it is, who in the world is ever going to be able to promote these men? Supposing the senior man at Glasgow goes, do you think it is at all likely that the Sheriff Clerk in Glasgow will want to take a deputy from Kirkcaldy, say; he will want to promote the next man in his own office. That is the difficulty. No one man can possibly know the whole staff of all the Sheriff Clerks in Scotland and what their qualifications are. I think it would be an immense advantage if you could do such a thing; but it seems to me that one of the impossibilities of doing it is that you could not have a flow of promotion which would be at all equitable.

56,567. Would that difficulty be diminished to some extent if effect were given to the recommendation of Lord Salvesen's Committee in favour of a reduction in the number of Sheriff Clerks?—I think the Sheriff Clerks themselves are a different thing to their staffs.

56,568. At present you have a considerable number of Sheriff Clerks. Lord Salvesen's Committee recommended that there should be one Sheriff Clerk for each sheriffdom; that is to say, the number should be reduced to 15?—That is so.

56,569. Would it not be much easier to devise some committee or some officer who should have a view of the whole of these staffs, and should be able to compare the different staffs for the purpose of promotion, if you only had 15 Sheriff Clerks in place of the 34 at present?—Well, I do not think it would really make very much difference in this way. Though you would reduce the number of your Sheriff Clerks to one for each sheriffdom, you would not reduce the number of your seats of Court and not reduce the number of staffs there are in the different places. Though you would have only one Sheriff Clerk, say, for the Lothians instead of three, as at present, you would still have his deputies at the different places as before.

56,570. But if you had one Sheriff Clerk at the head of the whole organisation of that sheriffdom he would be in a position to obtain information as to the staff in the different places and compare their qualifications?—He would be able to tell you the best of his own staff in his own sheriffdom.

56,571. If the districts were as large as that, each of them including the whole of a sheriffdom, you would have a large enough staff in each sheriffdom to secure a flow of promotion; and transfers between sheriffdoms might only be necessary if there was considerable inequality in promotion in the different sheriffdoms?—The conditions of the sheriffdoms vary very largely. You have the big industrial sheriffdoms, and then you come to the scattered sheriffdoms in the north and west of Scotland. There is a very great difference between a sheriffdom, say, in the Lothians, or in Dumfries, and a sheriffdom in Caithness. That is what adds, I think, so very much to the difficulty of putting these things upon a basis on which one could compare one with the other.

56,572. There would, however, be a staff of a considerable number in each sheriffdom?—I do not think in some of the sheriffdoms it would be very big.

56,573. (Mr. Boutwood.) In Caithness, for instance, what would it be?—I am afraid I should have to get the figures. I should not think in Dornoch there is probably more than a man and a boy.

56,574. (Chairman.) Would it be possible, if you had a combined service and a reduction in the number of Sheriff Clerks, to have a Committee of the principal Sheriff Clerks for dealing with the question of promotion from one sheriffdom to another?—Yes, if you reduced it to those 15, I have no doubt you could set up a Committee among those Sheriff Clerks to consider the question of promotion.

56,575. You mentioned that in some places the staff are whole-time, and in other places they are part-time. Do I gather from that that you think it would be necessary to distinguish between those two classes if you were setting up a consolidated service, and include in the consolidated service only those who are whole-time officers?—I do not think you can make anybody pensionable who is not a whole-time man.

56,576. If you had a contributory pension system it would be possible to apply it to part-time officers?—I do not know, because these part-time people make other income.

56,577. They would contribute in respect of the income which they receive and they would be pensioned on that basis; they would make a smaller contribution and receive a smaller pension; but do you see any insuperable difficulty in including them in a contributory system?—No. Of course some of them are so poorly paid that they could not contribute. All the Sheriff Clerks send in to my office an account of the way in which their allowance is spent, and you would see lots of men, even in the big offices, only get 20*l.* a year for their services.

56,578. For their whole time?—Their whole time.

56,579. 20*l.* a year?—At the beginning in some of the big offices. I think I am right in saying that; but I will send you the figures.

56,580. Are those adults?—Those are boys hoping to get on in a Sheriff Clerk's office. For example, in Glasgow, in the Sheriff Clerk's office, no doubt there are some boys only getting 20*l.* in the hope that they are going to get on in that office.

56,581. Do you think, speaking generally, the salaries are insufficient in the Sheriff Clerks' offices?—Of the subordinate people, dreadfully insufficient, I think.

56,582. What remedy do you suggest for that?—I think every Sheriff Clerk ought to be a whole-timer for Sheriff Clerk's work; he ought not to be allowed to do anything else at all. In that case, very often, he would not want so many deputies. There are cases of Sheriff Clerks who, I think, one might truthfully say, do absolutely nothing; they may sign their names once or twice a quarter, and may have very large solicitors' businesses of their own which they are running, and the whole work is done by their deputies.

56,583. If the number of Sheriff Clerks were reduced in the way suggested, it would be easy then to require that they should give their whole time to the service?—Certainly; they would have to then, I think, if they had to supervise three or four offices. I think it would tend gradually to efficiency if that recommendation of Lord Salvesen's Committee was put into effect and the Sheriff Clerks were reduced to one to each sheriffdom and he was made a whole-time man.

56,584. Have you any suggestion to make with regard to the Commissary Clerk of Midlothian?—He is the only Commissary Clerk whose business is not now done by the Sheriff Clerk of the county, and I think that the Commissary Clerk of Midlothian might be attached to the Sheriff Clerks' Office. One of the duties that fall to the Commissary Clerk is, that he has to record the estate of every Scotsman who dies furth of Scotland; and, of course, at the present time, that is a tremendous amount of work.

56,585. That work is somewhat different in character from the commissary work done by the Sheriff Courts?—No, I do not think so. It is all commissary work, only, by law, any Scotsman who dies out of Scotland has to have his estate made up at the office of the Commissary Clerk of Edinburgh. I think it is only three words in an Act of Parliament that would be required to be repealed to take that out.

56,586. You think that that work might be perfectly well done by the Sheriff Clerk?—Perfectly.

56,587. What is the system in Scotland as regards the recording of wills which are presented for confirmation?—If a man dies out of Scotland confirmation has to be obtained from the Commissary Clerk of Edinburgh. Also, if anybody in Scotland dies with no fixed domicile he has to have his estate confirmed by the Commissary Clerk of Edinburgh. In all other cases you must get confirmation at the office of the Sheriff Clerk of the County, who is also a Commissary Clerk.

56,588. The will has to be presented for confirmation?—Yes.

56,589. Is there any compulsory system of preservation of the record of all wills that are confirmed?—They are all in the records of the Court where they are confirmed. If they are in a Sheriff Court they are in the Sheriff Court records.

56,590. The text of the will?—Yes.

56,591. Those records are, as we have been told, preserved locally by the Sheriff Court?—Yes.

56,592. Have you any recommendations to make with regard to the Sheriff Clerk of the County of Edinburgh?—Yes. I think it seems almost unnecessary to retain a Sheriff Clerk of the County of the City of Edinburgh and also a Procurator Fiscal of the County of the City of Edinburgh. I suppose they are retained because it is the capital, and the Lord Provost, as such, is also the Sheriff of the County of the City of Edinburgh. I dare say it is rather just for the honour of it, but I do not think it is necessary for the work.

56,593. You think it might be merged in the County of Midlothian?—I think it might quite suitably be merged in the Sheriff Clerk of Midlothian and the fiscalship equally in the Procurator Fiscal of Midlothian.

56,594. What does the Sheriff Clerk of Chancery do?—He records the services of heirs.

56,595. Procurators Fiscal, as we have heard, are appointed by the Lord Advocate, and their work is, in great part, under his direction?—Yes.

56,596. Would it be practicable or desirable to make the Procurators Fiscal into a regular service with promotion on Civil Service conditions?—I think it would be desirable to have it as a service. It is a little difficult to say as to the Civil Service conditions. A man who is appointed Procurator Fiscal must be a man with a certain amount of experience. You cannot begin at 22 as a Procurator Fiscal. He is responsible to the Lord Advocate for the investigation of every sort of crime inside his district, and he practically must be a man of a certain amount of experience. As regards Procurators Fiscal, I think it is only right to say that there have been several cases of promotion. The present Lord Advocate has promoted several men.

56,597. Would it be the case that a man who had served as Procurator Fiscal in a small place, would be, provided he had the necessary qualifications, a suitable person for appointment as Procurator Fiscal to a larger place?—Certainly; I think so.

56,598. Are any of them pensionable at present?—No. There is one Procurator Fiscal at the present moment who was appointed Procurator Fiscal in Orkney, certainly not very long ago; he was then sent down to somewhere in the Stewartry—Kirkcudbright, or one of those places—and quite recently he was appointed to Perth, one of the principal places in Scotland. That shows promotion is exercised, and a man who begins at an out-of-the-way place like Orkney is considered by the Lord Advocate quite fit to be advanced to a big post.

56,599. Do you think it right to extend that system?—Certainly, so far as he is a good Procurator Fiscal. The Crown Office report to the Lord Advocate how well or badly a Procurator Fiscal does his work. The Procurator Fiscal sends his report in to the Crown Office, where it is considered by the Crown Office staff and Advocates Depute and so by the Lord Advocate.

56,600. In how many cases are the Procurators Fiscal whole-timers?—Nearly all of the recent appointments, I think, have been made to be whole-timers. It is very desirable in places where there is enough work to keep the Procurator Fiscal working. Personally, I think there are drawbacks to restricting a man from any other work where he is in a place where his Procurator Fiscal's work does not occupy his time. I think it is a mistake to appoint a man to a place and say: "You are to do nothing else," when there is not enough work to keep him going. A man, I think, generally runs to seed in that case. May I explain that, though I appear here as a sort of confidential adviser to the Treasury in Scotland, owing to certain circumstances I have not been able to tell either Sir Thomas Heath or

Sir KENNETH MACKENZIE, Bart.

Sir John Bradbury what I proposed to say to you to-day, and therefore I am giving evidence not as a representative of the Treasury in any authorised form. It might be well, perhaps, to make that clear. I would have consulted them had I been able, but different things prevented it.

56,601. (Lord Dundas.) I suppose, as King's Remembrancer, your primary attitude in considering questions of this kind is financial and economic?—Yes.

56,602. You told us—and I congratulate you on the fact—that you are not a trained lawyer. I suppose I may take it that you have no personal inside knowledge of such departments as the Bill Chamber, the Teinds Office, the Justiciary Office, or the Crown Office?—No, none.

56,603. In considering as to the possible co-ordination of the various departments of the Court into one consolidated office under one head, must there, do you think, in any view, be certain exceptions made?—Yes, I think so.

56,604. I think you mentioned to the Chairman that the Justiciary Office, in your opinion, would be such an exception?—Yes.

56,605. You are not here to suggest that Justiciary clerks could be so co-ordinated as to become simply interchangeable with Civil clerks?—No, because their work is so different that I think that would not do.

56,606. I understand you also indicate that the Crown Office should be left as it is—independent?—I think the Crown Office should remain under the control of the Lord Advocate, and should not be in that consolidated arrangement.

56,607. The Teinds Office we need not say much about. I suppose you are aware that it is a somewhat intricate subject?—Yes, I am.

56,608. And the Teinds Office may stand in a special position, and we can leave it at that?—Yes.

56,609. Did I gather aright that you thought that the post of the Principal Clerk of the Bill Chamber might be abolished?—Yes, I think it might.

56,610. Are you aware that the Bill Chamber procedure is unfortunately of a very peculiar and technical character?—Yes.

56,611. Is it not, in your opinion, necessary that the chief of the Bill Chamber, whoever he is, should have real technical knowledge of his difficult subject?—I do not wish for a moment to suggest anything that you do not agree with; you know much more than I do about this, but I should have thought that the head man in the Clerk of the Bills Office would be quite capable of carrying on his work, as far as I have been given to understand.

56,612. Is it your view that the Principal Clerk of Session would really take the place, as one of his duties, of the Principal Bill Chamber Clerk?—No; I mean that I do not think there is any need to pay a man the salary that you pay to the Principal Clerk of the Bills. I think his work could be done by a man in the position of a Depute Clerk of Session.

56,613. In other words, if money can be advantageously saved on that office, you would save it?—Yes. All I want to do is to suggest a possible economy. I do not wish for a moment to suggest an economy which would be at the cost of efficiency.

56,614. I am sure you do not. As regards patronage by the Lord Advocate, some suggestion, I believe, has been made that his lordship might be assisted by an advisory committee of some sort. Have you any view upon that?—That was, I think, the view put forward in England by Lord Loreburn.

56,615. (Chairman.) By Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie and Lord Loreburn?—England is so very much bigger, and the number of appointments in Scotland are so very few that I really do not think a committee would be much use.

56,616. (Mr. Boutwood.) I have only one question to ask, and I do not know that it relates very much to your own department. There seems to be a high officer of the Crown who has received in a diluted form a certain administrative tradition from the days of Henry, Lord Dundas—I mean the Lord Advocate. Where does he live and work? Is it in London or in Edinburgh?—In both, I suppose. While the House of Commons is sitting, of course, the Lord Advocate is here.

56,617. But when he is in Edinburgh, is he in what you would call intimate touch with the staff of the Scottish establishments?—Yes, the Lord Advocate has regular chambers at the Law Courts in Edinburgh where he sits. If he is engaged in a case, he is down at the Court; if he is not engaged in a case, he sits up in his room, and he is there seeing people.

56,618. Apparently the Lord Advocate virtually has the patronage of Scotland in his pocket. Does he, when in Edinburgh or London, really know the Scottish Service and the men who constitute it? That is the point I want to find out?—I do not think I could tell you.

56,619. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) You said you are banker for the Local Government Board Prisons Department and so on. Does that mean that you are in the position of the Paymaster in the English offices?—Yes, really.

56,620. That is to say, you have to advise the Treasury as to the investment of funds standing in suitors' names, and so on?—No. We do not have invested funds in Scotland. For the convenience of the country we are as overdrawn in Scotland as we can be so as to keep the money in London. The Court of Session funds are dealt with by the Accountant of Court.

56,621. Will you explain your connection with the Scottish Office? Is your work closely connected with the Scottish Office?—I suppose generally I have to work against the Scottish Office. The Scottish Office are always asking for certain people to have increases of salary, and my duty is to advise the Treasury as to whether I think they ought or ought not to have it.

56,622. That is to say, you are the general accounting officer, accounting to the Comptroller and Auditor-General, and advising the Treasury?—Yes.

56,623. Therefore you have to be always on the look-out for opportunities of economy, I suppose? You have to be financial critic throughout the whole Scottish Service?—Yes; I have nothing to do with the Post Office or the Customs.

56,624. There is a small point which came up which I should like to ask you about from that point of view. We were told that the macers in court charge a fee of 1s. for every witness who appears. Are you familiar with that?—I believe that to be the case, yes.

56,625. Is that fee paid into the Consolidated Fund and then paid out to them, or does it simply go into their pockets?—I think the macers pool all the fees that they extract during the year, and divide them amongst the lot at the end.

56,626. But, as a rule, in the Government Service, if a man receives a fee he accounts for that fee; the fee is paid into some responsible fund, and out of that fund paid either to him or to somebody else. Is not that so?—Certainly.

56,627. What happens to these shillings?—These shillings are pooled by the macers and divided amongst them, as I say; but I am not certain that it is a fee which, in any event, should be accounted for. I dare say if the public were to challenge the practice, and to say, "We will not pay this macer this shilling," the macer could not exact it.

56,628. You think it is a customary fee like a fee to a porter at a railway station?—Yes, I should say so; but I should like to verify that.*

56,629. Where there is a fee which, in fact, to the knowledge of a judge is exacted from all witnesses and put into the pockets of macers, is not the question whether it is a legal fee or not a question which should be somewhat rigorously inquired into?—It is a very small thing, and I suppose nobody has ever thought much about it. After all, nobody is likely to be a witness in a court more than once in his life, and I suppose he does not grudge the shilling.

56,630-1. Does the witness pay it out of his own pocket?—No. The agent pays it, and recovers it from the unsuccessful litigant as part of the expenses. It is a question I know very little about; but I know the macers do get certain fees and pool them, and divide them at the end of the year.

* These fees are exacted by "use and wont."—K.M.

Sir KENNETH MACKENZIE, Bart.

56,632. In the Report of the Committee of 1911 it was proposed that the extractors' clerks and engrossing clerks should be paid fixed salaries. The Committee reported that such an arrangement would facilitate the carrying out of minor reforms, such as the shortening of extracts by the omission of the long warrant and the substitution of a short form, as proposed by the Principal Extractor?—Those men in the Extractors Office—there are three of them—have now been put upon salary.

56,633. But the plain meaning of that is, that certain unnecessary things were written out in order to provide salaries for the persons who wrote them?—I do not know that they were unnecessary. That depends very much upon the law. No doubt a lot of these things are extraordinarily long, and this committee of Sir George Paul's is now sitting to ascertain whether these titles cannot be shortened.

56,634. The meaning of that passage, "Such an arrangement would facilitate the carrying out of this reform," means that that reform was rendered more difficult to carry out because men earned money by copying the longer extracts?—Yes, but besides that I think it was necessary.

56,635. Have you any knowledge, officially, whether or not anyone appointed to a post is appointed with an age limit of 70, or any other limit?—The ordinary Civil servant has to go at 65.

56,636. Yes; but we have been informed that there has been lately introduced into warrants appointing to Crown posts a limit, in many cases, of 70 years of age. Has that come before you at all?—In this way: That before I pay anybody any salary I see his commission, and therefore should see his age, probably, in the commission.

56,637. On December 16th last, Mr. John Smart was appointed, at the age of 67, to a pensionable post of Depute Clerk of Session. Do you know whether he was appointed with an age limit of 70 or not?—I am not quite positive if he had an age limit, but, I think, as a matter of fact, all Depute Clerks of Session are now bound to go at 70.

56,638. Then, if he was appointed at the age of 67, which would probably be, say, 67½, and you had to subtract from his period of efficiency the period during which he was learning his most difficult and responsible duties, which are paid for at 500*l.* a year, his total period of efficient service for which he would be afterwards pensioned would be very short?—Yes, but that man will not be pensionable because he will not have served long enough to be entitled to anything. I am not saying that the appointment of a man at the age of 67 is defensible in my humble opinion.

56,639. One is gradually learning—in my case rather to my surprise—that right through the Scottish Judicial Service a system of patronage prevails?—I do not know that you can go quite so far as that.

56,640. From the top down to the macers?—There is a good deal of patronage, of course. It is not all patronage, I think.

56,641. And it is suggested by witnesses that patronage is interpreted to mean either the satisfaction of personal claims or the satisfaction of political claims—that political claims are considered, on the whole, more important, but they may stand aside if a man has a personal claim upon the gentleman exercising patronage?—Yes, I dare say that is true. I do not exercise patronage so I am unable to say.

56,642. One can understand a patronage service in which patronage was confined to the original appointment, but it seems also to be assumed that, in this case, the whole system of promotion is influenced in the same way. You tell us, for instance, in your précis, with regard to promotion: "I should say not much weight is given to seniority or merit." If neither seniority nor merit count, either personal or political favour is the only alternative?—That is so.

56,643. You told us that this system of patronage was in your judgment unavoidable under party government?—I, perhaps, ought to qualify that by saying, under present circumstances under party government, as long as you have not got a consolidated service, or a service to which admission is by competition or examination.

56,644. Have you ever happened to have stumbled upon the history of the first introduction of the Civil Service Commission in England, in consequence of Sir Charles Trevelyan's Report in 1854?—I remember reading it once.

56,645. Do you remember that the Government then published a large number of letters to him from important official heads, and so on, of whom a majority declared that in their judgment, the then existing system of patronage was the necessary result of party government in a constitutional country?—Yes.

56,646. But, in fact, it was to a large extent abolished in England in the mass of the Service?—In the mass of the Civil Service, yes.

56,647. And if a corresponding change were introduced into the Scottish Judicial Service, it would be necessary in Scotland, as in England, to break through a long-established habit of thought and feeling?—Yes, it would.

56,648. You told us that you did not think a committee in Scotland, on which the Civil Service Commission might be represented, would be much use to advise the Lord Advocate; but might not it be useful in breaking through that long-established habit of thought and feeling?—I do not think so; because if you appoint the committee you will only appoint the committee after you have agreed to make a "Service" of it.

56,649. Yes; but there may be a number of posts which are not easily filled by the ordinary competitive examination, and which require, for instance, legal experience. Take the Sheriff Clerk. The Sheriff Clerk is now appointed by the Lord Advocate?—Yes.

56,650. And, I suppose, openly for political or personal reasons?—Probably.

56,651. You cannot appoint a Sheriff Clerk by the Civil Service examination?—No.

56,652. Now, if you wanted to break through the long-established habit by which these important posts—very important for poor people—are filled by personal or political patronage, the aid of a committee on which the Civil Service Commission was represented might be useful, might it not?—I do not think a representative of the Civil Service Commission would be much use on any committee which was to suggest the appointment of Sheriff Clerks, because nobody in the Civil Service Commission can know anything about Scottish solicitors, from whom the Sheriff Clerks are drawn.

56,653. But it is all important that he should have the will to make an appointment, uninfluenced by these traditional motives—more important than that he should have detailed knowledge. You want somebody there with the will?—I do not quite see what your point is over this. If you had this committee that was suggested—a committee by way of selecting people for no particular reason, but because they thought they were good men—I do not see how you are going to appoint any committee who knows every solicitor in every town in Scotland, and can judge of their merits for appointment to a Sheriff Clerkship when it becomes open.

56,654. Are you familiar with the corresponding problem in America?—No; I know nothing about America.

56,655. I understand, having been for some time in America and in close contact with this problem there, that there are a large number of appointments in New York which are connected with politics in precisely the same sense as in Scotland; that is to say, they are filled for political reasons. The American way of curing this is to make them Civil Service appointments—not in the sense that they are necessarily appointed by examination, but that a man, who is chosen in order to carry out the policy of indifference to political motives, is made responsible for them. Would not that rather be the effect of bringing in the Civil Service Commission, or one of its representatives, into this corresponding precisely identical system in Scotland?—Personally I do not think it would work.

Sir KENNETH MACKENZIE, Bart.

56,656. In the English Courts it has been suggested that there is so much purely routine work that a separation ought to be made between those recruited normally for the routine work of the Courts, and those recruited with the prospect of going up to more serious work. Do you think, in the similar problem in Scotland, it would be possible to make that distinction?—I should hardly think it was worth it, because you are dealing as a whole with such a small staff. You are talking of the Court of Session at the present time, and I think there are 51 people on the Estimates. I do not think you can differentiate much in a staff of 51 people.

56,657. The Principal Clerk of Session, Mr. Adam, told us yesterday that in effect there was no routine work, because the routine work was not done; that he had nobody to store or file his papers, or anything of that kind, and that the papers remained unstored and unfiled. Have you ever had that point presented to you, that the work might be more efficiently done and in a more orderly manner if there was a certain measure of routine in filing and arranging documents, for instance?—I should have thought the documents were, as a matter of fact, put away, because each Court has its own room at the Register House, and each Clerk of Court has to keep the papers.

56,658. I mean the papers he has to deal with. He said he had no one to file his documents, and he had to behave in that way as a private person would. Do you think there might be, for instance, a general register of documents in the Court with the same system of filing as there is in the English legal departments?—I must plead ignorance about the English departments, but I should not have thought that the Principal Clerk of Session had a very great deal to write or to keep. He has his own room up at the Parliament House where he can put all his papers away, if he likes, into cupboards. His correspondence certainly cannot be great.

56,659. You told us that so far not much effect had been given to the recommendations of the Committee of 1911, which dealt, in the main, with the same problems that we are dealing with, and proposed important reforms. Can you indicate to us what were the hindrances which prevented those recommendations being carried out?—I think legislation was required for a good many of the recommendations of the Committee, and those things that have been done have been done principally on the initiative of various heads of departments. For example, one of the things that that Committee recommended was that the Clerks of Justiciary should get higher pay. On the initiative of Mr. Crole, Principal Clerk of Justiciary, who attacked the Treasury time after time, they have had increases given to them. Little things like that, coinciding with the recommendations of that Committee, have been done; but other things would, of course, require legislation, and they have not been done, owing, I suppose, to there being no time to introduce legislation.

56,660. Would you say that it was not clearly anybody's business—neither quite the Treasury's business, nor quite the business of the Secretary for Scotland, nor quite the Lord Advocate's business, apparently—to carry out the scheme, and everybody has left it alone?—No; I certainly think it is the duty of the Scottish Office to do it, if anybody were to do it. You can scarcely expect the Treasury itself to take up the matter of spending more money.

56,661. (Chairman.) The Committee was appointed by the Secretary for Scotland?—Yes, the Committee was appointed by the Secretary for Scotland, and the Secretary for Scotland should do something for its recommendations or not, as he chooses.

56,662. (Mrs. Deane Streatfeild.) I want to go back to the question of the engrossing staffs in some of the offices. Supposing it were found possible to substitute typing done by women for engrossing in some cases, I gather that there would be a difficulty owing to the uneven pressure of work?—Yes.

56,663. Is there any other work of a clerical nature in these offices which could be done by an efficient staff of competent typist clerks?—No. There is only the ordinary official correspondence, for which there are regular typists in the office.

56,664. I do not mean typing, but clerical work—indexing, filing, registering. You said you thought that a male staff could not very satisfactorily undertake typing because such a staff would have very little hope of promotion. I am talking of typing paid by salary and pensionable. You said that it would be hardly satisfactory and you turned more hopefully to a female staff for that work. We had some evidence here from women employed in English offices in typing. There was just that same objection arising among the female staffs that there was little hope of outlet or promotion to the top, and it leads to an unsatisfactory condition of things and to some discontent. In our previous recommendations we suggested that there should be promotion to clerical work, apart from typing, for women who proved themselves efficient. Is there no clerical work of that sort in some of the offices you know of in Scotland which could be done by women?—I think it is rather difficult for me to answer about the interior economy of other people's departments. I can tell you that throughout most of the winter I have in my own office been employing girls to do the work of second division men as far as I could.

56,665. Did you find them do it efficiently?—Yes.

56,666. Have you had many, or only just a few?—At different times I have had a couple and sometimes three in addition to my regular typing girls, when the pressure came.

56,667. I really wanted to discuss it in the light of the difficulty that was said to arise owing to the pressure of work in summer and there being little work in winter?—That pressure must necessarily occur, whatever system you adopt. The rush of work must come into the Sasines Office after the 15th May, and then after January there must be a slack time. Whether those offices could find other clerical employment for girls at that period of the year I should doubt, but I am not in a position to tell you because they are not my offices and I really do not know.

56,668. I thought, perhaps, having thought about the question of employing typists to do engrossing, you might also have thought of some other way of employing typists during the slack season?—I did, but it was not quite to do with that question.

56,669. (Chairman.) The main part of the clerical work of these offices relates to the presentation of documents for registration and, therefore, that work would be heavy at the same time that the engrossing work was heavy?—That would be so.

56,670. So that the problem would not be entirely met, even if the typists could do clerical work as well?—That is so.

56,671. (Mrs. Deane Streatfeild.) I was thinking of a staff of competent educated women who could do clerical work?—You mean women who would be the equivalent to our second division men?

56,672. Yes?—I think you would rather waste a woman who was the equivalent of a second division man if you put her only as an engrosser in the Sasines Office.

56,673. If she only did that work, but beginning with typing, after examination, and rising according to her efficiency and capacity into something better, is what I thought might be possible?—Are you contemplating a mixed male and female staff in these offices?

56,674. No. I was thinking of a staff of women doing a certain piece of work in an office, coming in as typists and going on to a certain piece of clerical work or registration work, such as one has in some of our English offices?—Of course, there is no earthly reason why an educated woman should not be able to do this work, but she never would learn the initial part of the work while she was doing the typing, because the typing is almost mechanical and would teach her very little. It is not like the case of a man who comes into a department where, perhaps, there are three or four men senior to him and he gradually picks up from them such legal knowledge as is required in dealing with these deeds.

56,675. What sort of typing is it that they do? Is it purely simple typing from shorthand dictation?—No; in the Sasines Office it is absolutely the copying of deeds. The deeds put in are all deeds relating to the buying or selling of houses or land, or the burdens put upon them by mortgage, or marriage settlement, or anything of that sort.

Sir KENNETH MACKENZIE, Bart.

56,676. Is the handwriting of those deeds difficult to decipher, and are the terms technical?—Most of the legal offices, I think, now are going in for typewriting, and most of the deeds sent in now are typewritten. I think most of the solicitors in Edinburgh and Glasgow type all their deeds.

56,677. We had some evidence from the English offices as to the sort of typing that is done, and it appeared to vary a great deal in quality; some of it was purely mechanical, but some of it was quite different, and a woman who was capable of doing it would also be making a précis of the paper she was typing and typing that précis. She would have to know French or German and technical terms of various kinds, and would be an educated clerk. That sort of work exists, does it not, in the Scottish offices?—We are dealing with the Register House entirely.

56,678. I was dealing with the offices you have been speaking of to-day, in which engrossing work, clerical work, and registration work is done?—That is the Register House. I do not suppose such a thing as a French or German deed has ever been handed in at our Register House.

56,679. No, I was only using that as an example, which shows that the work the typist does is not purely mechanical. The typewriter is used just as she would use her pen?—Yes.

56,680. (Chairman.) The engrossing in the Sasines Office consists entirely of the copying of the complete legal documents or deeds?—That is all.

56,681. No abstracting or drafting?—No abstracting; it is purely mechanical copying. I think I see your point—that one should be able to have these rather higher educated women, employ them on typing during the summer months when there is a press of deeds that have to be copied, and then find work for them in the office after that period.

56,682. (Mrs. Deane Streetfield.) For some of them you might find work of another kind that had to be done?—Speaking without absolute knowledge, I do not think you could employ those women in the remainder of the year except in an office with men. The Sasines Office is divided into different districts of Scotland, each district has so many men, a head and a subordinate, and so many clerks belonging to it, for the purpose of registering these deeds; and, I think, for any higher work of that kind a woman would have to go into an office like that.

56,683. (Miss Haldane.) I suppose you would anticipate that the women typists would come in by competitive examination?—I think at present the pensionable typists always come in by nomination, and they qualify.

56,684. Yes, that is so at present; but in reading your précis where you say, "The subordinate clerks are non-pensionable. Probably lady typists could be introduced who could be pensionable," I thought you meant by that that the typists would do subordinate clerical work?—I was thinking there, to tell the truth, more of the men who would be engrossing in the Extractors' Office, who have very recently been put upon salary. The work that they do really is only writing out things which are told to them, and a shorthand typist could take it down from the extractor or assistant extractors and type it off very much more economically and, probably, more accurately.

56,685. We have been told that one objection to bringing in a female clerical staff is that certain legal qualifications are required; but, according to what you have said, you do not think these qualifications are really necessary, and that a person might come in without them?—I think in a good many places a person might come in without a legal qualification; but there is this difficulty to remember in our Scottish offices, that the personnel of the whole thing is so small that you are faced with the extreme difficulty always of having girls and men in the one room.

56,686. But that is a difficulty which can easily be got over with a little organisation. We have had that difficulty brought forward in evidence right through, very frequently; but it is, I suppose, really a matter of arrangement, and usually, if it is desired, it can be arranged for?—I have seen a certain amount of it. Girls are getting so much now into private legal offices in Edinburgh, and I must say I do not think it very satisfactory.

56,687. Of course, just now particularly, there is a great extension of that employment of women?—It is even more now, but before the war I remember it was the case in several offices that I have been into, where I do not think it is quite a satisfactory arrangement.

56,688. We have not had any evidence about private offices yet, but have heard a great deal said in favour of it privately?—I can only speak from what I have seen.

56,689. With regard to the macers, and so on, they are not all necessarily ex-soldiers or sailors?—Not necessarily. One of the macers is appointed by Lord Bute.

56,690. But the other messengers, and so on, are, I suppose, usually ex-soldiers or sailors?—Yes.

56,691. Right through the offices?—All the permanent messengers and people like that about the courts.

56,692. (Sir John Kempe.) You are in favour of employing clerks of the type of the second division for the Court of Session?—Yes.

56,693. Do you include the Register House departments?—I think we must deal with them rather differently. The Court of Session is one thing and the Register House is another thing.

56,694. You do not think second division clerks good enough for the Register House departments. The salaries in the Register House are higher than the second division salaries?—Yes; but that is because of the present system. They have to have so much legal qualification before they come in, and they are called first and second class clerks instead of the second division.

56,695. Are you in favour of second division clerks for the Register House?—Yes; I favour the open competitive examination for all.

56,696. That is to say, you think a lower salary would be good enough for the clerical part of this establishment?—Initially, certainly. The clerk rises, of course.

56,697. In Scotland are the second division selected from Scotland?—No, not necessarily. The Civil Service Commissioners appoint a man who passes in the examination to wherever they like. If he is a Scotchman he probably applies to get a transfer to a Scottish office, if he can.

56,698. You had experience in the Local Government Board, where they do employ second division clerks, and you can compare those with the clerks employed in the legal departments. Do you see a difference between the two classes in the type of men?—I think myself that the second division clerk of to-day is as good a young man as you want to get. He passes a very high competitive examination, and, personally, I have never had the ill-luck to have a bad one yet, and I have passed a good many through my office now.

56,699. You have them in your own office?—Yes.

56,700. You have had no experience of the actual work in legal offices?—No.

56,701. You have not been able directly to see how the clerks work in those offices?—No.

56,702. Still you are satisfied that the second division clerks would do?—I have often been down to these offices in the Register House and looked into the offices and seen what is going on, just to familiarise myself with whether they are working or whether they are not.

56,703. Do you get men from the Universities in the second division in Scotland?—The university man is a Class I. man.

56,704. But I thought, perhaps, in Scotland you got a higher class man competing in the second division. Is it all one competition; and is there no separate Scottish competition?—No, the second division is for the whole kingdom.

56,705. (Mr. Matheson.) I gather that you think that the whole staff might be supplied by open competition except the Principal Clerk?—Yes, I think it is an advantage to have the head of your department brought from somewhere else.

Sir KENNETH MACKENZIE, Bart.

56,706. As regards the rest of the staff, they could acquire what legal knowledge was required in the office?—I think so. It is only my personal opinion. I do not want to press it at all.

56,707. I only wanted to get clear that that was your opinion?—That is my personal opinion.

56,708. (Chairman.) When speaking of the consolidation of the offices of the Court of Session, we did not mention the two departments of the Auditor and Accountant of Court. How would you deal with those?—The Accountant of Court takes in all the Bankruptcy money and things of that sort, and the money he does not pay out he hands over to me at the end of seven years. He has a staff of so many permanent men, and has an allowance of, I think, 1,100*l.* a year for clerical assistance.

56,709. To whom is he responsible at present?—He is responsible, I suppose, to the Court for the keeping of the money, and then he is responsible to me for handing it over at the end of seven years.

56,710. For the discipline of that office is he responsible to anybody?—I should think he is responsible to himself and not responsible to anybody, unless to the Court of Session. He is an officer of the Court, of course.

56,711. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) Is it understood that his office and that of his staff is, in the American sense, "in politics," and is part of a patronage system, or is there any precaution against that?—His permanent staff are Civil servants, so it cannot be patronage. His other clerical staff, no doubt, he appoints himself, and he himself is probably appointed by the Lord Advocate.

56,712. (Chairman.) Does he hold a Crown appointment?—I think so. I rather think that on the occurrence of a vacancy the salary of the Accountant of Court might, perhaps, be reduced a little.

56,713. But would you leave him as at present responsible only to the Court and not in any way under the Principal Clerk of Session?—Yes, I think he must be independent. I do not think you can mix him up. With regard to the consolidated service, I do not think either the Accountant of Court or the Auditor of Court could go under the Principal Clerk of Session; they would have to be separate. The Auditor of Court is a taxing officer.

56,714. The Auditor of Court being a solicitor in practice on his own account, there might be difficulty in placing him under the Principal Clerk of Session?—The Auditor has to do all the work sent him by the Court, but he also has a large private business of his own, which, of course, means that when he gets the appointment of Auditor of Court necessarily a lot of people take their work to him. It gives him a chance of getting more work.

56,715. Does he do any work as a law agent apart from the taxing work that he does?—I should think not. I should think he is pretty fully occupied. He has a very big private business.

56,716. The Auditor of the Court does business of various kinds, part of it sent to him by the Court and part of it coming to him privately?—Yes.

56,717. Is there also business which comes to him from Government offices, but which is not sent to him by the Court?—Yes.

56,718. In the case of that business is he entitled to charge private fees for it?—Yes, he is entitled to charge fees.

56,719. He is a salaried officer of the Government?—He is.

56,720. Would not it be fitting that he should perform all the work sent to him officially, whether from the Court or from public departments, without charging separate fees for it?—I think so, even if his salary had to be raised.

Mr. GERALD LAKE CROLE, K.C. (Principal Clerk of Justiciary), called and examined.

56,721. (Chairman.) You are the Principal Clerk of Justiciary?—Yes.

56,722. And you are a King's Counsel?—Yes.

56,723. How long have you held the office of Principal Clerk of Justiciary?—23 years.

56,724. You gave evidence before the Committee over which Lord Salvesen presided in 1910?—I did.

56,725. The Commission have before them the Report and proceedings of that Committee, and they find there a very complete and detailed account of the Court and its procedure, and the functions of your office in connection with the Court?—Yes; my office as Principal Clerk was not within the purview of that Committee, I may say, but my evidence was directed towards the duty of my two subordinates.

56,726. Having that evidence before them it will be unnecessary for the Commission now to go in detail into the matters with which you dealt there regarding the procedure of the Court, and so forth; but it may be convenient to recall the nature of the sittings of the Court of Justiciary at which you and your officers have to assist. The Court sits sometimes in Edinburgh, and also holds circuit Courts in other parts of Scotland?—It does.

56,727. How often does it sit in Edinburgh?—It sits when required as a purely criminal Court. The sittings are fixed under requisition by the Lord Advocate. The Lord Advocate puts in a requisition which is lodged in my office—which is just a letter asking the Court to fix a day for the trial of criminal causes—and the Court either fixes the day asked or fixes a day which is convenient for itself.

56,728. In practice, can you say what length of time the sittings in Edinburgh occupy in a year?—It varies very much indeed. I should explain that Edinburgh is the centre for the trial of all criminal or serious criminal cases in the three Lothians, Peebles, and the Orkneys and Shetlands, but it has a universal jurisdiction over the whole of Scotland and, in practice, the serious cases, likely to last two or three days, are tried in Edinburgh; so that when there is a big case in one year the lengths of the sittings vary very much indeed. In other years, when there is no big case, so many days are not occupied. Prisoners who plead guilty at various towns in Scotland are sometimes remitted, and their cases are all taken at the High Court in Edinburgh, and that occasions sittings of, I would not like to say off-hand, how many days. Then, as you are aware, the Court sits as a Court of Appeal from the Sheriffs, the Justices of Peace, and the Police Courts. I should say that the sittings in Edinburgh would vary from 30 to 65 days in the year.

56,729. Do the sittings on circuit occupy a longer or a shorter time than that?—There are six circuits in Glasgow, and I take them on an average of two days. There are two courts in Glasgow, so that would be 24 days. I should think it would be 50 days on circuit, but I would not like to say that is accurate.

56,730. It is a rough estimate?—Yes, it is a rough estimate.

56,731. What is the staff of your office?—I have two assistant clerks. They do the circuit work, and, when they are away on circuit, the Treasury supplies me with money to have an extra clerk. Over and above that I have a man in training. I have 50*l.* a year granted by the Treasury to train a man who might take the circuit work in case of emergency if one of the clerks was ill.

56,732. The Committee of 1911 made certain recommendations regarding the salaries of your staff?—Yes.

56,733. Have those been carried into effect?—Yes, they have been carried into effect.

56,734. Is your own appointment a Crown appointment?—Yes.

56,735. Made on the recommendation of the Lord Advocate?—Yes, or the Secretary for Scotland.

56,736. How are your staff appointed?—They have Civil Service certificates. They are nominated by me approved of by the Lord Advocate, examined by the Civil Service Commissioners, and, if the nominee is found to be qualified, he receives a Civil Service certificate.

20 May 1915.]

MR. GERALD LAKE CROLE, K.C.

56,737. What is the nature of the examination?—He is examined in general knowledge and in criminal law and practice, the last examination being of a severe character.

56,738. The examination in criminal law and practice really tests his knowledge in those matters?—Yes, I think it is a very testing examination, so far as I have seen it.

56,739. (Mr. Boutwood.) When you say "assistant clerk," you do not mean anything like the assistant clerk that we have in the English Civil Service?—No.

56,740. (Chairman.) You also have three macers?—Yes.

56,741. By whom are they appointed?—By the Crown. Also the Royal Trumpeters who are attached to the court.

56,742. Are they appointed by the Crown?—They are appointed by the Crown.

56,743. Will you describe briefly your own duties and the duties of your staff. In the first place you have certain duties involving actual attendance in court. What are they?—I attend at the High Court in Edinburgh. The duties of the principal clerk of the court in Edinburgh and on circuit are to call the jury, swear the jury, read the indictments—

56,744. You are not responsible for drawing the indictments?—No. The Lord Advocate is responsible for drawing the indictments. Then we minute the procedure, the sederunt of the Court, and the proceedings of the first diet—there are two diets in our practice. The prisoner is first brought up before the Sheriff, when he is asked to plead. If he pleads not guilty, he is remitted to the High Court for trial; if he pleads guilty, he is remitted to the High Court for sentence. The trial proceeds, and the clerk minutes what has taken place in the court below, and then he notes the names of the jurymen, the names of all the witnesses, and also any incidental motions such as may be made by counsel for the prisoner or the Crown. Then he minutes the verdict of the jury, and he writes and signs the sentence of the judge, excepting in capital cases, where he writes and minutes the capital sentences and the judge signs them.

56,745. He is responsible, in fact, for the proper record of the whole of the proceedings of the Court, including the sentences?—Yes.

56,746. Do your assistant clerks perform similar duties with respect to the Circuit Courts?—Yes; they perform precisely similar duties. In the High Court I should say the cases are usually heavier. As I said, the serious cases go there, and that means that the productions which are produced per list with the indictments are very much more numerous, sometimes going into hundreds, and the practice of the High Court is that the principal clerk is in charge of those productions, and sees that they are handed to the witnesses at the proper time and with as little delay as possible. At the Circuit Court it is impossible for the circuit clerk to attend to the productions if they are at all numerous. I have the assistance of the assistant clerks at the High Court, but the circuit clerk has no such assistance, and the practice there is for the Procurator Fiscal's man to assist him with the productions or he would never be able to perform his duties. The practice of the High Court sitting in Edinburgh is that these productions, for which I may say I am entirely responsible, do not leave my hands except for the hands of the witnesses.

56,747. (Lord Dundas.) When you say the High Court you mean the Justiciary Court in Edinburgh?—Yes.

56,748. (Chairman.) Do the operations of recording and drafting sentences which are performed by you and your assistants involve much technical and legal knowledge?—Yes, the judge is primarily responsible for the sentence, but of course the sentences vary very much, and the judge very often asks the clerk what is the appropriate sentence in a particular case, and the clerk should be able to give the judge such assistance as he may require.

56,749. The clerk naturally has great knowledge of the precedents in such matters?—Yes. I have made out for the last 40 years a list of precedents for the assistance of the judge, so that if a case comes up I am able to put into his hands a list of previous sentences in similar cases—probably some of his own sentences—for the purpose of keeping the sentences as uniform as possible.

56,750. Besides the work in Court you have office work?—Yes.

56,751. What is the nature of that work?—First, preparation for the trials. As I have explained, for the sittings in Edinburgh, the requisition comes to me and then I instruct a Sheriff Clerk to prepare a list of jurors, which is sent to me; whereupon I give out warrants for the Crown, citing witnesses and prisoners to the court; these are in preparation for the trials. The details are pretty numerous, I may say, and I have detailed them all pretty fully in my précis of evidence, and I would like to refer to that.

56,752. Are the office duties which are performed by you and your staff stated in detail in your evidence before Lord Salvesen's Committee in 1910?—They are.

56,753. The Commission have that evidence before them?—I should say that the records of the Justiciary Court go back to the year 1493. They are of great literary interest, and there are a great many calls from the outside public to see these records.

56,754. Are those records in your charge?—They are.

56,755. All the records of the Court of Session are under the custody of the Deputy Clerk Register?—They are.

56,756. What is the reason for a different treatment of the records of the Court of Justiciary?—The Deputy Clerk Register is an official of the Court of Session, and he is entrusted by that Court with the custody of its records. On the other hand, the Clerk of Justiciary is an official of the High Court of Justiciary and has been from time immemorial appointed by that Court custodian of its records. These records are in continual use in our office, but not the very ancient ones. A prisoner may have oftentimes been convicted, and the Crown applies to me for extracts of these convictions, so that I must have the records at hand to find out when the man was convicted and give an extract of them.

56,757. That would not apply to records say, more than 50 years old?—No, but the ancient records have always been kept by the Clerk of Justiciary. His office used to be at the Register House, where the Deputy Clerk Register is, but there is a safe in his present office consisting of three rooms which used to be the Union Bank safe, and the records are probably as safe there as they could be anywhere. The ancient records are required for preparing reports to the Court on points of law and practice. (See my evidence to Committee of 1911, Appendix to Report, page 40.)

56,758. Are they accessible to the public?—Yes, on paying certain dues which the Exchequer demands. The public cannot rummage through the safe, of course. If they ask for a particular record it is brought up from the safe, and the clerk shows it. More often, seeing that it is written in very archaic writing, and most of the public are quite unfamiliar with the writing, they ask the clerk to give a translation from it, and that is one reason why the qualifications of an assistant clerk are of a different character from those of an ordinary clerk. Some of these documents are written in Latin, and the writing is very difficult to read, being the old archaic Scotch writing, and it takes a very considerable time to get up to the writing. Each clerk had his own contractions, and, after you master those of one who had been there perhaps for ten years, you land on another totally different set of contractions, and as the writing is very minute it is very difficult to read, and it is only constant practice that gets a man up to it.

56,759. Do you consider that the present system of appointment works satisfactorily?—I do.

56,760. You do not suggest any change in it?—I do not. As regards my own office, the Crown appoints, as I have said, and as regards the two assistant clerks, I think the principal clerk having the nomination would always take care that the right men should be nominated, and as he has a clerk in training for the office, he will nominate the clerk whom he has carefully trained for the position.

Mr. GERALD LAKE CROLE, K.C.

56,761. That system of a clerk in training has the double advantage of giving you a substitute in case of illness or emergency, and also a man who, when appointed, will be capable at once of undertaking the work of the office?—Precisely.

56,762. The discipline of your small staff is entirely in your own hands, I suppose?—Yes.

56,763. Have you the power of dismissal?—I do not think I have the power of dismissal. I have the power of suspension.

56,764. With whom does the power of dismissal rest?—I think the power of dismissal would rest, after report by me, with the Lord Justice-General.

56,765. The occasion has never arisen for such a drastic procedure?—Never arisen in my time.

56,766. What are the ordinary office hours?—10 to 4 are the office hours; but the Court sits very much longer occasionally, and when the Court sits the clerks must be there at 9 o'clock to prepare for the Court meeting—that is, the High Court in Edinburgh. Of course, when they go on circuit the assistant clerks must be down at the court in good time to take over the work.

56,767. Does the work occupy the whole time of the clerks?—Yes.

56,768. And your own time?—It practically does. I am not supposed to give my whole time, I understand, but I have found that the work of the office, getting the first of my time, practically occupies my whole time, because it breaks up each day. I am there daily and I am at the call of the judges during the whole day. I think if the principal clerk does his work personally, as he now must do to do it efficiently, you may say that it practically takes his whole time.

56,769. Practically you have not any other legal work?—Not now, no.

56,770. The question has been raised of whether it is desirable to consolidate the various offices of the Court of Session, and, if that is done, whether the offices of the Court of Justiciary should be amalgamated with the offices of the Court of Session, or whether it is necessary to keep them separate, as they are at present. What is your opinion on that question?—I am of opinion that they should be kept separate. As you are aware, the jurisdiction of the two courts is quite distinct—the High Court of Justiciary having a criminal jurisdiction and the Court of Session having a civil jurisdiction. The only connection between the two courts is, that the judges are now the same; they used not to be; but, after 1887, they are now the same; but that really is the only connection. The jurisdiction is different and the work is totally different. The work of a depute and assistant clerk of Session differs entirely from the work they would have to be put to if they came into my department. As I have stated in my précis, it was once tried, and the 1870 Commission recommended that it should be tried. The Act of 1887 by Section 73 provided that the depute clerks of Session should take the circuit work along with the first assistant clerk of Justiciary. This was found to be an unsuitable arrangement, so far as the depute clerks of Session were concerned, and really I found that it was tending to such inefficiency that I reported the matter to the Court, and the result was that the Act of 1898 was passed, which abolished that system and put the circuit work on the two assistant clerks of Justiciary. I should think that it would not tend to efficiency if that system of amalgamation were adopted. It would be difficult to adopt as regards salaries; the Justiciary Office would only get a very junior man from the Court of Session to accept office as assistant clerk of Justiciary; he would come in there totally without any knowledge of anything but his own Court of Session work and an ordinary clerk's work, and he would have to take a Circuit Court, probably almost at once. I could not certify him as competent to do so, and it might end in a very serious state of matters owing to the mistakes he would make, and would be bound to make. I therefore think it would not be a good system. You might as well take a clerk from the Register House, or the Exchequer Office, so far as knowledge of the work goes.

56,771. In fact, the work is so entirely different in kind, and so technical in its nature, that it requires a separate education to perform it?—Precisely.

56,772. (Sir John Kempe.) You say you have a clerk whom you train up to take the place of an assistant clerk. How is he trained? Does he attend the Court?—He attends the office in the first place, and he does a good deal of the drudgery of the office, which he must commence to do in order to get a foundation for his training. He then comes with me to the High Court of Justiciary sitting in Edinburgh; and after he has been doing that for a little time I send him with one of the circuit clerks to the circuit towns. In that way he gets accustomed to the work. I should say that it requires a man of some nerve to do the work, because I have attempted to train certain men who, on account of their disposition, were unable to continue. In the case of a capital sentence I have had the experience of a clerk totally breaking down when he was called upon to write the sentence, and who, therefore, was useless for my purpose.

56,773. Does it take the whole time of this man in training?—No, it does not.

56,774. He only comes now and then?—Yes.

56,775. And he only gets 50*l.* a year?—Yes.

56,776. I suppose that system would be only applicable to your particular office; the same kind of system could not be applied in other places for training up clerks. With regard to the difficulty of clerks learning their work, would it be possible to have men training, say, in the Register House?—It might be possible, but I do not think that for the nature of the work they get in the Register House it is necessary to train a man. He comes in there as a very junior man in the Register House and rises up. That is not the class of man I require. I require a trained man immediately to take on important work.

56,777. There is no inferior work; he has to learn the work and has to go straight into it?—Yes.

56,778. (Mr. Matheson.) Is this man you are training up someone out of a writer's office?—He is a solicitor. In fact, I may say that the man at present in training is the Lord Justice General's clerk and the Keeper of the Rolls of the Court of Session. He used to be in the Crown Office, and he came at an early stage, many years ago, when he was a young man, voluntarily to the office when there was no allowance, in order to be trained, and, of course, now he is quite a valuable man.

56,779. Has he the full qualifications of a solicitor?—Yes.

56,780. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) You have two macers at 175*l.* a year. One of them is apparently an ex-soldier. What was the other before he was appointed?—He was a clerk in the Register House.

56,781. Why did it pay him to take a post as macer?—He was a clerk in the Register House and then he was in the Lord Advocate's Department later as a messenger. He was a man of somewhat delicate health, and, as I understand, the constant sitting and writing in the Register House did not suit him—he was a copyist really—and he got the appointment of messenger in the Lord Advocate's Office, and from there he was appointed to be macer in the High Court.

56,782. Was he an engrosser originally or a clerk?—He was an engrosser, I think.

56,783. Macers receive a shilling from each witness, do not they?—No; that is all abolished.

56,784. Is it abolished throughout Scotland?—It is abolished in my department. There are no fees of any kind except those paid in Law Court Stamps, which are accounted to the Exchequer. In old times it was a different matter, and I had occasion, when the fees were being altered, to inquire into it. At that time the Lord Justice General was paid by fees which were collected from the prisoners in a tin pot which was handed round the dock by the macers.

56,785. Are you sure that these fees do not exist in any of the Scotch Courts?—It is the Supreme Criminal Court that I can speak for. I know the Bar officer in the Sheriff Court gets fees.

20 May 1915.]

MR. GERALD LAKE CROLE, K.C.

56,786. Do your assistant clerks get any fees for translating Latin documents, and so on?—No; the fees are charged by them, but are accounted for to the Exchequer.

56,787. Accounted by stamps?—By stamps.

56,788. You told us that the nominee for the post of assistant clerk is required to pass an examination in general knowledge and in criminal law and procedure. Who sets the questions in that examination?—The Civil Service Commissioners.

56,789. It is done formally by the Civil Service Commissioners at Edinburgh?—No; I report to the Civil Service Commissioners in London that the Lord Advocate has approved of my nominee, and they appoint an examiner to examine him in Edinburgh, as a rule.

56,790. (Lord Dundas.) The Court of Justiciary in Scotland has, historically, all along been quite distinct from the Court of Session?—It has.

56,791. I think there are special Acts of the old Scots Parliament constituting and regulating the Court of Justiciary?—There are; especially the Act of Charles II., which your lordship will remember, which not only regulates its duties, but regulates the dress to be worn.

56,792. And the dress is substantially preserved now?—It is, and the Act is in full force.

56,793. You have said, I think, that the criminal procedure is totally different from the civil procedure in Scotland?—It is.

56,794. When the judges of the Civil Court resolve to make regulations, they pass Acts of Sederunt. When the criminal judges perform a like task, they make Acts of Adjournal?—They do.

56,795. The two separate sets of Acts are kept in different books and by different officials?—Yes; and the Acts of Adjournal are drafted by the principal clerk.

56,796. Down to 1887 all the civil judges were not members of the Criminal Court?—No.

56,797. Until that date, I think, the criminal judges were the Lord Justice General, the Lord Justice Clerk, and five other judges, who were called Commissioners of Justiciary?—That is so.

56,798. Since 1887 the whole of the 13 civil judges are also criminal judges, and act as such?—Yes.

56,799. Is it the case that when a judge is appointed to the Bench the degree of his experience in criminal matters varies considerably according to the nature of his practice at the Bar?—It is.

56,800. Some of the judges on appointment being much more familiar than others with criminal matters and criminal procedure?—Yes.

56,801. Does the existence of the present system since 1887 make it, in your opinion, all the more necessary that the clerks of Justiciary should be persons well furnished with knowledge and experience of the criminal procedure?—That is so.

56,802. Is it within your knowledge that the clerks do afford in practice valuable assistance to the judges in the performance of their duties?—I think so.

56,803. You have expressed the view, I understand, that it would not be desirable, if feasible, to make the Court of Justiciary staff part of one consolidated office including the Court of Session staff and others?—Yes.

56,804. You mentioned, I think, that something of the sort had been attempted and had failed?—Yes.

56,805. Is it the case that by the Criminal Law Procedure (Scotland) Act 1887, as amended by the Act of 1889, it was provided that the duties of circuit clerk should be performed by a first assistant clerk of Justiciary and a depute clerk of Session in rotation?—That is so.

56,806. Was that system given a trial in practice?—It was, down to the year 1898.

56,807. And was it found that so far as the depute clerks of Session were concerned it was quite unsatisfactory?—It was.

56,808. And it was therefore remedied?—It was. The Act was introduced by the Lord Advocate, Mr. Graham Murray, now Lord Dunedin.

56,809. Are the functions performed by the civil clerks in regard to the interlocutors of the court really quite different from the functions of the criminal clerks in regard to their duties?—They are.

56,810. When a prisoner is convicted by a jury and sentenced by a judge, who is it that prepares the document recording that conviction and that sentence?—The principal clerk or the circuit clerk.

56,811. On circuit by the assistant clerk who is sitting at the table.

56,812. It is only in the case of a death sentence that the judge ever signs a paper on the matter at all?—That is so.

56,813. Then if either the principal clerk or his assistants were not thoroughly up to their business, it is pretty obvious, is it not, that there might be a very gross miscarriage of justice, through some mistake in the preparation of the document recording the sentence and conviction?—That is so.

56,814. I see that the Report of Lord Salvesen's Committee alludes to assistant clerks of Justiciary, and I notice it says that the duties of these officials are of a highly responsible nature, and they cannot be performed by any man who has not specially been trained to the work. Their office duties are of a very varied and responsible nature. Do you agree with that?—I do.

56,815. The Report goes on, after strongly recommending a rise of the existing salaries, to say that their duties—that is, the duties of the assistant clerks—“are more arduous than those of the depute and “assistant clerks of Session, and it is far more important that they should possess a thorough knowledge “of procedure.” And, again, after developing the subject, they say: “All this necessitates that the “assistant clerks of Justiciary should be experts in “criminal procedure.” Do you agree with those expressions of opinion?—I do agree.

56,816. Do you think that in practice the Principal Clerk of Session could possibly perform the duties of the Principal Clerk of Justiciary in addition to his own duties, even if he had criminal experience sufficient?—I should not think so. I think it would be impossible for him to give sufficient time to perform the duties efficiently. Of course, the duties might be performed in a way, but they certainly could not be performed efficiently according to my experience.

56,817. Even if the Principal Clerk of Session had somehow acquired the requisite knowledge of criminal procedure?—Yes.

56,818. And from the ordinary antecedents of a Principal Clerk of Session, is it to your mind conceivable that he should have obtained those requisites?—I should think not.

56,819. Do you find that practically the duties of your own office occupy what one may fairly call your whole time?—They do.

56,820. I see in your précis there is a passage which I should like to put to you. You say you are permitted by the Lord Justice General to say that, “in his opinion, “the business for which the Principal Clerk of Justiciary is responsible is conducted with perfect efficiency, “and that his lordship is unable to suggest any point “of possible improvement.” Is that correct?—That is correct; and it was given to me in writing, which I am quite willing to hand to the Commission.

Lord Dundas: I do not think that necessary.

56,821. (Chairman.) Does the ordinary Civil Service as regards the age of retirement apply to your assistant clerks?—Yes; and I would like to mention, if you would allow me, that I propose in my précis that these rules should be varied. According to the present rules they must be more than 25 years on appointment, and they must retire at 65. I venture to suggest that nominees should only be solicitors of five years' standing, whose age does not exceed 40, and that the maximum age for retirement should be 70. I suggest that for certain reasons. In the first place there is the difficulty of getting a suitable man. I have in my mind a trained man who may have been under training for 10 years, and because he is six months over 35 he would be out of it and would not be eligible for nomination. I think that would be a hardship. These clerks must enter the Service at a greater age than the ordinary Civil servant.

20 May 1915.]

Mr. GERALD LAKE CROLE, K.C.

Therefore, I think, the maximum time for retirement should be 70, in order that they may have served a sufficient time to get a decent pension. I understand that the rule in the Court of Session is 70, and I think it should be 70 in my office also.

56,822. Does your warrant of appointment fix any age for retirement?—No; my commission is a sign manual commission, and there is no age fixed. I hold office ad vitam aut culpam.

56,823. In the case of future appointments to your own office, do you think that the appropriate method would be to promote one of your assistants or to make an appointment from outside?—That is a question of the man who might be senior assistant clerk. There might be such a man who would be suitable to take the office, but you will keep in view that the men who have been appointed to this office hitherto have generally been advocates of a certain standing at the Bar, never less than 10 years; in fact, in old times, there was a judge of the Court of Session appointed to the office, showing that it was looked upon as an important office in those days. It has certain responsibilities which, I think, could be best filled by a member of the Bar, and I think it would be more agreeable to the Court if the principal clerk was a member of the Bar. There was one case in which promotion did take place—the case of Mr. Neaves in 1857, the father of the late Lord Neaves, who was the depute clerk, and who was appointed to the office; but that is the only case I know of, and it was an exceptional case. I may say that my predecessor was 27 years at the Bar before he was appointed.

56,824. You mentioned that special knowledge of procedure is necessary for your assistants, and a fortiori for yourself. Would an advocate who had not had anything to do with the actual work of your office be familiar with those matters?—An advocate is more familiar with criminal matters than a member of the solicitor branch of the profession, because he has to go circuit according to the unwritten rules of the Faculty. When he first joins the Bar, for three years he is engaged in criminal work, and he gets a certain knowledge of the work from that. Then, afterwards, when he gets to a certain seniority, he is appointed by the Faculty, each advocate in turn, counsel for the poor in criminal causes, and there again he gets additional training. Of course, the more minute and technical parts of the work can only be learnt by practice and by study; but, undoubtedly, an advocate having been engaged in criminal trials, as he must be, has a good chance of learning the procedure of the High Court of Justiciary.

Mr. RALPH RICHARDSON, W.S. (Commissary Clerk of Edinburgh), called and examined.

56,825. (Chairman.) You are Commissary Clerk of Edinburgh?—Yes.

56,826. How long have you held that office?—32 years.

56,827. What was your experience before you were appointed commissary clerk?—I was Writer to the Signet for 14 years in active practice in Edinburgh.

56,828. Do you hold your appointment from the Crown?—Yes, under the Act of 4. George IV, chapter 97, Section 5—the Act of 1823.

56,829. Will you tell us what the work of the Commissary Office is?—The work of the Edinburgh Commissary Office, which dates from 1563, founded by Mary Stuart, consists of the granting of titles to movable estate of persons who have (1) died domiciled in the County of Edinburgh; or (2) without any fixed or known domicile except that the same was in Scotland; and (3) of persons who have died domiciled furth of Scotland with estate in Scotland; (4) the re-sealing of English and Irish grants of probate and letters of administration to make them effective to deal with estate in Scotland; and (5) the re-sealing of grants of probate and letters of administration under the Colonial Probates Act, 1892.

56,830. You have therefore documents coming to you from many different parts of the world?—Quite so. We are much in the position of the principal probate registries of London and Dublin. In fact the word "Commissary" is the Scotch term for the English "Probate Registry."

56,831. Is the procedure in dealing with wills which come to you similar to the English procedure?—No, it is not similar. I do not profess to know the English law, but I understand there is a Probate Court, and it comes before them to prove the will. We in our office simply find out the executors' names to the best of our ability, and the Sheriff gives authority for those executors to act.

56,832. Before giving that authority, have you to examine the validity of the will?—Yes, and finding out if the will distinctly states certain names. We then distinguish them as "executors." Of course, if there is any difficulty, it is always referred to the Sheriff of the county.

56,833. You have to see that the will is legally executed?—Of course.

56,834. What record is made of the will in your office or elsewhere?—We keep a copy of the will, which is afterwards officially as good as the original, but we give away the will; we do not keep it.

56,835. You return the original?—Quite so. The original can be registered in the Register House of Scotland if they want it for preservation, but our copy is simply to enable people to get official copies if they want them.

56,836. Is the copy which you keep made by your own staff, or is a copy sent in with the will?—It is made by our own staff. It is all typed now.

56,837. Are the copies bound in volumes?—Yes.

56,838. And preserved in your office?—Quite so, and can be seen by any member of the public on payment of one shilling or so.

56,839. Can you tell me what the practice is in the case of wills presented in the Sheriff Courts in other parts of Scotland?—No.

56,840. Are official copies of the wills retained by the Sheriff Court?—I have no doubt it is so.

56,841. Have you also to publish a calendar for the whole of Scotland?—Yes. The annual publication under the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act of 1876 of the Calendar of Confirmations and Inventories for the whole of Scotland is prepared by the Commissary Clerk of Edinburgh, compiled from the returns furnished to him every quarter by the various Sheriff Clerks throughout Scotland. Similar volumes are prepared for England and Ireland respectively by principal probate registrars of London and Dublin.

56,842. What is the staff of your office?—The staff of the Commissary Office consists of myself and a deputy, both appointed in terms of the 5th Section of the Act 4. George IV, chapter 97 (1823), a first clerk, and other eight clerks, assisted by four female typists.

56,843. The duties of those clerks are the carrying out of the various operations which you have described?—Yes.

56,844. The receipt of the wills, the recording, the copying, and issuing the confirmation?—Quite so.

56,845. Is the copying of the wills done entirely by the four female typists whom you mentioned?—Not entirely. All the clerks can type.

56,846. Some of them are employed on typing copies of the wills?—Yes, certainly. They can all type.

56,847. Does that apply also in the case of copies which are applied for by members of the public?—Yes, certainly. They would get official typed copies.

56,848. Those copies would be typed sometimes by the female typists and sometimes by the male clerks?—Quite so.

56,849. How are your clerks appointed?—By myself.

56,850. Are they pensionable?—No.

56,851. Have they any fixed age limit for retirement?—No.

20 May 1915.]

Mr. RALPH RICHARDSON, W.S.

56,852. What happens when they reach an advanced age and become somewhat past their work?—Curiously enough I have never had experience of that. The most distinguished man that was ever in our office, Mr. Currie, who wrote the great book on "Executors in Scotland," was over 50 years in the office, and he remained there till his death. He was my deputy for some time. I have never had experience of senility amongst my clerks.

56,853. Your staff appears to be a comparatively young one at present?—I think so.

56,854. Apart from your deputy, is it the case that the oldest clerk is at present 53 years of age?—That is so. I have handed in a document detailing the names, ages, and duties of the clerks, what their duties were when they entered the office, and what they are now.

56,855. What system do you follow in making appointments? Do you select men with previous legal experience?—Yes, I have done that—those with experience in the Scottish law offices.

56,856. Do you consider that the present system is satisfactory?—I mean the system under which clerks are appointed by yourself, having no Civil Service status and no pension system?—Of course, I have had no experience of the Civil Service. I never was under it, so I do not know what it implies, but I have had no trouble with my clerks in any way, and the public seem perfectly satisfied with the office—I am perfectly satisfied as to that.

56,857. How are the salaries of your clerks fixed?—When they start, we try to get them at a reasonable figure and then they gradually increase as the years go on. Say they start at about 60*l.* a year, they rise to 95*l.*, 100*l.*, 125*l.*, 145*l.*, 165*l.*, 270*l.*, and so on by years and by merit combined.

56,858. Who fixes their salaries?—I am supposed to fix them, but it is done, of course, with the assistance of my deputy, and almost invariably with the consent of the clerks themselves. I have never had any disputes about salaries with them.

56,859. Have you any limit of the total sum that you can spend in salaries?—The expenses of the office are paid by an annual Parliamentary grant, which amounts to about 2,600*l.*, and out of that we pay the expenses for the clerks' salaries.

56,860. How is that total sum fixed?—By Parliament. It has been paid for a long time.

56,861. Does it appear in the Estimates?—Yes, under the head of Commissary Clerk of Edinburgh.

56,862. The Commissary Clerk, Midlothian?—Yes.

56,863. Your allowance for your deputy and clerks is 1,770*l.* per annum, according to the Estimates for 1916?—Yes.

56,864. Have you entire freedom as to the manner in which that sum is distributed between your deputy and your clerks?—To a large extent. You must remember that I am in very close connection with the Exchequer, which is the office immediately next to mine—the representatives of the Treasury in Scotland—and as they audit my accounts once a month, they see everything that is going on, and they could perfectly well check anything. I do not take very many steps without consulting the Exchequer.

56,865. And the total sum is fixed by the Treasury, I presume, in consultation with you?—Quite so.

56,866. Do you consider that the present system should be continued, or that the staff should be made Civil servants?—I do not know what the Civil Service means, so I have a difficulty there. I am in favour of their getting pensions, of course, there is no doubt about that; and if you can arrange to give them larger salaries I shall be delighted. This matter was thoroughly threshed out by the Treasury a few years ago, and Sir Reginald McLeod, who was then representative of the Treasury in Scotland, came down and examined each clerk individually, and the result was that the petition at that time was not granted. Mr. Mowatt was the Secretary to the Treasury then, and there was a long correspondence on the matter. The Treasury then said that they had formed certain rules about law offices being placed upon fixed allowances, and they did not feel inclined to make any diversion from that;

but you will find these statements in the Treasury Minutes.

56,867. The Commission have received a representation from the clerks in your office, dated 5th June, 1912. Have you seen that document?—Yes.

56,868. They state: "In consequence of the Commissary Office never having been established under the Civil Service, the staff are placed in a manifestly unfair position as compared with the staffs of the Principal Probate Registries of London and Dublin. The salaries we receive are much lower than the salaries paid in either of these establishments; they do not advance by gradual increments to a maximum, any increase of salary being entirely dependent on such vacancies as may occur in the office from time to time; and, moreover, we have no prospect of a pension on retirement," and they ask that those matters should be remedied. Have you any observations to make on that representation?—I have simply to repeat that I should be delighted if they got pensions and higher salaries; but, as to the details of the Civil Service, I am ignorant of them, having never worked under them.

56,869. A suggestion has been made to the Commission by one witness, that there is no sufficient reason for treating Commissary work in Midlothian in a different manner from Commissary work elsewhere in Scotland, and that the work now done by the Commissary Office should be done by the Sheriff Clerk of Midlothian and his staff. What do you say as to that suggestion?—I have not heard of that suggestion before. I should require time to consider it.

56,870. You are not prepared to offer any opinion on it at present?—No, because I do not see how you could work it. Of course, I am saying that at the first blush.

56,871. The Commissary work in other counties in Scotland is done by the Sheriff Clerk, is it not?—Yes; but you see we are acting for all Scotland. I have given a great many instances of our work for all Scotland. It would involve the Sheriff Clerk of Midlothian undertaking our work for all Scotland. We have proved, I think sufficiently, that the office has been extremely economically worked, and I do not see how it could be more economically worked, because I have given the figures. Of course, if you or the Government chose to give the expenses of the Commissary office to the Sheriff Clerk of Midlothian, it would be simply robbing Peter to pay Paul.

56,872. You mean, if the work were transferred there would be no advantage as regards economy at any rate?—I do not see it, but I leave that to the Government to say. I do not see how any office could be more economically worked, and I have shown in my précis the enormous surplus made out of our office annually by the Government. The Commissary Office is quite a little gold mine to the Treasury, and I cannot see how they could possibly complain of it. In the course of my clerkship of 32 years I have remitted to the Treasury a sum of 45,653*l.* of net surplus. That seems to me an enormous sum. I do not suppose very many Government offices have done such a thing.

56,873. That depends upon the level at which the fees are fixed?—I do not know. The fees were fixed by the Government.

56,874. You say in your précis that you think that the organisation, privileges, and emoluments of your office should be similar to those of the Principal Probate Registries of London and Dublin?—Yes.

56,875. Will you explain that more fully?—I think I have said in another part of my précis that I should like to see the clerks rise by gradations, classified so that the salaries should increase according to the years of service. I think that is very proper. Then, I think, they ought also to get better salaries, and I think they ought to get pensions. All these things, of course, are in keeping with the Probate Registries of London and Dublin.

56,876. Is that what you mean by the "privileges"?—Yes, certainly; the pensions are privileges. The clerks are very keen about that—that they should get pensions. That is what they mainly want, I think.

56,877. There is nothing else that you include in the word "privileges"?—No, I think not. I think it is the pensions and the larger salaries that they want. I have not discussed that with them.

20 May 1915.]

Mr. RALPH RICHARDSON, W.S.

56,878. I am quoting from your précis, in which you say: "I am of opinion that the privileges granted to the Principal Probate Registries of London and Dublin, both analogous to this Department, should be extended to the Clerks in the Commissary Office, Edinburgh." The privileges mean the matters you have mentioned?—I think so. I do not know what other privileges there can be.

56,879. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) I understand from the list of figures handed in to us by your clerks for 1911 you issued probate for 755 wills?—Yes.

56,880. That is to say, a little over two a day?—Do you mean English probates, because we have no such thing as "probates" in Scotland?

56,881. Are they using the word in the English sense?—Do you mean what we call "confirmations"?

56,882. I mean whatever the clerks may have meant here?—The great point here is the inventories. The probates are the English, Colonial, and Irish ones. The Scotch ones are the inventories. They number 1,592.

56,883. Then to find the number of wills proved you have to add the probates to the inventories?—The probates are under a different system. They are signed and sealed by me, whereas the others, the confirmations, follow upon the inventories, and I sign them—that is the Scottish form.

56,884. I see you say, "The duties of my deputy are those of general correspondence." If a member of the public, or a lawyer, writes to you on the subject of the probate of a will, his letter is answered, is it not?—He looks after that generally.

56,885. You consider it part of your duty to the public to answer letters?—Certainly. I am at the office daily.

56,886. Are you aware that in the London Probate Office they refuse to answer letters on the ground that the man ought to call?—I do not know anything about the London Office.

56,887. A good deal of the work of the public in your office is to come in to see old wills—members of the public and lawyers come in for that purpose?—Yes.

56,888. How do you arrange? Do you make them comfortable? Do you give them a chair?—We have increased the size of our public room lately, and they certainly have desks, and we have a counter where the clerks hand out things. I assure you that so far as I know I have never heard any expression of complaint made regarding my office. I should be very keen to hear it.

56,889. You do not require them to stand?—Oh dear, no; not unless they like. We have a good bench for those that are weak, and ladies and others all sit there.

56,890. You have at present four ladies engaged in typing?—Yes.

56,891. Have you ever considered whether, if any of these women show real ability and become very familiar with your work, it could be possible to give them something better to do than typing?—We have not had them very long—not very many years. We took them on very much because we could not get men, and they have done admirably.

56,892. After a period of admirable service, do you think it possible to give them—as they are given in the Post Office, for instance—a certain amount of clerical work?—We are very much indebted to them. I may tell you that I have found some of these female typists doing in some cases double the work of a man. Whether it is their fingers or what I do not know, but they put through an enormous quantity of work as female typists.

56,893. I want to press the point whether it would be possible, in the case of an extremely competent woman typist, not to keep her all her life merely copying, but to use her capabilities in rather more varied clerical work?—We have not had a long enough experience of their ability beyond typing; that is all they have done.

56,894. You use a new and rather permanent ink with your typewriters now?—Yes, we have ink, of course, for the records.

56,895. You have no fear lest the typed document should fade nowadays?—I have never heard that.

56,896. And so far as you have seen the documents they show no tendency to fade?—No.

56,897. (Mr. Matheson.) What sort of education have your clerks generally had?—In Scotland they get a very good education at the School Board.

56,898. They come to you at what age generally?—I have given the ages on joining of the staff in the table—24, 25, 38, 19, 20, 21, 32, 19, 18, 23, 18.

56,899. (Chairman.) They have generally been something before they come to you, and have been in an office before that?—Yes, they are quite ripe.

56,900. Have they generally been in a solicitor's office?—Yes, I endeavour, if possible, to get those, although I am told that there is a difficulty in getting clerks, especially at this moment.

56,901. (Lord Dundas.) Owing to the war, do you mean?—Yes; our law clerks are very largely drawn upon now in Edinburgh.

ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTY-SIXTH DAY.

Wednesday, 2nd June 1915.

PRESENT:

SIR HENRY BABINGTON SMITH, K.C.B., C.S.I. (Chairman).

The Hon. LORD DUNDAS.

Sir JOHN ARROW KEMPE, K.C.B.

Sir GEORGE MORISON PAUL.

Mr. ARTHUR BOUTWOOD.

Mr. JOHN ROBERT CLYNES, M.P.

Mr. CECIL COWARD.

Mr. PERCY EWING MATHESON.

Mr. ARTHUR EVERETT SHIPLEY, F.R.S.

Mr. GRAHAM WALLAS.

Mr. E. W. H. MILLAR (Secretary).

Mr. CHRISTOPHER JOHNSTON BISSET (Sheriff Clerk of Forfarshire), representing the Association of Sheriff Clerks of Scotland, called and examined.

56,902. (Chairman.) You are Sheriff Clerk of Forfarshire?—Yes.

56,903. How long have you held that post?—Since 1904.

56,904. What had been your previous experience?—I had been practising as a solicitor in Dundee since 1897.

56,905. Are you also Secretary of the Association of Sheriff Clerks of Scotland?—Yes.

56,906. Does that body consist entirely of Sheriff Clerks?—It consists of the Sheriff Clerks with one addition—the Commissary Clerk of Edinburgh.

56,907. Does it include the whole of the Sheriff Clerks?—All except one.

2 June 1915.]

MR. CHRISTOPHER JOHNSTON BISSET.

56,908. How long has your association been in existence?—Since 1877.

59,909. May we take your evidence to-day as representing the views of the Association?—Yes, I think you may.

56,910. Will you tell us first about the jurisdiction of the Sheriff Courts, so that we may have a general idea of the nature of the business that comes before those Courts?—The civil jurisdiction of the Sheriff Court is, in movable rights, unlimited, and in questions of heritable right and title and of succession to movables is extensive, but limited by a power to have certain causes of importance transferred to the Court of Session. The jurisdiction extends to maritime causes; actions of damages, actions of aliment, and of separation and aliment; the custody of children, the appointment of judicial factors, bankruptcy and insolvency, service of heirs, lunacy, Poor Law, registration of voters, fatal accident inquiries, workmen's compensation, and a great variety of subjects.

56,911. Does the civil jurisdiction cover practically the whole field of civil judicial matters?—Yes, in a sense it covers the whole field; of course, there are certain actions which are not competent in the Sheriff Court, but are reserved for the Supreme Court—the Court of Session. The civil jurisdiction of the Sheriff Court covers a very wide field indeed.

56,912. What is the criminal jurisdiction?—The criminal jurisdiction of the sheriff extends to crimes and offences prosecuted on indictment as well as to those prosecuted summarily, subject to the limitation that he cannot award penal servitude nor any higher punishment than imprisonment limited to two years.

56,913. Who decides whether a criminal prosecution takes place in the Sheriff Court or in the Court of Justiciary?—The Lord Advocate or one of the Advocates depute.

56,914. What other matters come before the Sheriff Court?—The sheriff has a Small Debt Court in which the jurisdiction is of a summary character and very wide. The limit in the Small Debt Court is 20l.

56,915. Does it also deal with commissary matters?—Yes. Since 1876 the powers and jurisdiction of commissariat belong to the Sheriff Court, and under that branch the confirmation and appointment of executors, which you describe in England as the grant of probate or letters of administration and the consequent duties of record, form an important part of the Sheriff Court jurisdiction.

56,916. Does that include the permanent record of wills?—Yes.

56,917. Under whose custody are the records of the Court?—Under the custody of the Sheriff Clerk.

56,918. Are they kept at each court locally, or at the head-quarters of the county, or where?—In the case of commissary records they are kept at each court which has a commissary jurisdiction. Some Seats of Court, a few, do not have commissary jurisdiction. But where there is commissary jurisdiction at the seat of the Court, the records for that purpose are kept there. In the case of the Register of Deeds, which is a register of writs recorded for preservation or execution, the writs are kept at the county town, as a rule, and not always at the head office.

56,919. In the case of applications for confirmation or appointment of executors, can an applicant go to any court he likes, or is it determined by the residence of the testator?—It is determined by the domicile of the testator.

56,920. He has no option in the matter?—No.

56,921. Who are the judges who deal with these matters?—The sheriffs.

56,922. The sheriff is non-resident?—He is non-resident, except in two cases—Edinburgh and Glasgow.

56,923. He is represented in practice by the Sheriff Substitute?—Yes, who is resident.

56,924. The Sheriffs Substitute are more numerous than the Sheriff Clerks, are they not?—Yes.

56,925. Are there 56 Sheriffs Substitute?—Yes.

56,926. How many Sheriff Clerks are there?—33.

56,927. That is to say, there is one Sheriff Clerk for each county, but in some cases there is more than one Sheriff Substitute for each county?—Yes.

56,928. What are the duties of the Sheriff Clerk?—The Sheriff Clerk acts as clerk of the Sheriff Court in all proceedings, civil and criminal. He has duties in nearly all the matters which falls within the executive, administrative, or judicial functions of the sheriff. He is keeper of and issues extracts from a register of deeds for preservation and execution. He has multifarious duties under special statutes. He is the custodian of consignations, and he judges of the sufficiency of caution. He discharges the duties under the Workmen's Compensation Act, which in England fall to the Registrar of the County Court. He collects all court fees and accounts to Exchequer for them. In the Commissary Department he performs, without reference to the sheriff, all the non-contentious or common-form business of the granting of confirmations (probate and administration), the recording of wills, and the administration of the Small Estates Acts. I may mention that the fees derived from the commissary branch of the work are about 40 per cent. of the whole fees, which is an indication of the extent of that part of the work.

56,929. Is it the case that the Sheriff Clerk has to deal with practically all the matters which are dealt with by the various offices of the Courts in Edinburgh?—He occupies the same position to the Sheriff Court as the Clerks of Court do to the Court of Session; in addition to which he has many duties of a different character under the special statutes, to which I have referred already.

56,930. In addition to that, he performs the duties which are performed by the extractor?—Yes.

56,931. Is there anything corresponding to the minute-book in the case of the Sheriff Court?—Yes, that also is kept by the Sheriff Clerk.

56,932. Does he also perform duties corresponding to those of the Clerk of Justiciary?—Yes, in so far as they relate to the criminal jurisdiction of the sheriff; that is to say, the Sheriff Clerk is the clerk of the Sheriff's Criminal Court.

56,933. He also has the commissary duties to perform?—Yes.

56,934. Would it be correct to put it in this way, that he has to perform duties corresponding to those of all the departments connected with the Court of Session and the Court of Justiciary, but that as the matters which come before a sheriff are of less importance than those which come before the Court of Session, the duties are correspondingly of less importance?—Yes, I think that would be a correct statement of the matter, so far as it goes.

56,935. But he has a very large variety of duties to perform?—Yes.

56,936. You mentioned the Register of Deeds. What is that?—That is a register of writs presented to be recorded for preservation or for execution.

56,937. What is the relation of the Register of Deeds kept by the Sheriff Clerk to the Central Register of Deeds in the Register House?—The Register of Deeds kept by the Sheriff Clerk is of the same character as the Register of Deeds kept by the Register House, but is applicable to deeds relating to the county.

56,938. What class of deeds are registered in the Sheriff Court?—Any probative writ, any deed, may be registered in the Sheriff Court books if the parties are resident in the sheriffdom.

56,939. What determines whether a deed is registered in the Sheriff Court books or in the Central Registry books?—Very often the matter is determined by the law agent, who acts in the matter. He may find it more convenient to send a deed to the County Registry than to Edinburgh.

56,940. Is the effect of registration identical?—Yes, preservation in the one case and execution in the other; that is to say, if the registration is required for the purpose of execution the sheriff's warrant is attached to the extract, and is a part of the extract, and diligence may proceed upon it.

56,941. If it is for the purpose of record and preservation the result is the same, whether it is recorded in the Register House or in the Sheriff Court?—Yes, the same.

2 June 1915.]

MR. CHRISTOPHER JOHNSTON BISSET.

56,942. You mentioned also that the Sheriff Clerk is the custodian of consignations. What are consignations?—Money lodged in court.

56,943. Does that amount to anything considerable?—Sometimes. It varies very much, but sometimes consignations are quite large in amount. Any sum in dispute in an action may be consigned by Order of the Court or at the request of parties, and sometimes consignations are of considerable amount.

56,944. With respect to consignations, does the Sheriff Clerk perform the same function as is performed by the Accountant of Court in the Court of Session?—I do not know whether the Accountant of Court does take charge of consignations lodged in the Court of Session. I am not familiar with that matter.

56,945. In the Sheriff Court the Sheriff Clerk takes charge of consignations and has to account for them?—Yes, he is responsible for them.

56,946. And he pays them over by Order of the Court?—Yes.

56,947. (Sir John Kempe.) Are the fees collected by stamps?—No.

56,948. (Chairman.) Are they all paid in cash?—All paid in cash.

56,949. By what staff is the Sheriff Clerk assisted? The Sheriff Clerk receives an allowance from the Exchequer, which in most cases is a separate allowance from his own salary. He uses that for the payment of his staff, which he himself appoints.

56,950. Of what does that staff consist?—Some members of the staff are deputies of the Sheriff Clerk, others are ordinary clerks. Of course the number of the staff varies very much according to the size of the county and the importance of the work, and is always limited naturally by the amount available for the payment of staff.

56,951. How is that amount determined?—By the Treasury, upon consideration of the requirements of the county and of the work.

56,952. If you found your allowance insufficient, what steps would you take?—I should apply to the Treasury for an increase.

56,953. And then the matter would be discussed between you and the King's Remembrancer?—Yes.

56,954. The staff paid out of that allowance is appointed entirely by you?—Yes.

56,955. Have you the power of dismissal?—Yes.

56,956. Is the distribution of the sum available between the different members of that staff in your discretion, or is that fixed by the Treasury?—That is not fixed; it is in my discretion. I rather think that in certain cases the Treasury have made conditions with respect to the salary to be paid to certain deputies or clerks, but not so in my county, and I am not aware of the particular circumstances in that respect elsewhere.

56,957. How is the work distributed between the members of the staff?—All the members of the staff, both deputies and clerks, are available for any branch of the work as convenience may dictate, and in the execution of the ordinary work of the office the deputies and the other members of the staff all take their share and work together. The work is distributed among them by the Sheriff Clerk in the manner most likely to conduce to the efficient conduct of the work. In the larger offices, I may say, although each deputy may have the supervision of a department, there are senior clerks who themselves take charge of important branches of the work and are at the head of such branches, having clerks under them.

56,958. Will you give us a concrete example of the distribution of the work. Taking the case of your own county, we have before us the statement which you have given of the number, ages, and salaries of your own deputies and clerks. You have in the first place at Dundee three deputies and four clerks?—Yes.

56,959. How is the work distributed among them?—The senior deputy takes charge of the Court work; that is to say, he sits with the Sheriff Substitute as clerk of his court both civil and criminal.

56,960. How many Sheriff Substitutes are there in the county?—There is one at Dundee and one for the rest of the county who sits at Forfar and Arbroath.

56,961. He sits at those two places only?—Yes. There are other small debt circuit courts, but they are of minor importance and only occur about once a quarter or so.

56,962. Does a Sheriff Substitute take those Courts himself?—Yes.

56,963. Generally speaking, you have one Sheriff Substitute sitting at Dundee and one sitting at Forfar and Arbroath in turn?—Yes.

56,964. At Dundee your senior deputy attends in court?—Yes. Then the second deputy takes charge of the commissary work and the third of the small debt work. The others are assistants.

56,965. What is your own work?—My own work is the supervision of the whole, and I take more immediate charge of the commissary and workmen's compensation work and of the cash.

56,966. Do you sit in court yourself?—Yes.

56,967. Is that at Dundee or the other places?—Both at Dundee and the other places, but specially when the Sheriff Principal is sitting. I always act as clerk of the Court when he is sitting.

56,968. How often does the Sheriff Principal sit?—That depends upon the number of appeals to be disposed of. On an average the sheriff will sit once every six weeks or two months at Dundee, once every two months at Forfar, and perhaps four times a year at Arbroath.

56,969. (Lord Dundas.) He sits with juries also?—Yes. I am speaking of the appeals just now.

56,970. (Chairman.) Would that be for one day on each occasion?—No, it might be for a longer period. The Sheriff deals with a number of appeals and sits until they have all been heard. The Sheriff Principal also takes all the criminal jury trials both at Dundee and Forfar. Of course he has administrative work in addition which very frequently brings him to the county, and he deals with all applications of an administrative character himself.

56,971. At Forfar you have two deputies and three clerks?—Yes.

56,972. Does the senior deputy there attend in court?—Yes, and takes charge of the whole of the work there.

56,973. What are his duties when the Court is not sitting at Forfar?—He is the head of the office there and takes charge of all the office work. He deals with the commissary work himself. One of the clerks keeps the Register of Deeds which takes his whole time. The others assist.

56,974. At Arbroath the staff is smaller—one deputy and one clerk?—Yes, only one deputy and a boy.

56,975. We may infer from that that the work at Forfar is considerably greater than at Arbroath?—Yes, the work at Arbroath is small.

56,976. Do you yourself attend to the workmen's compensation work at Forfar and Arbroath, or is that done by the local staff?—I deal with it for the whole county.

56,977. Do you attend at Forfar and Arbroath for that purpose, or is your work entirely in Dundee?—I am required by my Commission to attend at Dundee, but I visit the offices at Forfar and Arbroath and supervise and take part of the work there.

56,978. There are also Small Debt Circuits at Montrose and Brechin?—Yes.

56,979. And a small fee is paid to somebody for attending to the work of those Small Debt Circuits?—The work there is very small indeed now.

56,980. May the arrangements be summed up in this way. You yourself supervise the whole work of the offices of the Sheriff Courts in the county and attend personally whenever the sheriff sits himself, and occasionally in the Sheriffs Substitutes' Courts. There is one deputy at Dundee and one at Forfar and one at Arbroath, whose special duty it is to attend the Court when it is sitting, and that deputy with the other deputies and clerks attends to the work generally at each place, with the exception of such work as is specially looked after by you personally;—in particular, workmen's compensation work. Would that be a correct summary of the situation?—Yes, that is correct. I, personally, look after the custody of the fees and of the consignations, in addition to the work already mentioned.

2 June 1915.]

MR. CHRISTOPHER JOHNSTON BISSET.

56,981. In what sense do you personally look after it?—I keep the cash-book and ledger for the whole county. The fees are paid into the bank each week, and I keep the cash-book.

56,982. The fees are collected in cash by one of the clerks, paid into the bank, and accounted for to you?—Yes.

56,983. And you keep a general account of the fees?—I do.

56,984. Are consignations paid direct to you?—Those are placed on deposit receipt by me whenever they are received, and I keep a record of them.

56,985. You have a separate deposit receipt for each consignment?—Yes, for each consignment over 5*l*.

56,986. Small consignations under 5*l*. are kept in a general account?—They are placed in a separate banking account, but not on deposit receipt.

56,987. Would your description of the arrangements for the distribution of work among the staff apply in other counties too?—I think it would. Of course so much depends upon the size of the staff and distribution of it; but, speaking generally, I think this would be a typical case. Lanarkshire is, of course, different, because there is such a large staff there.

56,988. What is the number of the staff in Lanarkshire?—I think between 60 and 70.

56,989. Would it be correct to say that the larger the court and the larger the staff the greater the specialisation of the work among the staff?—Yes.

56,990. In a small county you would have a small staff, and each member of the staff would have to do a great variety of work?—That is quite true.

56,991. Where the work is very large, you would have one depute in charge of the commissary work, another in charge of the small debt work, and so on. In fact, the work would be specialised with a separate staff attached to each department?—Yes, and in the case of Lanarkshire a clerk is attached, I understand, to each Sheriff Substitute.

56,992. In what sense is a clerk attached to each Sheriff Substitute?—I understand that in Lanarkshire each Sheriff Substitute has a clerk who is one of the staff of the Sheriff Clerk.

56,993. In Lanarkshire is there a depute attached to each court?—Yes.

56,994. And there is also a special clerk attached personally to each Sheriff Substitute?—Yes.

56,995. At each court which the Sheriff Substitute holds, certain functions are discharged by the local depute?—Yes.

56,996. And other functions are discharged by the clerk who is attached personally to the Sheriff Substitute?—Yes.

56,997. How are those functions distinguished?—It is difficult for me to answer that as it relates to another Sheriffdom. I suppose the depute keeps the records of the Court, calls the cases, and notes the interlocutors. The clerk, while a proof is going on, would take charge of whatever matter was necessary in the conduct of the proof, have the process in his hand, and carry out any instructions that the sheriff gave to him. And similarly in a debate. I do not know, but I should imagine that he would write out the sheriff's interlocutors and notes.

56,998. The clerk attached to the sheriff performs more the duties of a personal clerk of the sheriff?—Yes.

56,999. And the depute performs the formal duties of record and other official duties connected with the Court?—Yes; that is, really, the distinction; one being rather more official and the other more personal, although they are both discharging duties that have to be performed in the Court's service.

57,000. Is there no conflict or confusion of duties between the two?—I have not heard of any, and I do not think there is any. It is well arranged and understood what the respective duties are.*

57,001. Does the depute, in the course of his duties, gain experience of all matters that are dealt with by the Sheriff Clerk himself?—Yes.

57,002. Will you tell us now about the appointment and qualifications of the Sheriff Clerks? In the first place, by whom is a Sheriff Clerk appointed?—The Sheriff Clerk is appointed on the recommendation of the Secretary for Scotland. The members of his staff are appointed by the Sheriff Clerk himself.

57,003. In fact, is it the case that the recommendation of the Secretary for Scotland is made upon the nomination of the Lord Advocate?—Yes, so I understand.

57,004. Practically the selection of the Sheriff Clerks rests with the Lord Advocate?—Yes.

57,005. Is there any statutory qualification for a Sheriff Clerk?—No.

57,006. In practice is any particular qualification required?—In practice the Sheriff Clerk appointed has always been either a practising solicitor or one who has had experience in a Sheriff Court. I do not remember any case which is an exception to that in my experience.

57,007. Can you say at all among the present Sheriff Clerks how many have previously been deputes?—I cannot say just now how many have been deputes, but I should think half a dozen.

57,008. The large majority then were solicitors in practice?—Yes.

57,009. Do you consider it necessary or advisable that the Sheriff Clerk should have been a solicitor in practice?—I think it is desirable.

57,010. Do you think it is preferable that he should have been a solicitor in practice rather than that he should have been in a Sheriff Clerk's office?—Yes.

57,011. What are your grounds for that opinion?—The man who has been in practice has had a wider experience, and probably has a wider outlook. The man who has been brought up in the office has not passed any entrance or qualifying examination; he has been taken into the office as a boy and has simply grown up in the service, acquiring all the time a great amount of experience, I admit, of the particular kind of work he has to do, but it is rather a narrow career, and I think that is a sufficient ground in itself for looking outside the office for a head. Of course there is another reason: there are many branches of the work in which it is of importance that the Sheriff Clerk should have had a legal training.

57,012. Will you give an instance?—Commissary work and the service of heirs are two examples.

57,013. Taking the case of commissary work, would practice as a solicitor be more valuable than the knowledge of the work which would be acquired by a junior member of the staff?—Not so much the practice as a solicitor, but the fact that the practising solicitor has passed through the qualifying examinations and knows the law.

57,014. The law which has to be dealt with in the commissary work is of a limited and special character?—Yes, it is of a special character.

57,015. Is not that particular law satisfactorily learnt by doing the work in the office?—I think in the case of the existing deputes it is particularly well done. I do not suggest for a moment that it is not well done, but at the same time I do think that it is preferable that the head of the Sheriff Clerk's Office should be a man who is qualified as a law agent.

57,016. You gave us that class of work as an instance. For that particular work, is the greater width of outlook that might have been acquired in the outside profession of any particular value?—No, I should not say that it is. I put that as a more general ground, not with special reference to any department of the work—that I think you would probably get a better man, especially when he has to supervise the work of other members of the staff.

* I find that in my evidence before Lord Salvesen's Committee I explained the matter thus:—"In Glasgow, where seven Sheriffs are sitting continuously, the Clerks (not Deputes) attached to the Sheriffs, alone are, in Civil cases, in attendance during proofs and debates—the real trial of the cause—while a Depute attends in court when the formal procedure is being dealt with; but by far the greater part of the Sheriff Clerk's work is done in the office and not in the court."—C. J. B.

57,017. You have told us that at present there are 33 Sheriff Clerks?—Yes.

57,018. The size of the districts over which Sheriff Clerks preside varies considerably?—Yes.

57,019. And the salaries vary considerably?—Yes.

57,020. Is there any system of transfer or promotion from one Sheriff Clerkship to another?—No system.

57,021. Have such promotions taken place?—Very seldom.

57,022. Do you consider it desirable that there should be such a system?—Yes, I consider it desirable, and that I believe to be the opinion of the Sheriff Clerks as a whole, although I am bound to say that quite a number of those who hold office at present would not care to remove from the districts in which they are situated.

57,023. You speak of men who have been in a particular place a number of years and would not care to leave it?—Yes; especially bearing in mind that quite a number of them have been appointed to their offices rather late in life. It would be quite different if a new system were established in which men might enter the service at an early age and look forward to promotion to the chief posts.

57,024. If the service were recruited upon that principle you anticipate that there would be no difficulty as regards the change of residence?—No, I think not.

57,025. You think a man who entered with that prospect would be prepared to change his place of residence in order to obtain promotion to a better post?—Yes. Some of those who at present hold office are quite anxious, on their own account, to have promotion, and are ready to change from one place to another.

57,026. Do you consider that that would produce favourable results on the staffing of the service? If that was the system, would you get a larger field of persons anxious to enter the service than at present, speaking now of the principal office of Sheriff Clerk?—The field is wide enough at present. The Lord Advocate has the choice of all the law agents in Scotland, and all the deutes, too.

57,027. There is no lack of candidates at present?—No, but it would improve the service generally, I am sure.

57,028. At present the appointments are, in almost all cases, direct and from outside?—Yes.

57,029. To what extent are they political appointments?—They are nearly always political appointments.

57,030. It is recognised and acknowledged that that is the principle on which appointments are made?—Yes.

57,031. In fact, a law agent would never expect to be appointed Sheriff Clerk except by a Lord Advocate of his own political party?—No.

57,032. Do you think that that system is open to objection?—Well, I owe my own appointment to it.

57,033. Looking at the matter apart from any personal considerations, do you think it is the right system?—It has produced good men in the past.

57,034. If you were setting up the service afresh, and laying down a system of appointments, is that the system that you would lay down?—No.

57,035. What system would you lay down?—I should lay down the system that I have outlined in my précis—that appointments should be made from the body of qualified law agents. As to the method of selection I am not prepared to make any suggestion, but I have no doubt the usual method of the Civil Service would be suitable in this instance.

57,036. Before dealing further with the question of the appointment of the Sheriff Clerks themselves, it may be convenient to deal first with the question of their staff because the two questions are connected with one another. You have told us that the staff is at present appointed by the Sheriff Clerk himself. What is their tenure?—They hold office at the pleasure of the Sheriff Clerk.

57,037. If there is a change of Sheriff Clerk, have they to be re-appointed?—Yes.

57,038. In practice does the incoming Sheriff Clerk always re-appoint the existing staff?—Yes, he would be very foolish if he did not.

57,039. Have you ever known any case to the contrary?—No. He comes in a stranger and does not know the work; they all do know the work, and are likely to be of special use to him, and therefore he would be very foolish if he made any change. I do not think any Sheriff Clerk appointed would ever dream of doing it. As a matter of fact, deutes and members of the staff, although their tenure is nominally at the pleasure of the Sheriff Clerk, do have substantial security in the experience that they have gained in the work, and one has not heard of any case of hardship or injustice arising out of the dismissal of a member of the staff. There have been cases of dismissal.

57,040. In your evidence before Lord Salvesen's Committee of 1910, you mentioned that you had made inquiry, and had ascertained that in recent years there had been four cases of dismissal, and that in each of those four cases the dismissal was for gross misconduct or neglect?—Yes.

57,041. Can you complete that statement up to the present time? Have you known of any case of dismissal since then?—I have not heard of any case since then.

57,042. When vacancies occur in the staff of a Sheriff Clerk's office, how are they generally filled?—They are nearly always filled by promotion or by a re-arrangement all round of the office—a re-arrangement of the places in the office and of the salaries. If a man holding a senior post leaves the office, the opportunity is taken to bring everybody a step up, and re-arrange all round.

57,043. You move everybody a step up and bring in a boy at the bottom?—Yes, that is what happens in nearly every case. In a big office like Lanarkshire you could not benefit everybody, but you do benefit a substantial section of the staff when such an opportunity arises.

57,044. Are appointments ever made direct from outside to one of the higher posts—to the deute's post, for instance?—Very seldom. It is long since I heard of any such case—it was before my own appointment.

57,045. That, I suppose, would only be where there was not a sufficiently well qualified man in the office already?—Yes, or in the service of some other Sheriff Clerk.

57,046. Are transfers between different Sheriff Clerk offices frequent?—Not frequent, but they occur. They occur more often in the smaller offices; when there is nobody in training to fill a vacant post the Sheriff Clerk may apply to one of his colleagues to find out whether there is anyone suitable.

57,047. Between the different offices under your own supervision are transfers frequent?—I cannot say that they are frequent.

57,048. Taking your own county, you have Dundee, Forfar, and Arbroath: do you treat the staff of all three places as a single staff, or is each place treated separately?—I treat it as a single staff, and if an opportunity for promotion arises the whole staff is considered.

57,049. You shift a man freely from one of those places to another if it is necessary for the re-arrangement of the work, or to give opportunities for promotion?—Yes. For example; two of my clerks at Dundee were trained in Forfar.

57,050. If you have not a man sufficiently well qualified in your own staff you would inquire of one of your colleagues whether he had a suitable man he could send you?—Yes.

57,051. Generally speaking, new appointments are at the bottom of the list?—Yes.

57,052. At what age do lads generally come in?—One takes them in as young lads—14 to 16.

57,053. Direct from school?—Yes.

57,054. Without any previous experience in a solicitor's office?—Without any previous experience. The difficulty there is, that each Sheriff Clerk's office stands by itself, and cannot offer very definite prospects to young lads coming in. The great difficulty is, that a young lad has often to stay, in the earlier years, for a very small salary (which the Sheriff Clerk cannot increase because of the limit of his allowance), in the hope that something will turn up by which he will receive a step in promotion some time. But it is not satisfactory, either for the lad or the Sheriff Clerk, and one has to tell these young lads that one cannot hold out any definite prospects of promotion or advancement, and that they must just take their risk. I always tell the parents that that is the state of matters.

57,055. Do your junior clerks often leave you for other work?—Yes; I should think about half leave and half stay. I am speaking of a comparatively small staff in Forfarshire, a staff in which changes do not frequently occur; but, if one takes the last 10 years, quite a number of young lads have come in and have left for other posts.

57,056. To go into private employment?—Yes.

57,057. Employment of a legal character?—They usually go either to a solicitor's office or to a Procurator Fiscal's office, or an office in connection with the county staff—County Clerk's or Chief Constable's or the Police Department—something allied to the Judicial Department.

57,058. Do you find any difficulty in getting suitable lads to fill their places?—There is considerable difficulty in finding suitable lads, owing to the uncertainty that I have indicated.

57,059. That is, the uncertainty of the prospects?—The uncertainty of the prospects.

57,060. Looking at your staff at Dundee, I see one clerk whose age is 41, who was appointed two years ago and whose salary is 42*l.* a year. Does he give his whole time to the service?—No.

57,061. What is the nature of his appointment?—He is the shorthand writer of Court in addition to holding this office under me.

57,062. So that he receives other remuneration as shorthand writer?—Yes.

57,063. The remainder of the staff all entered as lads and worked up?—Yes.

57,064. (Mr. Coward.) There are two ladies?—Those are typists. There is also one at Forfar.

57,065. (Chairman.) What is the position as regards pension?—There is no provision for pension, either of the Sheriff Clerk or any of his staff.

57,066. Is there any fixed age for retirement?—No.

57,067. Neither in the case of the Sheriff Clerk nor of the staff?—There is no fixed age for retirement. There is a paragraph which occurs in the commissions of Sheriff Clerks who have been more recently appointed, which runs: "That in the event of any regulation being made hereafter requiring that the office of Sheriff Clerk shall become vacant on the holder attaining the age of 70 years, the appointment shall be held to have been made subject to such condition without claim to compensation." One is not informed of that qualification when one is offered the appointment by the Lord Advocate, and the result is that, after one has accepted, the commission comes, and this condition is discovered for the first time.

57,068. But it has not been brought into force yet?—Not in any case so far as I am aware.

57,069. Are Sheriff Clerks and their staff required to give their whole time to their work?—I think in the recent commissions, and in important counties, the Sheriff Clerk is required to devote his whole time to the office. Sometimes that is qualified by a permission to the Sheriff Clerk to hold other offices of a public character if the sheriff of the county approve.

57,070. Does a Sheriff Clerk in many cases at present carry on private business of his own?—I think 9 or 10 of the present Sheriff Clerks carry on private business.

57,071. Are any of those recent appointments?—Those include all the small counties in which it is hardly possible to make the restriction against private practice—I mean counties like Nairn, Kinross, Clackmannan, and Bute.

57,072. In the larger counties the Sheriff Clerk has no private practice?—No.

57,073. Has he, in many cases, other public offices?—Yes, in quite a number of instances he has other public offices. In a good many places the Sheriff Clerk is either auditor or joint auditor of Court. A few Sheriff Clerks have the office of clerk to the Income Tax Commissioners; three, I think, are county clerks, and some are clerks to the Lieutenancy.

57,074. Do those other offices occupy any considerable part of their time?—No.

57,075. Would not the office of county clerk occupy a considerable part of their time?—Those are in the smaller counties—Clackmannan, Kinross, and Shetland, and in those cases, I should think, there is not very much work in the county clerkship; but probably it is a more important appointment than the sheriff clerkship, and they would both be attached to private practice.

57,076. Do they bring any considerable addition to the emoluments?—I am not able to speak as to the emoluments of those offices.

57,077. Is it a matter of discretion with the Sheriff Clerk how much personal attention and time he gives to the work of his office?—No; the Sheriff Clerk is required by his commission to give personal attendance.

57,078. Does the commission define how much personal attendance he has to give?—In my own case it does. It requires me to attend at Dundee during ordinary office hours.

57,079. Is that the case generally in the commissions of Sheriff Clerks?—In the larger counties, I understand, it is.

57,080. In the evidence given before Lord Salvesen's Committee I see this question and answer: "Is it the experience of your association"—the witness was a representative of the Sheriff Clerks Depute Association—"that some Sheriff Clerks take divergent views of their duties—that some work themselves, and that some look upon their appointment as practically a gift for political services. (A.) Yes"?—I do not agree with that answer.

57,081. Before the present Commission the King's and Lord Treasurer's Remembrancer, in giving evidence, made the following statement: "There are cases of Sheriff Clerks who, I think, one might truthfully say, do nothing; they may sign their name once or twice a quarter, and they may have very large solicitor's businesses of their own which they are running, and the whole work is done by their deputies." That was said a fortnight ago. Do you confirm that?—The King's Remembrancer knows better than I do. I would not care to contradict him, but he may refer to one or two exceptional cases of the men who held office under the old system; I rather think he does there; I mean the old system under which the Sheriff Clerk was appointed before the Exchequer had anything to do with the collection of the fees; the Sheriff Clerk drew the fees himself and appointed his own deputies. Then the system was altered. The Exchequer took charge of the fees, and fixed the salary of the Sheriff Clerk and his staff allowance. The whole system has been subject to a gradual improvement. Of course, you have to graft the new upon the old, and there may be some survivals of the looser practice of former times; but, certainly in the recent appointments, and in the case of the men whom I know personally, and who take an active interest in the work of my association and of the Sheriff Clerk's duties generally, that remark does not apply.

57,082. Would it be desirable to lay down a general rule that Sheriff Clerks should hold no office and engage in no business other than that of their own office?—I think that would be quite a proper rule, providing the salary were made a sufficient one.

57,083. You mentioned the case of the smaller counties, where the work is very small. As matters are at present arranged, it might be difficult in those counties to require a man to give his whole time to the work?—It would be difficult just now.

57,084. If the work is small, it would mean that during the rest of his time he would be idle?—Yes.

57,085. Would it be desirable to combine the smaller counties and reduce the number of Sheriff Clerks?—I think it would. That proposal has been approved by the members of my association.

2 June 1915.]

Mr. CHRISTOPHER JOHNSTON BISSET.

57,086. What exactly is the suggestion?—The proposal was made by Lord Salvesen's Committee that the number of Sheriff Clerks should be reduced to 15, which would provide one Sheriff Clerk for each Sheriff Principal, that is, for each sheriffdom.

57,087. In that case there would be no difficulty in laying down that each Sheriff Clerk should give his whole time to his duties?—No, I should think not in that case.

57,088. Are there any sheriffdoms where the Sheriff Clerk would not have full work?—I think all the sheriffdoms would afford a considerable amount of work. The work in some sheriffdoms would be much greater than the work in others; but that would not be an objection to the system as a whole.

57,089. That would be met by corresponding variations in the salaries?—Yes, and in the prospects of promotion.

57,090. But even in the smaller sheriffdoms, do you think there would be enough work to occupy a man's energies?—Yes, I think there would. The salary might not be very large in such a case.

57,091. In the sheriffdoms where the work is less, probably the amount of travelling would be greater, and those two elements would to some extent compensate each other?—Yes, that is true.

57,092. If the number of Sheriff Clerks were reduced to 15, what do you consider should be the method of appointment?—In that case, I think the men who have office at present have the first claim to any vacancies that occur.

57,093. The reduction, no doubt, would have to be effected gradually?—It would have to be effected gradually, and when combinations were possible, the man on the spot would have a claim to consideration, or, at any rate, to put it more broadly, you could not carry out the system without appointing the existing Sheriff Clerks to hold the new combined offices—unless you retired a number of them.

57,094. That being the case, would you continue the present system of appointment by the Secretary of State for Scotland on the nomination of the Lord Advocate, or do you recommend any modification of that?—The statement in my précis that appointments are made by the Crown on the recommendation of the Secretary for Scotland, is taken from Sheriff Wallace's book; my own commission runs in the name of the Secretary for Scotland. One receives a letter from the Lord Advocate offering the appointment, and the commission runs in the name of the Secretary for Scotland.

57,095. Do you suggest any alteration in that system with respect to the appointment of the 15?—I am not prepared to suggest any alteration there, unless you make it a Civil Service department pure and simple from top to bottom.

57,096. Coming to that question, you have told us that the staff of the Sheriff Clerks are appointed by the Sheriff Clerks themselves, and that interchange between different counties is exceptional?—Yes.

57,097. Do you think it practicable and desirable to make the clerical staff into a single service, with promotion throughout on the same lines?—Yes.

57,098. Will you explain more fully how that would work in practice?—Of course, one must set aside the cases of very minor appointments and junior appointments, but with those exceptions I think there will remain a considerable body of men who would be capable of inclusion in a general scheme. The salaries would have to be fixed and their respective posts assigned; but there does not appear to me to be any real difficulty with regard to the promotion of such men from one place to another and their holding office in a general system.

57,099. By whom would that general system be controlled?—That raises this difficulty: the sheriff clerk is at present in charge of his own office, and if you are to have a system of promotion of that character you must alter that and must place someone or some body in supervision, with power to make changes as they may become necessary. It was suggested by some of the members of Lord Salvesen's Committee that a supervisor should be appointed for the whole body.

Some of the Sheriff Clerks considered that, and it did not appear to us to be necessary to create a post of that character for such a small staff as 220 or thereby, and it occurred to us that some sort of committee arrangement would be the most suitable, bringing in the King's Remembrancer, who knows all about our staff, to guide such committee in its action.

57,100. What sort of committee do you suggest?—A committee of Sheriff Clerks.

57,101. The Sheriff Clerks being, according to your suggestion, reduced to 15 in number, you would have a small committee selected from among those 15?—Yes.

57,102. How do you suggest that it should be selected?—Either by the selection of some of the Sheriff Clerks of the more important sheriffdoms, or by the nomination of the Sheriff Clerks themselves. The Sheriff Clerk of Lanarkshire, for example, would naturally be a member of such a committee, because of the large portion of the staff which falls to be allocated to his sheriffdom.

57,103. You would suggest a small committee, I suppose?—Yes.

57,104. Three members?—Yes.

57,105. And you propose that the King's and Lord Treasurer's Remembrancer should sit as President?—Yes.

57,106. What would be the powers, in your view, of that committee?—Powers of promotion and powers of discipline.

57,107. Would they make the original appointments to the Sheriff Clerks' staff?—My suggestion with regard to original appointments is that they should be made from the existing staff, that you should select from the existing staff such members of the staff as are to be included in the new scheme, and that they should be eligible for appointment.

57,108. That would be at the first beginning?—Yes.

57,109. But for a continuing system of recruitment what do you suggest?—For a continuing system, the field of selection should consist of the members of the staff to whom I have already referred, and members of the staff who are not on the system at its commencement but who have entered afterwards and have qualified in such manner as may be prescribed.

57,110. Then you would have a clear distinction between a certain part of the staff which is on the establishment and another part of the staff which is not on the establishment?—Yes.

57,111. And you would recruit the established staff from the non-established staff?—From those who have come in later. My suggestion is that the established staff should be the main portion of the existing staff, and the non-established staff would be those holding minor and petty appointments.

57,112. That would be at the beginning?—Yes.

57,113. You have a staff, you say, of 220 or thereabouts, in all?—Yes.

57,114. A certain number of those, taking a figure at random, say 150, would become established, and the remaining 70 would be unestablished?—Yes.

57,115. Those 70 would be eligible for filling future vacancies in the established staff?—Yes.

57,116. But how would you fill up vacancies in that non-established 70?—From outside.

57,117. Who would appoint—the committee?—I think there ought to be some examination test.

57,118. A competitive examination?—I suggest that the suitable examination would be the entrance examination under the Regulations for the Admission of Law Agents.

57,119. At what age is that examination passed?—That is passed about 16, I think, as a rule. It is an examination equivalent to the Intermediate Certificate of the Scotch Education Department.

57,120. Is that an examination in the general subjects of education, or in legal matters?—General knowledge. There are two general knowledge examinations under the Law Agents' Regulations—the entrance examination and the second examination in general knowledge. The third and final examination is in law.

57,121. Would there not be some advantage in having a more general qualification, such as the leaving certificate?—There would be no objection to that; indeed, the Intermediate Certificate is equivalent to the Law Agents' entrance examination.

2 June 1915.]

MR. CHRISTOPHER JOHNSTON BISSET.

57,122. Is the standard much the same?—It is the same. Leaving certificates are accepted in substitution for the entrance and second examinations under the Law Agents' Regulations. It is provided that the Law Agents' entrance and second examinations are to be as nearly as possible equivalent to the intermediate and leaving certificates.

57,123. You would require that as a qualification. How would you select from among persons possessing that qualification?—I should not think there would be much difficulty in selection.

57,124. By whom would the selection be made?—I think it would be quite proper to leave the original selection in the hands of the Sheriff Clerk who required some one to join his staff; he would be able to apply local knowledge.

57,125. Would the unestablished staff, appointed in this way, be exclusively eligible for appointment to the established posts, or would you admit appointments from outside as well?—I think, after the scheme had been in operation for some time, it would not be necessary to make any appointments from outside, but it is just possible that for the higher posts—though experience shows that in the past it has not been necessary—occasionally an appointment would be made from outside, and I would not shut the door to that. I would leave it open to appoint qualified law agents to the higher posts in the establishment, but I would make that conditional upon no other member of the staff of the establishment being eligible for such appointment, and also on the approval of the Secretary of State for Scotland, or the Lord Advocate, having been obtained. I think one must try to be fair to the existing members of the established staff after it has been established.

57,126. You would admit appointments from the outside, but you would hedge them round with restrictions to ensure that they should not be made without sufficient cause, having regard to the interests of the established staff?—Yes.

57,127. You think that an unestablished staff, recruited in the way you suggest, would provide a sufficient number of good candidates for appointment to the established staff?—I think so, and probably also to the higher posts, such as the appointment to a Sheriff Clerkship itself.

57,128. Would you make the appointment of Sheriff Clerk normally by promotion from among the deputies?—After the scheme had been in operation for a sufficiently long time, it would probably come to that.

57,129. You told us that for the post of Sheriff Clerk you attached importance to the wider outlook and experience obtained in the outside profession?—Yes.

57,130. Does not your present suggestion somewhat conflict with that opinion?—I say that I think you will then be dealing with a staff that has been recruited very largely from the ranks of qualified law agents, because my suggestion is that entrants should pass the examination required for law agents, and should not be eligible for the higher posts in the staff unless they themselves had become qualified law agents.

57,131. But you propose to recruit your junior staff at the age of 16 or thereabouts from persons who have passed an examination in general knowledge, and not in any legal subjects. Surely a staff recruited in that way would not provide you with any men equipped with outside legal experience?—Not with outside legal experience. I quite see that if you admit them to the office in that way, you lose the advantage, if any, of previous outside experience and practice. I did not say that I thought it would be desirable that all outside appointments should cease, but I say I think if the staff were fully qualified, it would probably lead to the Lord Advocate making his selection from the existing staff after the scheme had been in operation for a certain time. He would have applications from men who were qualified as law agents, and who had served a long time on the staff, and I should think under such a system the tendency would be to make appointments from the staff to the higher posts.

57,132. You think that that tendency would be advantageous on the whole?—If it is worked upon such a system I think it would be fair, and would also be in the public interest.

57,133. The advantage of having an organised service and a reasonable flow of promotion would counterbalance any disadvantage which, in your view, would arise from not having men in the higher posts with outside experience?—Yes, that is just the point.

57,134. You would retain the present method of appointment of the Sheriff Clerks themselves by the Lord Advocate?—Yes. I have not seen any reason to suggest an alteration in that.

57,135. You have told us that at present the Lord Advocate's appointments are, it is recognised, made frequently, or in the majority of cases, on political grounds?—Yes.

57,136. If you retain the same system of appointment, is there any reason to expect that the principle on which the appointments are made will change?—Yes, I think there is. I have just suggested that if you have an established system, it is quite probable that the Lord Advocate will make his selection from within the ranks. That is happening at the present time in the case of Procurators Fiscal; the Lord Advocate, in his recent appointments, has made them by promotion from the existing staff. That may be because the Lord Advocate is himself the head of that department.

57,137. Whether that was continued or not would depend on the personal views of the Lord Advocate?—Yes, it would.

57,138. And in some degree on the amount of political pressure that was brought to bear upon him?—Possibly.

57,139. Would there not be some advantage in so modifying the method of appointment as to mark the intention to change the principles upon which appointments were to be made. In the case of the English legal appointments it has been suggested by witnesses of weight that the Lord Chancellor, who is the appointing authority in most cases in the English offices, should be assisted by a permanent and non-political committee, who should make recommendations to him with regard to the merits of different candidates. Do you think that such a system would be applicable in Scotland, considering it specially with regard to the Sheriff Clerks' appointments?—Yes. If you want to get rid of the political aspect of the matter, there should not be any difficulty in devising another method. What that method should be I am not prepared to suggest just now, but I have already said, in answer to your question, that if one were framing a scheme for the first time, one would not include that element.

57,140. If you had a service organised on the lines you suggest, you would, I presume, make the established staff pensionable?—Yes.

57,141. Would you, in that case, fix an age limit for retirement?—Yes, I think that would be necessary.

57,142. The ordinary Civil Service limit is 65, with power of possible extension as far as the age of 70. Would that limit be suitable?—Lord Salvesen's Committee indicated 70 as the age, with which I see no reason to disagree.

57,143. Do you see any reason why, for the staff generally, there should be a different age from that appointed for the Civil Service in general?—No.

57,144. The established staff which you suggest would consist entirely of whole-time employees?—Yes; but I would not shut the door to the holding of appointments like the Auditorship of Court with anything that it might bring in, but I think the Treasury would probably require to take into account in fixing salaries income derived from such office. It is very convenient that an office like the auditorship should be held by one who is an official of the Court.

57,145. Why?—It works very well in practice just now. The appointment is held either by the Sheriff Clerk or more usually by the Sheriff Clerk Depute, and he is familiar with the process and all the steps and proceedings in an action, and is in a particularly favourable position for acting as auditor.

2 June 1915.]

Mr. CHRISTOPHER JOHNSTON BISSET.

57,146. Given that it is desirable that that work should be done by the official staff, is there any reason why that work in particular should be remunerated by fees?—No. Necessarily it is at present remunerated by fees, because the work is done in a particular case, and has to be paid for by fee.

57,147. The fees might be paid into the Exchequer, as in the case of other Court fees?—That is quite possible.

57,148. And the work done in that respect included in the work for which a salary is paid?—I agree that that would be quite feasible.

57,149. Is there any special reason why that work should be treated on a different footing from other official work?—No. If the Treasury took over that department of the work the fees would go to the Treasury, and the increase of salary would be paid accordingly to the men who did the work. I see no objection to that.

57,150. In the English Court the taxing is entirely done by a salaried staff, and all fees for taxation are paid into the Exchequer. Do you see any reason why a similar system should not be applied in the Sheriff Courts, provided that suitable salaries were fixed?—No.

57,151. Do you apply your remark about holding other posts to any other work done at present by Sheriff Clerks or their staff?—No, not when one is dealing with the appointments under a new establishment, but I think it is right that I should say that with regard to those Sheriff Clerks who at present hold office, their interests ought to be safeguarded in the event of any change of that character being made.

57,152. I see you stated in your evidence before Lord Salvesen's Committee that you had inquired as to the number of deputies holding other appointments or carrying on separate business, and that out of 60 cases 38 held other appointments or carried on separate business, that is to say, 62 per cent.?—Yes.

57,153. Would those figures be correct at the present time?—I think they would be substantially correct at the present time.

57,154. Can you say whether, in many of those cases, the work, other than the Sheriff Court work, constitutes a large part of the work done by the officer?—A number of the cases included there are, I think, cases which would not come upon a new establishment.

57,155. They would be cases at the smaller courts, where the office could not conveniently be made a whole time office, and where it would remain one of the unestablished posts?—Yes.

57,156. As regards the posts which you would make established, that difficulty about whole time would not be a very serious one?—No, I think that could be got over.

57,157. Will you summarize for the Commission the suggestions which you have made in the course of your evidence?—(1) Reduce number of Sheriff Clerks, as vacancies occur, to one in each sherriffdom. (2) Sheriff Clerks hereafter appointed to be debarred from private practice and to give whole time, and to retire on pension at a specified age. (3) No new restriction to be imposed on present Sheriff Clerks against the conduct of private practice or the holding of other appointments, unless, of course, they receive compensation. (4) On occurrence of vacancies and consequent combination of appointments under No. 1, existing Sheriff Clerks should be appointed or transferred, in which case, if the combined salary were sufficient, restrictions against private practice and other appointments might be imposed where necessary. (5) Optional retirement on pension of existing Sheriff Clerks after a certain age or period of service. (6) In future appointments to the Sheriff Clerkship the persons appointed to possess qualifications as (a) existing Sheriff Clerks, or (b) qualified law agents, or (c) members of Sheriff Clerk's staff at date of commencement. These suggestions relate to the Sheriff Clerkships. Then with respect to the staff my suggestions are these: (1) All existing members of staff, whether deputies or clerks, to be put on a basis corresponding to Civil Service (or as nearly as the circumstances will permit) for salary, increment, and pension; with exceptions in the case of part time, very junior, casual, and small appointments. (2) In giving salaries, the Treasury to take into consideration income derived from other offices which the depute or clerk may be permitted to hold. (3) Future appointments to post with salary exceeding, say, 250*l.* per annum, to be given only to (a) members of the staff placed on the scheme at its commencement, or to (b) members of the staff not on the scheme at its commencement who have subsequently qualified as law agents, or to (c) qualified law agents; but no such appointment to be made from outside unless a suitable appointment cannot be made by promotion, and the approval of the Lord Advocate or Secretary for Scotland has been obtained. (4) For other posts, i.e., under 250*l.*, a test of fitness by open or limited competition to be established. (5) Apprenticeship with Sheriff Clerk, beginning after the commencement of the scheme, to be equivalent to apprenticeship with a law agent, for the purpose of enabling the apprentice to go up for the Law Agents' examination. I may say that we attach considerable importance to that point.

57,158. On that point, what is the position at present; if a candidate desires to go up for the Law Agents' examination, is it necessary for him to have served an apprenticeship with a law agent?—Yes, a law agent who is not a Sheriff Clerk; apprenticeship in a Sheriff Clerk's office, even though the head of the office is a qualified law agent himself, does not qualify for admission to the Law Agents' examination.

57,159. You suggest that apprenticeship in a Sheriff Clerk's office should qualify whether the Sheriff Clerk is a law agent or not?—Probably it would be an objection in the case where the Sheriff Clerk is not a law agent. The law agents themselves might have an objection to that, but speaking generally, I think myself that apprenticeship in a Sheriff Clerk's office ought to be sufficient.

57,160. By whom are the regulations for admission as law agents made?—They are made by the Court of Session under the Law Agents Act; but that point is dealt with by the statute. It was formerly the rule that apprenticeship with a Sheriff Clerk was a qualification for admission to the examinations, but that was departed from a number of years ago.

57,161. Will you now continue your summary?—(6) Promotion to prevail throughout the service and to be regulated by a committee of Sheriff Clerks presided over by the King's Remembrancer. (7) On the scheme coming into operation the Sheriff Clerk to be relieved of his present personal liability for the acts, intrusions, and neglects of his staff. (8) Questions of discipline and control to be determined by the Sheriff Clerk in the first instance, and where necessary by the committee on promotion; the ultimate authority in the case of the higher posts being the Lord Advocate (or Secretary for Scotland). (9) The size and classification of the staff as a whole, and where necessary of the staff of each office, to be regulated by the Treasury.

57,162. On point (7) you mention the personal liability of the Sheriff Clerk for the acts intrusions and neglects of his staff. Has that responsibility often been brought into operation in practice?—Not often, but there have been cases.

57,163. Have you yourself ever had to pay for the acts of your subordinates?—Yes, there was such a case in my personal experience.

57,164. Was that a case of defalcation or neglect?—It was a case of neglect.

57,165. Was an action brought?—No, it was threatened.

57,166. Compensation was paid without legal proceedings?—Yes.

57,167. Is that the only case in your experience?—In my personal experience that is the only case. Other Sheriff Clerks have had to make good the defalcations of their subordinates in several instances. The thing has happened. It is not a frequent occurrence, but these instances only prove that the Sheriff Clerk is responsible and that this point must be dealt with. Lord Salvesen's Committee expressed the opinion that the responsibility of the Sheriff Clerk did exist both for intrusions and for neglects.

2 June 1915.]

Mr. CHRISTOPHER JOHNSTON BISSET.

57,168. Some doubt has been raised on the latter point, has it not?—The deutes, I believe, have contended that the Sheriff Clerk is not responsible for neglects, but our opinion is that the Sheriff Clerks are responsible, and that opinion was expressed, I think I am right in saying, on both points by Lord Salvesen's Committee. They said: "It is here necessary to state, in view of the recommendations we have made subsequently, that in our opinion Sheriff Clerks are at present subject to a personal liability for the acts and intromissions of their deutes. We are aware that doubts have been expressed as to the existence, or, at all events, as to the extent, of this liability, but we see no reason for limiting in any way the opinion we have expressed."

57,169. Do you attach importance to that personal responsibility?—Yes, we do attach importance to that point. We feel that if we are not any longer to be allowed to appoint and dismiss the staff, it would not be fair for us to remain under such a responsibility for men over whom we do not have control.

57,170. Do you take any fidelity guarantee or insurance in any form against the acts of your subordinates?—No, I do not, and I do not think it is common. I have not heard of it being done. In any case, it is not a satisfactory method. I think it would be quite fair to do, as was done in the case of the Register House, when the Lord Clerk Register was relieved on the staff being placed on the establishment.

57,171. If the system were changed in the manner you suggest, if the Sheriff Clerk were relieved of his personal responsibility, and also were no longer responsible for appointments and promotions, do you consider that the disciplinary control of his staff would be weakened in any serious way?—I have suggested that questions of discipline should be under the control of the Sheriff Clerk in the first instance, and of that Committee upon Appointments and Promotions in the second place.

57,172. That is to say, there would be an appeal to the Committee?—Yes, and they would deal with the more serious cases, and, possibly, it might be desirable to have an ultimate authority in the person of the Lord Advocate in the case of the higher and better-paid posts. With such a system in operation I do not think there would be any real danger of a lack of discipline.

57,173. From the statement to which we referred in your evidence before Lord Salvesen's Committee cases of dismissal appear to be extremely rare?—Very.

57,174. It would seem, then, that an alteration in the system of dismissal would not materially modify the Sheriff Clerk's control over his staff in practice?—Not if it were supported by the safeguards I have suggested. My evidence before Lord Salvesen's Committee was directed rather to the proposals made by the deutes that they should be placed upon an independent footing—dealt with specially as deutes and not merely as members of a complete staff. We felt at that time that there was a real danger of a lack of discipline following upon such an arrangement.

57,175. Under the system you suggest you do not apprehend any such danger?—No.

57,176. The result of your system would be that you would have deutes in charge in a considerably greater number of places than at present?—Yes, that would be one result.

57,177. And the supervision of the Sheriff Clerks would presumably be less constant and direct, in that they would have a larger number of places to supervise?—Yes.

57,178. You do not anticipate any drawbacks arising from that system?—No; the 15 Sheriff Clerks would be all whole-time men, and in a position to exercise proper supervision.

57,179. You think that the deutes would be perfectly capable of exercising the degree of independent authority which they would have under the changed system?—Yes. May I add, with respect to those Sheriff Clerks who hold office at present, that we feel that their interests should be safeguarded in any re-arrangement. Persons appointed have been solicitors of experience in their profession, and therefore at or beyond middle life, and in a number of cases they have been required, as a condition of appointment, to give up private practice. We, therefore, suggest that in the case of persons so appointed and presently holding office, provision should be made that such a Sheriff Clerk should not be required to retire at a given age, but should be given the option to retire on the same terms as to pension as are provided in the case of Sheriffs Substitute. That would be merely a temporary provision dealing with the Sheriff Clerks at present in office. Correspondingly, we think that interference should not be made with the Sheriff Clerk's right to carry on private practice or to hold other appointments where such a right exists at present, whatever may be done with respect to future appointments.

57,180. What are the terms of the section of the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907, to which you refer?—It is section 20 which provides: "It shall be lawful for the Treasury, upon the recommendation of the Secretary for Scotland, to grant an annuity payable in like manner as the salaries to any person who has held, now holds, or may hereafter hold the office of Sheriff or salaried Sheriff Substitute whose period of service (notwithstanding that such service may not have been continuous and may have been in different sheriffdoms and may have been partly as Sheriff Substitute and partly as Sheriff) has been not less than 10 years."

57,181. The section goes on to provide what the amount of the pension should be?—Yes, varying according to the length of service.

57,182. You suggest that similar terms should be conceded to the existing Sheriff Clerks if the changes you suggest were brought into effect?—Yes, especially as quite a number of them have been appointed pretty late in life and have not made a career of the Sheriff Clerkship.

57,183. In the case of the Sheriffs Substitute, to whom that section applies, were any of them part-time officers?—No.

57,184. There might be some difficulty in applying a similar provision to Sheriff Clerks who have not given their whole time to their office?—That might be. My suggestion is that it should be merely optional—that a Sheriff Clerk should not be compelled to retire after having given up his private practice in order to take this appointment which he understood was going to be for life; he should not be compelled to retire unless he wanted to do so, and upon suitable terms as to pension.

57,185. (Lord Dundas.) I have very few questions with which to trouble you. I understand that you think the Sheriff Clerk's staff might with advantage be put on some sort of Civil Service basis?—Yes.

57,186. On that, not in any hostile spirit, you will understand, but for information—I will put one or two questions to you. I understand you think there should be, or might be, an entrance examination—something on the footing of the Law Agents' examination?—Yes.

57,187. When a young man had passed that examination, would he be eligible for employment in other branches of the Civil Service, or only in the fortunes of the Sheriff Clerk's staff?—In the Sheriff Clerk's staff or in the legal profession generally.

57,188. You mean because he was a law agent?—Yes.

57,189. But as regards his whole service, it is only in this particular branch that you are speaking of?—I think there are certain posts in the Civil Service in Edinburgh which are only open to qualified law agents, but the number is not large.

57,190. Quite so, anything that a law agent may get he would be qualified for?—Yes.

57,191. But you do not suggest that because he has passed this special entrance test he would be eligible for some other branch of the Civil Service than this particular Sheriff Clerk's staff branch?—No.
